remaining fish and, beating the residual water, began to catch numbers of fish, including the procrastinating Sakula, and to tie them as they were caught to a long string. The Sakula noted for his presence of mind thrust himself into the company of those that had been so tied and remained quietly among them, biting the string to give the appearance of having been caught. The fishermen, believing that all the fish attached to the string had been caught, removed them to deeper waters to wash them, at which point the quick Sakula left the string and darted away to safety. However the fish who had been procrastinating, foolish and bemused as he was, was unable to escape, and met with death.

Thus, like the procrastinating fish, anyone who, from want of intelligence, cannot divine the approach of danger, will meet with destruction. He who considers himself clever does not seek his own good at the appropriate time and thereby incurs great danger, like the Sakula fish with presence of mind. Only one who plans in advance, and one with presence of mind, can succeed. One who postpones his decisions meets with destruction.

The divisions of time are many, such as Kashtha, Kala, Muhurta, day, night, Lava, month, fortnight, the six seasons, Kalpa, and year. We call the divisions of the earth place, while Time we cannot see. The success of any object or purpose is achieved or not, according to the manner in which the mind is set to think of it. The man of forethought and the one with the presence of mind, the Rishis declare, in all treatises on dharma and artha and in those that deal with mukti, is foremost among men. He who acts after reflection and scrutiny, and who uses proper means to accomplish his objectives, will always achieve a great deal. However, those who work with due regard to time and place, win results better than the mere man of presence of mind.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'You say, O Bharatarishabha, that intelligence which provides for future contingencies and meets present emergencies is always superior, while procrastination brings about destruction. I ask you, Pitamaha, about that superior intelligence which will protect a king who knows the shastras, dharma and artha, and guard him from confusion even when he is surrounded by many enemies. I want you to tell me, O Kurupravira, everything that the shastras lay down about the manner in which a king should conduct himself when enemies assail him.

When a king is in trouble, a large number of his enemies, provoked by his past actions, will range themselves against him and try to vanquish him. How can a king, weak and alone, succeed in holding up his head when he is challenged from all sides by many powerful kings in league together? At such times, how does a king make friends and enemies, O Bharatarishabha, and how should he then behave towards both? When those he thought of as his friends become his enemies, what should a king do, if he wants happiness? With whom should he go to war, and with whom should he make peace? Even if he is strong, how should he behave in the midst of enemies? O Parantapa, this to me is the greatest of all questions regarding the discharge of Rajadharma. Few can hear the answer to this question, and none can answer it save Santanu's son. Firmly wedded to truth, with all your senses under control, O blessed one, reflect on this and speak to me!'

Bhishma replies, 'Yudhishtira, this question is certainly worthy of you. I am immensely happy to tell you all the duties generally known that one should practice in times of distress, O Bhaarata. An enemy becomes a friend and a friend also becomes an enemy, for the course of human actions through the play of circumstances is very uncertain. Therefore, what should be done and what should not, whether one should either trust one's enemies or make war depend upon the requirements of time and place. One should exert oneself to make friends with intelligent and knowledgeable men who have one's welfare at heart. You should make peace with even your enemies, O Bhaarata, when your life cannot otherwise be saved. The foolish man who never makes peace with enemies will never gain or acquire any of those fruits for which others strive. He who makes peace with enemies and breaks even with friends, after a full consideration of the circumstances, obtains great benefits.

An old story is told of an exchange between a cat and a mouse under a banyan tree. In the midst of a great forest there was a huge banyan. Covered with many kinds of creepers, it was the resort of diverse birds. It had a large trunk from which numerous branches extended in all directions. Delightful to view, it afforded refreshing shade and was home to animals of many species. A wise mouse named Palita lived happily at the foot of the tree in a hole with a hundred outlets. On the branches of the tree lived a cat called Lomasa, contentedly devouring a large number of birds every day.

After some time, a Chandala came to the vana and built a hut there for himself. Every evening after sunset he spread his traps of leathern strings and, going back to his hut, slept happily till he re-visited his traps at dawn. Diverse animals fell into his nets every night, and it so happened that one day the cat, in a careless moment, got caught in the snare.

O you of great wisdom, the mouse Palita, seeing his enemy the cat thus caught in the net, came out of his hole and began to rove about fearlessly. While confidently wandering through the forest in search of food, the mouse caught sight of the meat spread there as lure. Getting up on the trap, the little animal began to eat the flesh. Laughing to himself, he even climbed over his old foe entangled helplessly in the net. Intent on eating the meat, oblivious to his own danger, he suddenly noticed the presence of a terrible enemy, none other than a coppery-eyed, restless mongoose named Harita. Living in underground holes, it resembled in form the flower of a reed. Attracted by the scent of the mouse, the animal hastened towards his prey, standing on his haunches with head upraised, licking the corners of his mouth with his tongue.

The mouse at the same moment beheld, sitting on the branch of the banyan tree, another arboreal enemy, the sharp-beaked nocturnal bird called Chandraka. When he realized that both the mongoose and the owl had seen him, Palita, surrounded by danger and filled with alarm for his safety, began to think, and made a great resolution: "At times of such peril, when death itself is staring me in the face and fear is all around, what should one do who wants his own good? I must try and save my life, warding off by every conceivable means even multiple dangers.

If I descend from this trap to the ground without measures for my safety, the mongoose will surely devour me. If I remain on this trap, the owl will certainly seize me. If, again, that cat manages to disentangle himself from the net, he too is certain to eat me up. But someone of my acumen should not lose his wits. I must use my intelligence and do my best to save my life. A person of wisdom and intelligence who knows the science of strategy never despairs, however great and terrible the danger that threatens him.

At present, I do not see any refuge other than this cat. He is an enemy, but himself in distress, so the service that I can do him is great. With three enemies trying to make me their prey, what should I do to save my life? I should now seek the protection of one of them, the cat. My plan should be to advise the cat for his good, so that I can escape from all three. Let me try to make this foolish creature understand his own interests in order to get him to make peace with me. When one's life is threatened, say those who profess knowledge of Neeti, one should even conciliate an enemy. It is better to have a learned person for an enemy than a fool for a friend. My life now rests entirely in the hands of my enemy the cat, and so I will now talk to him about his own liberation. Perhaps, at this moment, it would not be wrong to take him for an intelligent and learned foe."

The mouse, surrounded by enemies, pursued his reflections in this strain and, familiar with the science of artha and well acquainted with occasions when one should declare war or make peace, gently addressed the cat, saying, "I speak as a friend, O cat! Are you alive? I wish you to live! I wish for the good of us both. O amiable one, have no fear. You will live in happiness, and I will rescue you, if you do not kill me. There is an excellent plan I have thought of, by which you can escape, and which will benefit me as well. The mongoose and the owl are both waiting with evil intent, and my life is safe only as long as they do not attack me. There, that wretched owl with restless glances and horrid cries is eyeing me from the branch of that tree, terrifying me.

Two good men can become friends in no time by just taking seven steps in a walk together. As you are wise, you are my friend and you need have no fear now. Without my help, O cat, you will not succeed in tearing the net. I will serve you by cutting the net, if you abstain from killing me. You have lived on this tree and I have lived at its foot for many long years together, as you know. The wise do not approve one whom nobody trusts, or one who never trusts another; both are unhappy. For this reason, let our love for each other increase, and let there be union among us both. Wise men do not approve of trying to do something when the moment for it has passed. This is the proper time for such an understanding between us. I wish that you survive, and you also want me to live. A man crosses a deep and large river on a piece of wood, each taking the other across. Similarly, our compact also will bring happiness to both of us, and we will rescue each other."

The mouse Palita waited expectantly for an answer, knowing that his suggestion was reasonable and beneficial to both.

‘Hearing the suggestion of the mouse, framed in well-chosen words to make it acceptable, the cat, possessed of foresight and judgment of his own, answered him politely. Regarding the mouse kindly through eyes like lapis lazuli gemstones, the sharp-toothed Lomasa replied, “I am delighted with you, O amiable one! Bless you for wishing me to live! Do not hesitate to do what you think is helpful, as I am certainly in great danger, and you in possibly greater difficulties. Let us have an agreement between us, and I will do what is appropriate and necessary for the success of our efforts. If you rescue me, your service will not be forgotten. I will place myself in your hands, serve you devotedly like a disciple and always obey you.”

The mouse Palita, seeing that the cat was now completely under his influence, answered him with grave and judicious words. “You have spoken magnanimously, beyond my expectations. Listen to this plan I have hit upon to our mutual advantage. I will crouch beneath your body, as I am terrified of the mongoose. Save me, do not kill me, for I can rescue you. Protect me also from the owl, for that wretch, too, wishes to seize me for his prey. I swear by Truth that I will cut the net that entangles you, O friend!”

Lomasa gazed at Palita with delight and, now converted to cordiality, lauded him with exclamations of welcome. Losing no time, he said, “Come, quick! You are indeed blessed, a friend dear to me as breath, since through your grace I have almost got back my life. Tell me now whatever is in my power to do for you and I will do it. Let there be peace between us, O friend! Once free from this danger, I and all my friends and relatives will do all that is agreeable and beneficial to you, and will always try to please and honour you for your services. One can one never become equal to the person who did the favour first, even with abundant service in return. One does it in return for help received, while the other acts without any such motive."

Bhishma continues, 'The mouse, once he convinced the cat of his own interests, crept under its breast as trustfully as if it had been the lap of his father or mother. Both Harita and Chandraka were shocked and amazed at this, and gave up all hope of catching the prey so close to them. They had strength, intelligence and enough cleverness to seize their prey, but realized they could not break the compact between the mouse and the cat, and went away to their respective homes.

Then the mouse Palita, who knew what to do when, began to gnaw through the strings of the net slowly, as he lay under the body of the cat, waiting for the opportune moment to finish his work. Distressed by the strings that entangled him, the cat grew impatient at the slow progress the mouse was making and, wishing to hurry him up, said, "O amiable one, how is it that you do not proceed faster with your work? Now that you have succeeded in your purpose, do you disregard me? O Parantapa, do cut these strings quickly, as the hunter will soon be here!"

The clever mouse, with his own interest in mind, replied in politic terms to the impatient cat, who was less acute, "Wait in silence, O amiable one, and drive away your fears. Speed is not essential. We know the requirements of time. It will not be wasted. A venture begun at an improper time cannot succeed, while one started at the right time will always produce splendid results. If I free you at an improper time, I will have to remain in great fear of you. So wait for the right one. Do not be impatient, friend, for I will cut the strings when I see the hunter approach, armed with his weapons, at the moment when both of us are terrified. Set free at that instant, you will scramble up the tree thinking of nothing save your safety and, as you flee in dread, I will enter my hole."

When he heard this, the cat, who was clever and persuasive, and indeed had expeditiously fulfilled his own part of the covenant, said to the recalcitrant mouse, "I rescued you promptly from a great danger, Alas, this is not the way for honest people to do business with their friends! They are happy to do their part, but it turns out otherwise. You should work for my benefit more speedily. O you of great wisdom, do go a bit faster. If you are only waiting for time to slip away, because of our former hostility, know, evil one, that the consequence of your act will be to lessen your own life! If I have in the past unconsciously done you any wrong, I ask your forgiveness."

The wise mouse, who knew the scriptures, replied: "O cat, I have heard what you have to say in your own interest. Now listen to me as I tell you mine. A friendship based and maintained on fear should be sustained with great caution, like the hand of the snake-charmer from the fangs of the snake. He who does not protect himself after contracting an agreement with someone stronger, will find that it causes harm instead of good. Nobody is anybody's friend or well-wisher, for men become friends or enemies only from motives of self-interest. Interest attracts interest, just as tame elephants catch wild individuals of their species. After an act has been accomplished, the doer is barely remembered; therefore all acts should be so done that something remains to be completed. When I set you free, you will flee for your life without a thought to catch me, out of fear of the hunter. See, I have cut all the strings of this net. Only one remains; I will cut that also quickly. Be comforted, Lomasa!"

'While the mouse and the cat were talking to each other, both in serious danger, the night gradually wore away, and a great dread pierced the heart of the cat. When at last morning came, the grim-visaged Chandala, Parigha, appeared on the scene, armed with weapons and accompanied by a pack of dogs. His aspect was fierce and frightful, exceedingly filthy, with black and tawny hair, large hips, long ears, and a large mouth extending from ear to ear. Seeing Parigha, who appeared veritably as an agent of Yama, the cat asked Palita, "What will you do now?" Palita rapidly cut the last string and freed the cat, who sped up the tall banyan tree, while the mouse darted into his own hole. The Chandala saw everything and, with his hopes frustrated, gathered up his nets and returned home.

Liberated from that great peril, and with his precious life intact, the cat, from the branches of the tree, addressed the mouse Palita in his hole: "You ran away so suddenly, without speaking to me. I hope you do not suspect me of any evil intentions. I am certainly grateful for the great service you have done me. Since you inspired me with trust and gave me my life, why don't you approach me now, so that we can enjoy the sweetness of friendship?

He who forgets his friends is a wicked person and will never find comrades in times of danger and need. You have honoured and served me to the best of your power, and it is now proper for you to enjoy the company of my poor self who has become your friend. Like disciples who revere their guru, all my friends and kinsmen will honour and worship you, your friends and your kinsmen, for which grateful individual will not idolize his saviour?

Be the lord of both my body and home, be the disposer of all my wealth and possessions, be my honoured counsellor and rule me like a father. I swear by my life that you have no fear from us. In intelligence you are Usanas himself. By the power of your strategy you have given us our life and by the strength of your understanding you have conquered us."

Soothed by the comforting words of the cat, the mouse, who knew what was good for him, replied in sweet and sensible words: "I have heard you, Lomasa, so now listen to me. Friends should be well scrutinized, and enemies closely studied. In this world, even the learned regard a task like this as difficult, one depending upon acute intelligence. Friends assume the guise of enemies, and foes assume the guise of friends. When pacts of friendship are formed, it is difficult for the parties to understand whether the other parties are really moved by kama and krodha.

There is no such thing as a foe. There is no such thing as a friend. It is force of circumstances that creates friends and foes. He who thinks his own interests to be safe if another person lives, and endangered if he dies, regards him as a friend as long as their interests do not clash. There is no condition that deserves the permanent name either of friendship or hostility. Both friends and enemies arise from considerations of interest and gain.

Friendship changes to enmity in the course of time, and a foe also becomes a friend; self-interest is supreme. He who reposes blind trust in friends, and is always suspicious of enemies, without any guiding principle, will find his life unsafe. He who sets his heart upon affiliating with either friend or foe, without consideration of strategy, is regarded as unhinged. One should neither place trust in someone undeserving, nor too much faith in someone deserving. The danger that arises from blind confidence is that it cuts the very roots of him who reposes such assurance. Interest and advantage guide even a father, a mother, a son, a maternal uncle, a sister's son, or other relatives and kinsmen. One can even see a father and mother discard a dear son faced with disgrace. People take care of themselves; such is the efficacy of self-interest.

O wise one, someone who seeks his enemy's happiness immediately after being freed from danger will find escape very difficult. You came down from the tree-top to this very spot and, due to your limitations of perception, did not notice the net spread here. How can one who fails to protect himself protect others? He is sure to ruin all his work. You tell me in sweet words that I am very dear to you. Listen, friend, to my analysis.

One becomes dear for a reason, and an enemy, too, for some adequate cause. The desire for gain, in some form or other, moves this whole world of creatures. Friendship between two brothers, love between husband and wife, depends upon selfishness. I do not know any kind of affection between men that does not rest upon some motive of self-interest. Sometimes we see blood brothers or husband and wife quarrel and reunite from natural affection; we also see this in men unrelated to each other. You cherish one for his liberality, another for his sweet words and a third for his religious deeds; all are dear to us for the purpose they serve.

The amity between us arose for a sufficient cause. That cause no longer exists. What reason is there for which I am so dear to you, other than your desire to make me your prey? You should know that I will not forget that Time erode these reasons. You seek your own interests, just as other wise men and I value our own welfare. The world rests upon the example of the wise, and I feel that this affection that you show me now is ill-timed. My self-interest makes me constant in both peace and war, themselves very unstable. The circumstances under which one makes peace or declares war change as quickly as clouds change their form.

This very day you were first my enemy, then my friend, and now once more you are an enemy. There was friendship between us as long as there was basis for its existence. Once it passed away, so did friendship. You are by nature my enemy, but circumstances made you my friend. That state of things has now passed and the old natural state of enmity has returned. As I understand this principle, why should I, for your sake, enter the net that is spread for me? Through your power, I was freed from a great danger. Through my power, you have been freed from a similar danger. Each of us has served the other through our individual abilities and freed the other from peril, and there is no need for us to come together again in friendly conversation.

We have both accomplished our objectives. I am weak and you are strong; I am your food and you are my eater. There cannot be a friendly union between us when we are situated so unequally. I understand your cunning, which is to praise me so that you can all the more easily eat me. You got entangled in the net while searching for food. You are freed, and once again you feel the pangs of hunger. You can now have no further use for me except as a meal. I know you are hungry, and this is your dinner time; your gaze is upon me as you seek your prey. Acute from studying the shastras, you scheme in truth to eat me up today. You have sons and wives. Still you seek a friendly union with me, offer to treat me with affection and do me services. Friend, I cannot accept this proposal. If your dear spouse and loving children see me with you, they would cheerfully eat me up!

I will not, therefore, join you in friendship, for there is no longer any reason for such a union. If, indeed, you wish not to forget my help, think of what will be beneficial for me, and be satisfied. Which wise man would place himself in the power of an enemy who is not a distinguished dharmatma, who is in the pangs of hunger and on the look-out for a prey? Be happy, then. I will presently leave you. I am filled with alarm to see you even from a distance. I will not mix with you, so stop your attempts, Lomasa! If you think I have done you a service, follow then the rules of friendship when I happen to rove confidently or carelessly. Even that would be gratitude enough, coming from you.

Living near a strong and powerful person is never a good thing, even if the immediate danger has receded. I will always stand in fear of one more powerful than myself. If you do not seek your own interests, tell me what I can do for you, and I shall certainly give you everything—except my life. For protecting oneself one should even give up one's own children, kingdom, jewels and wealth. If one lives, one can recover all the affluence that one has lost. Men who protect and commit themselves only after proper consideration and assessment are never in danger. The weak always know him for an enemy who has greater strength. Their understanding, firm in the truths of the shastras, never loses its focus."'

'Thus rebuked soundly by the mouse Palita, the cat blushed with shame, and said, "Truly, I swear to you that I consider injuring a friend to be detestable. I know you are wise and want to do me good. Guided by Artha, you say that there is cause for a breach between you and me. It does not become you, good friend, to take me for what I am not. I regard you as a great friend, for I owe you my life. I, too, am familiar with duties, and appreciate other people's merits. I am very grateful for services received, and I am committed to the service of friends, especially to you. For these reasons we should fraternize. At your command, I and all my kinsmen and relatives will lay down our very lives. Those who are learned and wise see abundant reason to place their trust in those of such mental disposition as us. So you, who know the truths of dharma, should not suspect me."

The mouse reflected a little, and said gravely, "You are exceedingly good, and I am glad to hear all that you have said. For all that, I cannot trust you. It is impossible for you, by such eulogies or by gifts of great wealth, to induce me to associate with you again. The wise never place themselves in the power of an enemy without sufficient reason. A weak person who has a pact with a stronger one, when both are threatened by enemies, should conduct himself carefully, and with considerations of expediency, when that common danger passes. After he has gained his objective, the weaker of the two parties should not again place confidence in the stronger. One should never trust someone who does not deserve to be trusted, nor should one believe blindly another who merits trust. One should try to inspire others with confidence in oneself, but not repose confidence in enemies. Thus one should, under all circumstances, protect oneself.

One's possessions, children and all, are valuable so long as one is alive. In brief, the highest truth of all treatises on policy is mistrust. For this reason, mistrust of all produces the greatest good. If weak people mistrust their enemies, the latter, even if strong, will never get them under their power. O cat, someone like myself should always guard his life from someone like you. You too should protect your own life from the Chandala whose rage you have excited." The cat, frightened at the mention of the hunter, instantly left the branch of the tree and sped away. The wise mouse Palita, who who knew the truths of the shastras, having displayed his power of understanding, also left and entered another hole.'

Bhishma continues, 'Thus the mouse Palita, though weak and alone, through his intelligence baffled many powerful enemies. A wise man should make peace with a powerful enemy. The mouse and the cat owed their escape to their reliance upon each other's services. I have thus pointed out to you the course of Kshatriya duties at great length. Listen while I summarise it for you.

When two men who were once engaged in hostilities make peace with each other, it is certain that each of them desires to outwit the other. In such a case he who is wise by the power of his understanding, will get the better of the other. On the other hand, he who lacks wisdom will suffer, if he is careless, and will be over-come by the intelligent. It is necessary that one should appear to be fearless even when afraid, and appear to be trustful even while really mistrusting others. One who acts thus never stumbles or, if he stumbles, is not ruined. When the right time comes, one should make peace with an enemy, or wage war with even a friend. This is how one should conduct oneself, O Rajan, as the authorities on matters of peace and war have said.

Knowing this, O Rajan, one should bear in mind the truth of the shastras, and with all his wits about him, behave like one in fear before the cause of fear actually presents itself, and make peace with enemies. Such fear and alertness sharpen the intellect. If one behaves like a nervous man before the cause of fear is at hand, one is not panic-stricken when the cause is actually present. From the fear of someone who always behaves fearlessly, one sees very great fear arising. You should not advise anyone, "Never be afraid." He who is afraid, spurred by the knowledge of his own weakness, seeks the counsel of wise and experienced men. For these reasons, one should appear to be fearless even when afraid, and seem to be trustful when one mistrusts others. But on the most important matters, one should not behave towards others with falsehood.

You have listened, O Yudhishtira, to the old story of the mouse and the cat that I have told. Act as required amidst your friends and kinsmen. Derive insight from this story. Learn the difference between a friend and an enemy, and the proper time for war and peace, and you will discover a means of escape when in danger. Make peace at a time of common danger with a powerful one, and think carefully about uniting with the enemy after the danger has passed. Indeed, having achieved your purpose, you should not trust the enemy again. This path of policy is consistent with the aggregate of three, O Rajan!

Guided by this Sruti, win prosperity by protecting your subjects once more, O son of Pandu. Seek the companionship of Brahmanas in all your work, as they constitute the great source of benefit both in this world and the next. They are teachers of dharma and are always grateful and, if worshipped, are sure to do you good. Therefore, O Rajan, you should venerate them and then you will duly obtain kingdom, great benefits, fame, achievement and progeny, in the proper order. This story of peace and war between the mouse and the cat, this history so persuasive and instructive, should remain always before his eyes when a king conducts himself in the midst of his enemies.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'You have stated, O Mahabaho, that one should not trust foes. But how can the king maintain himself if he does not trust anybody? You say that kings who trust others face greater danger. How can a king conquer his enemies without depending on others? Clear my doubts, for my mind has become confused by what you say about mistrust.'

Bhishma replies, 'Listen, O Rajan, to the story of King Brahmadatta and a bird named Pujani who lived for a long time within the inner apartments of the king's palace at Kampilya. Like the bird Jivajivaka, Pujani could mimic the cries of all animals. Although a bird by birth, she had great knowledge and knew every truth.

While living there, she had a child of great splendor, at the very same time as the king and his queen also had a son. Pujani, who was grateful for the shelter of the king's roof, used to go every day to the shores of the ocean and bring back a couple of fruits for the nourishment of both her own nestling and the infant prince. One of the fruits she gave to her chick, the other to the prince. Every day she brought them, and every day she distributed them the same way. The fruits she brought were sweet as nectar and most nutritious. The infant prince derived great strength from Pujani's fruit.

One day the prince, while with his nurse, saw Pujani's chick. Getting down from the nurse's arms, he ran towards the little bird, the same age as himself, and, moved by childish impulse, began to play with it happily. At last, picking up the bird in his hands, the prince stifled the chick's life. He went back to his nurse. When Pujani, who had been out in search of the usual fruits, returned to the palace and saw her young one lying dead on the ground, killed by the prince, she wept bitterly. With tears gushing down her cheeks, her heart burning with grief, she said, "Alas, nobody should live with a Kshatriya, or make friends with him, or associate with him. When they have a purpose to serve, they are courteous, and when that object has been served they discard you. The Kshatriyas do evil to all. They should never be trusted. Even after they inflict a wound, they try to pacify the injured, at no cost to themselves. I will exact my retribution from the cruel and ungrateful betrayer of my trust. He is guilty of a triple sin, because he took the life of one who was born on the same day as him, who was reared with him and ate with him, and who was dependent on him for protection."

With these words to herself, Pujani pierced the eyes of the prince with her talons, and, deriving some comfort from her act of reprisal, said again, "A sinful deed, perpetrated deliberately, harms the doer immediately, while those who avenge an injury do not lose their punya." O Rajan, if the consequences of a sinful deed are not visited upon the perpetrator himself, they will certainly be on his descendants.

When Brahmadatta saw his son blinded by Pujani, he understood what had happened, and said to Pujani. "We did you an injury, and you have avenged it. The account has been squared. Do not leave your home, O Pujani; continue to dwell here."

Pujani replied, "If anyone who causes an injury to another continues living with that other, his conduct will not be approved by the learned. In the circumstances, it is always better for him to leave his former place. One should never trust gentle assurances received from an injured party. The fool who trusts such assurances soon meets with death.

Animosity is not quickly cooled. The very sons and grandsons of men who have injured each other can encounter destruction, as enmity is handed down like an inheritance. As a result of their offspring being destroyed, they lose the next world also.

Among men who have injured one another, mistrust can be advantageous. One who has betrayed a confidence should never be trusted; one who does not deserve trust should not be trusted; nor should too much trust be placed in anyone, though he may be deserving of trust. The danger that arises from blind confidence brings wholesale destruction. While one should seek to inspire others with confidence in oneself, one should not repose confidence in others.

One’s father and the mother are only the foremost of friends. The wife is merely a vessel for procreation. The son is only one’s seed. The brother is an enemy. A friend or companion requires to have his palms oiled, if he is to remain one. You alone enjoy or suffer your own happiness or misery.

It is not advisable to have real peace among men who have injured one another. The reasons for which I lived here no longer exist. The mind of one who has once injured another becomes naturally filled with mistrust, if he sees the injured one pay homage to him with gifts and honours. Such conduct, especially when displayed by those who are strong, always fills the weak with alarm.

An intelligent person should leave the place where he was first given respect, so as not to meet with dishonour and injury again, despite any subsequent honour that he might obtain from his enemy. I have dwelt in your home for a long time, esteemed by you. However, a cause for enmity has now arisen, and I should leave this place without any hesitation.”

'Brahmadatta replied, "One who does an injury in return for an injury received, is not considered unjust. Indeed, the avenger only settles his account. Therefore, Pujani, continue to dwell here and do not leave this place."

Pujani said, "No friendship can be restored between one who has injured another and one who has inflicted an injury in return. The hearts of neither can forget what has happened."

Brahmadatta replied, "It is necessary for an injurer and the avenger of injury to get together. One has seen that upon such a union, mutual animosity cools and no fresh injury follows."

Pujani said, "That animosity can never die. The person injured should never trust his enemies and think, 'O, I have been soothed with assurances of goodwill.' In this world, men frequently meet with destruction because of misplaced confidence. We should no longer meet each other. Those who cannot be subjugated even by force and sharp weapons can be conquered by conciliation, as she-elephants are used to capture elephants."

Brahmadatta said, "Even if one inflicts deadly injury upon the other, affection and mutual trust arises naturally between them if they live together, as in the case of the Chandala and the dog. Among men who have injured one another, living together blunts the keenness of animosity. Indeed, it disappears quickly like water poured upon the leaf of a lotus."

Pujani said, "The learned know that enmity springs from five causes: woman, land, harsh words, natural incompatibility and injury. If the person with whom hostility occurs is a liberal man, he should not be killed, particularly by a Kshatriya, openly or by covert means. In such a case, the man's fault should be properly weighed. When there is hostility even with a friend, no further confidence should be reposed in him. Enmity lies hidden like fire in wood and cannot be put out without consuming one of the parties outright. Like the Aurvya fire within the waters of the ocean, the fire of antipathy can never be extinguished with gifts of wealth, by display of prowess, by conciliation or by scriptural knowledge.

If one has injured a person, he should never be trusted again as a friend, even though one might later have lavished wealth and honours on him. The fact of the injury inflicted fills the injurer with fear. I never injured you, nor did you ever harm me, so I lived in your house. All that has changed, and I cannot trust you any more."

Brahmadatta said, "Time is responsible for all action. Karma is of diverse kinds, all of them proceeding from Time. Who, therefore, injures whom? Birth and death happen in the same way: creatures take birth and live as a result of Time, and it is also because of Time that they cease to live. We see some die all at once some die one at a time, and some live long lives. Like fire consuming fuel, Time consumes all creatures.

O Bird, I am not the cause of your sorrow, nor are you the cause of mine. It is Time that decides the happiness or misery of living creatures. So continue to live here at your pleasure, with affection for me and without fear of any injury from me. I have forgiven you for what you have done and you must forgive me too, Pujani!"

Pujani replied, "If Time to you is the cause of all actions, then of course nobody should cherish feelings of enmity towards anybody on earth. Why then do friends and kinsmen seek to avenge the slain? Why too did the Devas and the Asuras in ancient days attack one another in battle? If it is Time that causes happiness and misery, birth and death, why do physicians administer medicines to the sick? If it is Time that moulds everything, what is the need for medicines? Why do grief-stricken people, deprived of their senses, indulge in such delirious lamentions? If Time, according to you, is the cause of karma, how can men acquire punya by performing religious deeds?

Your son killed my child and, impelled by grief, I blinded him for it. I have by that action, Rajan, become liable to be killed by you. Men desire birds either to kill them for food, or keep in cages for their pleasure, and for no other reason. Birds, again, from fear of being either killed or caged by men, seek safety in flight. Men who know the Vedas have said that death and imprisonment are both painful. Life is dear to all. Grief and pain make all creatures miserable. All creatures wish for happiness. Misery arises from various sources, Brahmadatta. Decrepitude is misery. Loss of wealth is misery. The proximity of anything disagreeable or evil is misery. Separation from friends and agreeable objects is misery. Misery arises from imprisonment and death. Misery arises from causes connected with women, and from other natural causes. The misery that arises from the death of children alters and afflicts all creatures tremendously.

Fools say there is no unhappiness in others' misery. Only he who has not felt any pain or sorrow himself can say so in the midst of men, not anyone who has felt distress or anguish himself. One who has experienced pangs of any kind of misery feels the misery of others as his own. What I have done to you, Rajan, and what you have done to me cannot be washed away by even a hundred years; there can be no reconciliation. As often as you happen to think of your son, your resentment towards me will become fresh.

If a man, after he avenges himself for an injury, wants to make peace with the injured, the two can never be properly reunited, even like the fragments of an earthen vessel. Men who know the shastras say that trust never produces happiness. Usanas himself sang two verses to Prahlada in ancient times: 'He who trusts the words of a foe, true or false, meets with death like a honey-gatherer falling into a pit covered with dry grass.'

We see antagonisms survive the very death of enemies, for men speak of the past enmities of their deceased fathers before their surviving children. Kings settle mutual animosities by conciliation but, when the opportunity comes, they shatter their enemies like earthen water-jars dashed upon stone. If the king wrongs someone, he should never trust him again, else he will have to suffer great misery."'

'Brahmadatta said, "No man achieves anything by distrust of others. Nurturing fear obliges one to live like a corpse."

Pujani replied, "He whose feet are sore will certainly fall, however cautiously he tries to walk. Similarly, a man whose eyes have become sore by opening them against the wind will find wind very painful to them. He who sets foot on an evil path and persists in walking along it, without knowing his own strength, will soon lose his life. He who is lazy and tills his land disregarding the season of rain will never reap a harvest. He who eats every day food that is nutritious, be it bitter, sharp, palatable or sweet, will enjoy a long life, while he who ignores wholesome food and takes what is injurious, oblivious of its consequences, will soon meet with death.

Destiny and effort depend upon each other. Mahatmans achieve good and great feats, while eunuchs only pay court to Destiny. Be it harsh or mild, one's karma should be good. The unfortunate man of inaction is always overwhelmed by all sorts of calamity. One should use one's energy to do what is beneficial to oneself and abandon everything else. Knowledge, courage, cleverness, strength and patience are said to be one's natural friends, and wise men live in this world with the aid of these five. Houses, precious metals, land, wife and friends—these are secondary sources of good, the learned say, and can be obtained everywhere.

A wise man can be happy and will stand out everywhere. He never fills anybody with fear, or yields to fear even if frightened. The wealth that he possesses at any time, however little, is certain to increase. Such a man acts with acumen and self-restraint and will win great fame.

Foolish men have to put up at home with quarrelsome wives who devour their flesh like the progeny of a crab eating up their mothers. There are men who, through deficiency of understanding, become disconsolate at the prospect of leaving home. They say to themselves, 'These are our friends! This is our country! Alas, how shall we leave these?' One should certainly leave the country of one's birth if it is afflicted by plague or famine. One should live in one's own country respected by all, or go to a foreign country and live there. For this reason I will go to some other region, as I no longer dare to live in this place, for I have done a great wrong to your child.

Rajan, one should abandon a bad wife, a bad son, a bad king, a bad friend, a bad alliance, and a bad country. One should not place any trust in a bad son, and what joy can one have in a bad wife? There can be no happiness in a bad kingdom, and in a bad country one cannot hope to obtain a livelihood. There can be no lasting companionship with a bad friend, for his attachment is very unreliable, and in a bad alliance, when there is no compulsion for it, there is disgrace. She is a wife indeed whose utterances are agreeable. He is a son who makes the father happy. He is a friend in whom one can trust. That certainly is one's country where one earns one's livelihood. He is a just ruler who does not oppress, who loves the poor and in whose territories there is no fear.

Wife, country, friends, son, kinsmen, and relatives—all these one can acquire if the king is accomplished and is virtuous. If the king is sinful, his subjects will meet with ruin as a result of his oppressions. The king is the root of one's triple aggregate—Dharma, Dana and Kama. He should carefully protect his subjects and take from them only a sixth share of their wealth, or else he is in truth a thief. The king who gives assurances of protection and does not fulfill them due to greed, takes upon himself the sins of all his subjects and ultimately sinks to hell, whereas he who protects all his subjects, is a universal benefactor.

Manu, the lord of all the creatures, has said that the king has seven attributes: he is Father, Mother, Guru, Protector, Fire, Vaisravana and Yama. One calls the king who shows compassion towards his people their father, and the subject who behaves falsely towards him will take birth in his next life as an animal or a bird. By nurturing them and caring for the poor, he becomes a mother to his people. When he destroys evil, he comes to be regarded as Fire; when he restrains the sinful, one calls him Yama; when he gives gifts of wealth to those who are dear to him one regards him as Kuvera, the granter of wishes; when he gives instruction in morality and dharma, he becomes the Guru; and when he exercises the duty of defending his subjects he becomes the Protector.

The king who gladdens the people of his cities and provinces by his achievements in observing dharma is never deprived of his kingdom. The king who knows how to honour his subjects never suffers misery, here or hereafter. The king whose subjects are always anxious or overburdened with taxes and evils of all kinds will be defeated at the hands of his enemies, while he whose subjects grow like a large lotus in a lake will obtain every reward here, and will ultimately be honoured in Swarga. Hostility with one more powerful is never applauded, O Rajan. The king who incurs the hostility of one more powerful than himself loses both kingdom and happiness."

Having said these words to Brahmadatta, the bird left for the place she had chosen. I have narrated to you O foremost of kings, the discourse between Brahmadatta and Pujani. What else do you want to hear?'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'When both dharma and men decay due to the gradual decline of the Yuga, and when robbers overrun the world, how then, O Pitamaha, should a king behave?'

Bhishma replies, 'I will tell you, O Bhaarata, the policy the king should adopt at such times of distress, and how he should conduct himself, casting off compassion. There is often told an old story of a conversation between Bharadwaja and Satrunjaya. King Satrunjaya, the Maharathi ruler of the Sauviras, went to Bharadwaja and asked the Rishi about the truths of the science of Artha: "How can one acquire an object? How again, when acquired, can it be increased? How, when increased, can it be protected? And how, when protected, should it be used?"

The Maharishi set out a reasoned explanation of the science of Artha. He said, "The king should always have the rod of Dandaneeti raised in his hand. He should strike everyone with awe and thus rule all creatures. He should display his prowess and make no mistakes himself, but use his eyes to mark the lapses of his foes. Learned men with knowledge of truth applaud Punishment, or Danda. Hence, one says that of the four requisites of governance, Conciliation, Gift, Disunion and Punishment, Danda is the greatest.

All who seek refuge perish when one destroys the foundation that ensures protection. If one cuts away the roots of a tree, how can the branches live? A wise king should cut away the very roots of his enemies, and then win them over and bring their allies and partisans under his control. When calamities occur, the king should lose no time, counsel wisely, display his prowess suitably, fight with ability and even retreat wisely. The king should exhibit humility in words, while at heart remaining sharp as a razor. He should give up kama and krodha and speak sweetly and mildly. When the occasion for a parley with an enemy comes, a king with foresight should make peace, but without blind trust. When the undertaking is over, he should quickly turn away from the new ally.

One should conciliate an enemy with sweet assurances as if he were a friend, but remain wary as though living in a room where there lurks a snake. He whose mind your intellect can dominate should be comforted by assurances given in the past, an evil one by promises of future benefit, and a wise man by present assistance. He who wants to achieve prosperity should join his hands together, make pledges, use sweet words, show reverence by bowing down his head, and shed tears. One should carry one's foe on one's shoulders so long as the time is unfavourable. Then, when the opportunity comes, one should shatter him like an earthen jar on a stone.

It is better, O Rajan, for a king to blaze up in a moment like a charcoal of ebony-wood rather than to smoulder and smoke like chaff for many years. One who has many purposes to serve should have no scruples dealing with even an ungrateful man. If one succeeds, one can enjoy happiness but, if unsuccessful, one loses esteem; therefore, while dealing with such men, one should always leave something unfinished.

A king should for his own good, imitate a cuckoo, a boar, the mountains of Meru, an empty chamber, an actor, and a devoted friend, He should diligently visit the homes of his enemies and, if calamities befall them, enquire about their well-being. Those who are idle will never be wealthy; nor will those who lack manliness and energy; nor those who are vain or fear unpopularity; nor those given to procrastination. The king should work in such a way that his enemy is unable to detect his shortcomings, while he can observe his enemy's weakness. He should imitate the tortoise who conceals its limbs and covers its own weakness. He should think of all matters connected with finance like a crane sitting patiently by the water's edge for hours together waiting for fish. He should demonstrate his skill like a lion. He should lie in wait like a wolf, and fall upon and strike his foes directly like an arrow.

He should be judicious in enjoying drink, dice, women, hunting and music, as addiction to these will produce evil. He should make bows with bamboos and such; he should sleep cautiously like the deer, and seem blind or deaf when necessary. A wise king should show his prowess according to time and place, for if these are not favourable, all his skills will be futile. He should get down to work marking the timeliness of his action, reflect upon his own strength and weakness and improve his own strength in comparison to that of the enemy. The king who does not crush a foe defeated by military force provides for his own death like the crab when she conceives. A tree with beautiful blossoms may not be strong; one bearing fruits may be difficult to climb; and sometimes a tree with unripe fruits may appear like one with ripe fruits. These facts should not depress a king, for if he conducts himself as explained above, he will succeed against all foes.

The king should first strengthen the hopes of those who approach him as supplicants and then put obstacles in the way of their fulfillment. He should represent these obstacles as rare and the circumstances as the results of grave causes. As long as the occasion for fear does not actually occur, the king should make all his arrangements like one who is nervous. When the occasion for fear actually comes, he should strike fearlessly. No man can reap benefits without incurring danger. If he succeeds in preserving his life amidst peril, he is sure to earn great rewards.

A king should ascertain all future dangers when they are present and overcome them before they grow further; he should, even after vanquishing them, consider them unconquered. The abandonment of present happiness and the pursuit of future happiness is never the policy of an intelligent man. The king who, having made peace with an enemy, sleeps happily in tranquility, is like a man sleeping on the top of a tree who awakes only after a fall. When one lapses into difficulties, one should raise oneself by every means in one's power, mild or strong, and practise dharma only after one has recovered.

The king should always honour the foes of his enemies. He should employ as his own spies agents employed by his foes and ensure that his enemies do not discover them. He should use atheists and ascetics as spies and send them into his enemy's territories. Sinful thieves who offend the laws of dharma and who are thorns in the side of everyone enter gardens, places of amusement, places set up for giving drinking water to thirsty travelers, public inns, drinking spots, houses of ill fame, holy places and public assemblies. You should recognise them, arrest them and put them down. The king should not trust one who does not deserve to be trusted, nor should he trust too much one who deserves trust, for danger springs from trust. No one should be trusted without prior scrutiny.

Having by persuasive methods created confidence in the enemy, the king should smite him when he makes a false step. The king should fear him who is without fear, and also those who should be feared. Fear that comes from a quarter one did not suspect can lead to total extermination. By attention, by taciturnity, by wearing the reddish garb, matted locks and skins of ascetics, one should lull one's enemy into confidence and then, when the opportunity comes, spring upon him like a wolf. A king who wants prosperity should not scruple to slay son, brother, father or friend, if any of them tries to thwart his plans. One's very guru deserves to be punished, if he happens to be arrogant, ignorant of what should be done and what should not, and one who treads the path of adharma.

Just as certain insects with their sharp mandibles can cut off all flowers and fruits of the trees on which they sit, the king should deceive his enemy with welcome, honours and gifts and then attack him and take everything from him. One cannot acquire great prosperity without stabbing the very vitals of others, without accomplishing many grim deeds and without slaughtering living creatures like a fisherman. There are no separate species of creatures called enemies or friends; they become that from force of circumstance.

The king should never be moved to allow his foe to escape, even if they plead piteously, as it is his dharma to destroy any who have done him an injury. A king who wants prosperity should take care to win over to himself as many men as he can, doing good to them. He should remain free from malice while dealing with his subjects, but judiciously control and punish the evil and disobedient. After seizing wealth he should say placating words. After striking off someone's head, he should grieve and shed tears. A king who wants to prosper should draw others to himself and bind them to his service by means of sweet words, honours and gifts. He should never engage in fruitless disputes or cross a river with the aid of his own two arms. To eat cow-horns is futile and not invigorating, for their taste is not pleasing and they break one's teeth.

The triple aggregate of dharma, artha and kama has three disadvantages, with three inseparable adjuncts. Pursuit of dharma stands as an impediment in the way of artha; artha stands in the way of dharma; and kama stands in the way of both. Carefully consider these adjuncts, and avoid the disadvantages. The unpaid balance of a debt, the unextinguished remnant of a fire, and un-slain enemies: these grow and increase, and should therefore be completely put out and exterminated. Debt that grows, defeated foes and neglected ailments are certain to remain, unless totally eradicated, and will lead to a rout. All work should be done thoroughly and carefully, for even a minute thing like a thorn, if extracted clumsily, can lead to incurable gangrene.

A king should destroy a hostile kingdom by slaughtering its population, by tearing up roads and otherwise damaging them, and by burning and pulling down its houses. He should be far-sighted like a vulture, motionless like a crane, vigilant like a dog, valiant like a lion, wary like a crow, and like a snake sneak into the territories of his foes with ease and unconcern. A king should win over a hero by joining his palms, a coward by filling him with fear, and a covetous man by gifts of wealth, while, with an equal he should wage war. He should be alert to any opportunity to produce disunion among leaders of different sects and to conciliate those among them who are dear to him. He should protect his ministers from disunion and destruction.

If the king becomes mild, the people ignore him, but if he becomes stern, the people feel it as hardship. The rule is that he should be stern or mild as the occasion requires. He should treat the mild with mildness, and that may even destroy the fierce, for there is nothing that mildness cannot achieve. For this reason, one says that mildness is more effective than fierceness. The king, who is mild when the occasion requires mildness and stern when sternness is required, will accomplish all his objectives and defeat his foes.

Having incurred the animosity of a knowledgeable and wise man, one should not draw comfort from the conviction that one is at a distance from him. The arms of an intelligent injured man who seeks revenge, reach far. One should not try to cross what cannot really be traversed or snatch from an enemy something he will be able to recover, or dig for something that one will not succeed in unearthing. One should never strike someone whose head one cannot cut off. In times of trouble a king should follow this course of conduct that I have laid down. I have said all this for your own good and to instruct you on how you should bear yourself when enemies attack."

The king of the Sauviras listened to these words of the Brahmana who had spoken out of a desire to do him good, obeyed them cheerfully and as a result he, his kinsmen and friends obtained great prosperity.'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'When Mahadharma decays and all disobey it, when dharma assumes a reverse form and becomes adharma; when all good restraints disappear, and all truths in respect of dharma are challenged and disputed; when kings and robbers oppress people; when men of all the four varnashramas become confused about their duties and all actions lose their merit; when, as a result of kama, lobha and ahankara, men have cause for fear from every direction; when all cease to trust one another, when they kill one another treacherously and deceive one another in their mutual dealings; when houses are burned down throughout the land; when the Brahmanas suffer; when the clouds do not bring a drop of rain; when everyone's hand is turned against his neighbor; when all the necessities of life fall under the control of robbers; when such a time of terrible distress sets in, by what means should a Brahmana maintain himself who is unwilling to give up compassion and his children? Tell me this, O Pitamaha. When sinfulness sweeps over the world, O Parantapa, how should the king live so that he will not stray from both dharma and artha?'

Bhishma replies, 'O Mahabaho, the peace and prosperity of subjects, sufficient and seasonal rain, disease, death and other fears, all depend on the king. I have no doubt, O Bharatarishabha, that the setting in of Krita, Treta, Dwapara and Kali yugas depend on the king's conduct. When such a season of misery as you describe sets in, the righteous should support life by their own judgment.

In this connection, a story has been told of the conversation between Viswamitra and a Chandala in a hamlet inhabited by Chandalas. Towards the end of Treta and the beginning of Dwapara yugas, a frightful drought extending over twelve years occurred, as intended by the Devas. At the end of Treta yuga and the commencement of Dwapara yuga, when the time came for many creatures to die of old age, Indra, the thousand-eyed deity of Swarga, sent no rain. The planet Brihaspati began to move in a retrograde course and Soma, abandoning his own orbit, receded towards the south. Not even a dew-drop could be seen, let alone clouds gathering together. The rivers all shrank into narrow rivulets, and as the Devas ordained, lakes, wells and springs everywhere lost their beauty and disappeared.

Water having become scarce, the places set up by charity for thirsty travellers became desolate. The Brahmanas abstained from sacrifices and recitation of the Vedas. They no longer uttered Vashats or performed propitiatory rites. Agriculture and cattle rearing were given up, markets and shops were abandoned and stakes for tethering sacrificial animals disappeared. People no longer collected articles for sacrifices, and all festivals and amusements perished. Heaps of bones lay scattered around and the air was filled with the shrill cries and yells of ferocious creatures. Cities and towns became empty of inhabitants. Villages and hamlets were burnt down. Some people were assailed by robbers, some by weapons, some by evil kings, and all began to flee in fear of one another. Temples and places of worship became desolate. The aged were forcibly turned out of their houses, and cattle—goats, sheep and buffaloes—fought for food and perished in large numbers. Brahmanas began to die on all sides, protection came to an end, and herbs and plants dried up. The earth, shorn of all her beauty, became ghastly and dreadful, like trees in a crematorium.

In that period of terror, when dharma was nowhere, O Yudhishtira, starving men lost their senses and began to eat one another. The very Rishis gave up their vows, abandoned their fires and deities, forsook vanavasa and began to wander about in search of food. The holy and wise Maharishi Viswamitra, leaving his wife and son in a place of shelter and abandoning his homa fire, wandered homeless and hungry, unmindful of clean and unclean food.

One day he came upon a hamlet in the midst of a vana, inhabited by savage hunters engaged in the slaughter of living creatures. The village abounded with broken earthen jars and pots, and dog-skins lay scattered around. Bones and skulls of boars and asses were heaped up, clothes stripped from the dead lay strewn around, and huts were decorated with withered garlands and filled with sloughed-off snakeskins. The loud crowing of cocks and the dissonant bray of asses filled the air, while the inhabitants of the village disputed with one another harshly in discordant voices. Temples of Devas bearing images of owls and other birds resounded with the clang of iron bells, and packs of dogs lolled about.

Maharishi Viswamitra, moved by the pangs of hunger, entered the Chandalas' village in search of food and tried his best to find something to eat. Though he begged and begged, he failed to obtain meat, rice, fruit, root or any other kind of food. At last he exclaimed, "Alas, what misery has overtaken me!" and collapsed from weakness.

The sage began to reflect and asked himself, "What is best for me to do now?" The one thought that seized him was how to avoid immediate death. He found spread on the floor of a Chandala's hut a large piece of flesh, of a recently-killed dog. The sage reflected and decided to steal that meat, saying to himself, "When there is no other means to stay alive, theft is permitted, even for eminent men, and it will not detract from their fame. It is certain that, to save his life, even a Brahmana can do it. One should steal first from a low person, failing which one can steal from one's equal, or from even an eminent Dharmatman. Therefore at this time, when my life itself is ebbing away, I will steal this haunch of dog's meat. I see nothing wrong in such theft."

Maharishi Viswamitra resolved to do so, and lay down to sleep where the Chandalas lived. When the night had advanced and the whole Chandala village had fallen asleep, the holy Viswamitra stealthily got up and entered the hut. The Chandala who owned it, an ugly man with phlegm-covered eyes, was lying like one asleep. He called out in a hoarse and dissonant voice, "Who is undoing the latch? The village is asleep but I am awake. Whoever you are, you are about to die."

Filled with fear at these harsh words, his heart palpitating and his face crimson with shame at the attempted theft, the sage answered, "O you blessed with a long life, I am Viswamitra. I have come here oppressed by the pangs of hunger. Do not slay me, O you of righteous understanding, if your sight is clear."

Hearing these words of the Maharishi, the Chandala rose up in terror from his bed and approached him. Joining his palms reverently, his eyes bathed in tears, he asked Kusika's son, "What are you doing here in the night, Brahmana?"

To conciliate the Chandala, Viswamitra said, "Famished as I am and about to die of starvation, I want to take that haunch of dog's meat. It is hunger that is urging me to this misdeed and it has made me sinful and shameless. My life-breath is fading, and hunger has destroyed my Vedic learning. I have lost my senses through weakness and have no scruple left about clean or unclean food. Although I know it is sinful, I still wish to take away that haunch of dog's meat. I wandered from house to house in your hamlet, and when I failed to obtain any alms, I decided upon this misdeed. Fire is the mouth of the Devas and is also their priest, and should take nothing that is not pure and clean. At times, however, the great Agni Deva becomes a consumer of everything. Understand that I have now in that respect become just like him."

The Chandala answered, "O Maharishi, listen to my words of truth about your duty and act so that your punya is not destroyed. The wise say that a dog is less clean than a jackal, and that the haunch of a dog is a much worse part of his body than any other. You have not discerned this, Maharishi, for this theft of unclean food belonging to a Chandala is inconsistent with dharma. You are blessed, look for some other means for preserving your life and let not your tapasyas suffer destruction as a result of your craving for dog's meat. Knowing the duties that the shastras have laid down, you should not do something that will result in confusion in your dharma. Do not cast off dharma, for you are its greatest observer."

Thus addressed, O Bharatarishabha, the famished Maharishi Viswamitra once more said, "It has been a long time since I ate anything, and I do not see any other means of staying alive. When one is facing death, one should preserve one's life by any means in one's power, not enquire into their character. Later, when one is able, one should seek to acquire punya. Kshatriyas should observe the practices of Indra, while it is the duty of Brahmanas to behave like Agni.

The Vedas are fire and, since they constitute my strength, I will eat even this unclean food to appease my hunger. That which preserves life should certainly be done without scruple, for life is better than death and, as long as there is life, one can acquire dharma. I am ready to eat this to save my life, knowing that this food is impure. Give me your permission. If I survive, I will acquire dharma and, by penances and knowledge, wipe out the abomination of my present conduct, like the light of the firmament that can banish even the densest darkness."

The Chandala said, "By eating this food, someone like you cannot obtain long life, for it can neither give you strength nor the gratification offered by ambrosia. Pray seek some other kind of alms, and not this dog's meat which is defiled food for Munis."

Viswamitra replied, "During a famine like this, any other kind of meat cannot be easily obtained. Besides, O Chandala, I have no means to buy food, and I am ravenous. I can no longer move and am without any hope. I believe that in that piece of dog's meat I will find all the six kinds of taste."

The Chandala said, "The shastras prescribe only five kinds of five-clawed animals as clean food for Brahmanas, Kshatriyas and Vaisyas. Do not hunger for this unclean food."

Viswamitra said, "The great Rishi Agastya, when hungry, ate the Asura Vatapi. I am in distress, I am hungry, and I will therefore eat that haunch of dog's meat."

The Chandala said, "Ask for some other alms, as it does not become you ever to do such a thing. If, however, it pleases you, you can take this piece of dog's meat."

Viswamitra said, "Those whom you call good are authorities on matters of duty. I am following their example. I now regard this dog's haunch to be better food than anything that is highly pure."

The Chandala said, "One can never regard the action of an adharmic person as an eternal practice. What is improper can never become proper. Do not deceive yourself into committing a sinful deed."

Viswamitra replied, "A Rishi cannot do anything sinful. In the present case, the deer and the dog to me are the same, both animals. I will, therefore, eat this dog's haunch."

The Chandala said, "In the case of the Rishi Agastya, he did as the Brahmanas requested him. Under those circumstances it could not be a sin. That in which there is no sin is dharma. Besides, one should by all means protect and preserve Brahmanas, who are the gurus of three other varnas."

Viswamitra said, "I am a Brahmana and my body is a very dear friend, worthy of the highest reverence from me. It is to sustain this body that I wish to take away that dog's haunch. So eager have I become that I no longer have any fear of you or your fierce brethren."

The Chandala said, “Men lay down their lives rather than eat impure food. They realise all their desires by conquering hunger. You too must conquer your craving and obtain those rewards.”

Viswamitra said, “I observe strict vows and my heart is set on peace. To preserve the root of all religious punya, I will eat food that is unclean. It is evident that one would regard such an action as righteous in a Rishi, while to someone of unclean soul the eating of dog’s flesh would appear sacreligious. Even if the conclusion at which I have arrived is wrong, and if I eat this dog’s meat I will not, as a result, become like you.”

The Chandala said, “I have decided that I must try my best to restrain you from this offence. A Brahmana by evil karma falls from his high state. It is for this that I am reproving you.”

Viswamitra retorted, “Cattle continue to drink, regardless of the croaking of the frogs. You can claim no knowledge about what is dharma and what is not, so don’t think too highly of yourself.”

The Chandala replied, “I am preaching to you only because I have become your friend. Do whatever is beneficial, do not be tempted into doing anything wicked.”

Viswamitra said, “If you are a friend who wishes my happiness, help me from this misery. If you willingly give me this dog’s haunch, I can consider myself saved by the aid of dharma and not by sin.”

The Chandala said, ‘I dare not gift you with this piece of meat, nor can I quietly suffer the theft of my own food. If I give you this meat and if you, a Brahmana, take it, both of us will sink into regions of sorrow in the next world.”

Viswamitra said, “If I commit this sinful deed today, I will certainly save my life which is sacred. After I save my life, I will practice dharma and cleanse my soul. Tell me which of these two is preferable, to die without food, or save my life by taking this food that is impure.”

The Chandala said: “In duties concerning one’s varna or varnasrama, one is the best judge of propriety or impropriety. You know which of these two actions is sinful. I think that he who would regard dog’s meat as clean food, would in matters of food abstain from nothing!”

Viswamitra replied, ‘In accepting an unclean gift, or in eating unclean food, there is sin. When, however, one’s life is in danger, there is no sin in accepting such a present or eating such food. Besides, the eating of impure food that is not accompanied by slaughter and deception, is not a matter of much consequence, and will provoke only mild censure."

The Chandala said, "If this is your argument for eating unclean food, it is clear that you do not respect the morality of the Vedas and Arya. You have taught me by your example, O greatest of Brahmanas, that it is not a sin to disregard the distinction between food that is clean and unclean."

Viswamitra said, "It is not that a man incurs a grave sin by eating forbidden food. The precept that one becomes degraded by drinking wine is only in order to restrain men. Other strictures of the same type, whatever they be, in fact every sin, cannot destroy one's punya."

The Chandala said, "The learned man who takes dog's meat from an unworthy place, from an unclean wretch, from one who leads an evil life, commits an action contrary to that one calls good. As a result, he is certain to suffer the pangs of repentance."

The Chandala, having said these words to Kusika's son, fell silent. The wise Viswamitra, to save his life, then took away that haunch of dog's meat to the woods to eat with his wife. He resolved that he would first gratify the deities according to due rites and then eat the meat at his pleasure.

Lighting a fire according to the Brahma rites, the Maharishi began to cook the meat into sacrificial Charu, as the Aindragneya rites prescribe. He then began the ceremonies in honour of the Devas and the Pitris, O Bhaarata, divided the Charu into as many portions as were necessary according to the injunctions of the shastras, and invoked the Devas, with Indra at their head, to accept their shares.

Meanwhile, the chief of the celestials caused heavy rain to fall. The showers revived all the creatures and caused plants and herbs to grow once more. Viswamitra completed the rites in honour of the Devas and the Pitris and, having duly gratified them, ate the meat. Burning away all his sins later by his penances, the sage, after a long time, acquired the most wonderful ascetic success.

Even so should a Mahatman proceed who is knowledgeable and can devise means to preserve his own life when in trouble. By using his understanding thus, a man should survive to win punya and enjoy happiness and prosperity. For this reason, O son of Kunti, a learned man of cleansed soul should live and work in this world, relying upon his own intelligence to discriminate between dharma and adharma.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'If something so horrible can be commended that, like falsehood, should be held in aversion, then from what deeds should I desist? Why then shouldn't robbers be respected? I am stunned, my heart is sore, all the ties that bind me to dharma are loosened! I cannot calm my mind and venture to act as you suggest.'

Bhishma says, 'I am not instructing you about duty that I have learned from the Vedas alone. What I have told you is the result of wisdom and experience, the honey that the learned have gathered. Kings should gather wisdom from various sources. One cannot make his course through the world with the aid of a dharma that is one-sided. Duty must spring from understanding and from discovering the practices of those who are good, O son of Kuru. Attend to my words. Only kings who have superior intelligence can rule and expect victory. A weak-minded king can never display wisdom if he has not drawn any from the examples before him.

Dharma sometimes takes the shape of adharma, and vice versa. He who does not know this is baffled when confronted by an actual instance of the kind. Before the occasion arises, O Bhaarata, one should understand the circumstances under which dharma and its reverse become confused. Having acquired this knowledge, a wise king should act according to his judgment when the occasion comes. Ordinary people misunderstand what he does at such a time. Some possess true knowledge. Some have false knowledge. Truly ascertaining the nature of each kind of knowledge, a wise king derives understanding from those who are good.

Those who are breakers of dharma find fault with the shastras. Those who have no wealth find inconsistencies in the treatises on gaining wealth. Those who seek knowledge only for their livelihood, Rajan, are sinful, enemies of dharma. Evil men of immature understanding can never truly comprehend things, just as men who do not know the shastras are unable to be guided in all their actions by reason. They can only see the faults of the shastras and criticize them. Even if they understand the true meaning of the shastras, they will still proclaim that scriptural injunctions are unsound. Such men proclaim the superiority of their own knowledge by decrying the knowledge of others. They use words as weapons and arrows and speak as if they were real masters of their sciences. They are traders in learning and Rakshasas among men. Through such pretexts they abandon the dharma that good and wise men have established.

We hear that the contents of dharma are not to be understood by either discussion or one's own intelligence. Indra himself says that this is the opinion of the sage Brihaspati. Some are of the opinion that no text in the shastras has been laid down without a reason. Many, even if they properly understand the shastras, never act according to them. A class of wise men declares that dharma is nothing else but the approved course of the world. The man of true knowledge should find out for himself the dharma laid down for the good. If even a wise man speaks of morality under the influence of anger, confusion of understanding or ignorance, his efforts are in vain.

Discourses on morality are worthy of praise when made with the aid of an intelligence derived from the true letter and spirit of the shastras, not those made with the help of anything else. Even words from an ignorant man, if they carry sense, can be considered pious and wise. In olden days, Usanas revealed this incontrovertible truth to the Daityas, that shastras are not shastras if they cannot stand the test of reason. The possession or absence of knowledge that is mixed with doubts is the same thing. You should get rid of such knowledge, tearing it up from the roots. You should regard one who does not listen to my words as someone who has allowed himself to be misled.

Do you not see that you were created for the accomplishment of bold deeds? Look at me, dear child, how by performing the dharma of my varna, I have dispatched innumerable Kshatriyas to Swarga! There are some who are not pleased with me for this. Brahma created the goat, the horse and the Kshatriya for the same purpose, to be useful. A Kshatriya therefore, should always seek the happiness of all creatures. The sin that attaches to killing a man who should not be killed is equal to that which is incurred by not killing one who deserves to be killed. This is the established order of things which a weak-minded king does not observes.

Therefore, a king should be severe in making all his subjects observe their respective duties. If this is not done, they will prowl like wolves, devouring one another. He is a wretch among Kshatriyas in whose territories robbers go about plundering the property of other people, like crows taking little fishes from water. Appoint high-born men who have Vedic knowledge as your ministers, govern the earth and protect your subjects righteously. The Kshatriya who is ignorant of customs and traditions and levies taxes upon his people improperly is a eunuch of his varna.

A king should be neither severe nor mild, and deserves praise if he rules righteously. He should be severe on occasions demanding severity, and mild when it is necessary to be so. Painful is the observance of Kshatriya dharma. Therefore, rule your kingdom as you are created for the accomplishment of great deeds and I have great love for you. The percipient Sakra has said that in times of distress the great duty of a king is to punish the evil and to protect the good.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, Pitamaha, if there is any rule regarding Rajadharma which should under no circumstances be violated.'

Bhishma replies, 'One should always worship the Brahmanas venerated for their learning, devoted to penances and rich in conduct conformable to the injunctions of the Vedas. This indeed, is a great and sacred duty. Let your conduct towards the Brahmanas always be that which you observe towards Devas. The Brahmanas, if enraged, can inflict diverse kinds of wrong, O Rajan. If they are gratified, great fame will be yours. Satisfied, the Brahmanas are like nectar, and enraged, they are like poison.'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'O wise Pitamaha who knows all the shastras, tell me, what is the punya earned by one who shelters a petitioner seeking protection?'

Bhishma replies, 'It is worthy of you to ask such a question, for great is the punya, O Rajan, in cherishing such supplicants. Protecting such people, mahatmas of old, king Sivi and others, attained great happiness in Swarga. One hears of a pigeon who, in accordance with due rites, even fed his own flesh to an enemy who came as a supplicant.'

Yudhishtira says, 'How did this pigeon of old feed a foe with his own flesh, and what did he win in the end by such conduct?'

Bhishma says, 'Listen then, Rajan, to this excellent story that cleanses the listener of every sin. This very question, O son of Pritha, had been humbly put to Bhrigu's son Rama by Muchkunda, and to him the sage narrated the tale of how a pigeon won prosperity.

The sage said, "O Mahabaho Rajan, I will narrate to you a story about the truth connected with dharma artha and kama. A wicked fowler who resembled Yama the Destroyer himself used to wander through the great vana in the olden days. He was black as a raven, with bloodshot eyes, long legs, short feet, a large mouth and bulging cheeks. He had no friend, relative or kinsman, since all had cast him off for the exceedingly cruel life he led. Indeed, the wise should renounce from a distance a man of evil conduct, for he who injures himself cannot be expected to do good to others. The heinous men who take the lives of other creatures are like poisonous snakes, a source of trouble to all creatures.

He went to the woods with his nets to trap birds and sell their meat, never understanding what a sinful life it was that he led. The evil wretch, stupefied by destiny, and preferring no other profession, lived in the forest for many long years in this manner with his wife, One day, as he was wandering through the vana intent on his business, a great storm arose that tossed the trees and seemed about to uproot them. In a moment dense clouds covered the sky, lit with flashes of lightning like a sea covered with merchants' boats and vessels. Then Indra Deva entered the cloud and in a moment the earth was flooded with torrential rain submerging all the forest paths.

The fowler, crazed with fear and trembling with cold, roved the vana looking for high ground but failed to find any. The force of the cloudburst had thrown down and killed many birds. Lions, bears and other animals, had taken shelter in whatever high ground they could find. Fear filled all the denizens of the forest because of that terrifying storm and, frightened and hungry, they roamed through the woods in packs small and large. The fowler, however, his limbs stiffened by cold, could neither stop where he was nor move on.

While in this state, he spied a she-pigeon lying on the ground, stiffened with cold. Though in the same predicament, the sinful wretch, through force of habit, picked her up and put her in a cage. Even when he himself was in trouble, he had no scruple in harming a fellow-creature. He then saw in the midst of that forest a lordly tree, blue as the clouds, the resort of a myriad birds seeking shade and shelter. It seemed that the Creator placed it there for the benefit of all creatures, like a good man in the world.

Soon the sky cleared and became spangled with hundreds of stars, like a magnificent lake smiling with blooming lilies. Turning his gaze up to the firmament rich with stars and clear of clouds, the fowler advanced, trembling with cold. Seeing that darkness had already fallen, and realizing that his home lay a great distance away, he resolved to pass the night under the shade of that tree. Bowing down to it with joined hands, he addressed that monarch of the forest, saying, 'I ask all the deities that have this tree for their resort to grant me shelter.' He then spread some leaves on the ground for a bed, and lay down, resting his head on a stone. Though overwhelmed with affliction, the man soon fell asleep."""

"Bhishma says, 'In one of the branches of that tree, O Rajan, a pigeon with beautiful feathers lived for many years with his family. That morning his wife had gone out in search of food but had not returned. Disturbed that the night had come and his wife had not yet come back, the bird began to lament: "Ah, what a huge storm and harrowing downpour we have had today! Alas, you have not yet returned, dear wife! Why has she has not yet come back to us? Is everything right with my beloved spouse in the vana? Without her, my home seems empty! A householder's home, even if filled with sons and grandsons and daughters-in-law and servants, is empty without the housewife. One's house is not one's home; only one's wife is one's home. A house without the wife is a desolate wilderness.

If my dear wife of eyes fringed with red, of multicolored plumes and sweet voice, does not come back today, my life itself will become worthless. Of excellent vows, she never eats before I eat, never bathes before I bathe, never sits before I sit down, and never lies down before I lie down. She rejoices when I rejoice, and grieves when I am sad. When I am away she is downcast, and even when I am angry she continues to speak sweetly. Ever devoted to her lord and ever relying upon her husband, she always does what is agreeable and beneficial for him. Worthy of praise is he on earth who has such a spouse! That amiable creature knows that I am fatigued and hungry. Devoted to me and constant in her love, my celebrated spouse is surpassingly sweet-tempered and worships me ardently.

Even the foot of a tree is one’s home if one lives there in the company of one’s spouse; without her, even a palace is veritably a desolate wilderness. One’s spouse is one’s associate in all one’s deeds of dharma, artha and kama. When one sets out for a strange land, one’s wife is one’s trusted companion. One says that the wife is the richest possession of her husband. In this world the wife is one’s only associate in all the concerns of life, the best of medicines that one can have in sickness and sorrow. There is no friend like her. There is no refuge better than her. There is no better ally in the world than her in work undertaken for the acquisition of punya. He, who does not have in his home a wife who is chaste and of agreeable speech, should go to the vana. For such a man there is no difference between home and wilderness.”””

"Bhishma says, 'Hearing these piteous lamentations of the pigeon on the tree, the she-pigeon that the fowler seized began to say to herself, "Whether I have any merit or not, truly there is no limit to my good fortune when my dear lord speaks thus of me. She is no wife with whom her lord is not content. In the case of women, if they gratify their lords, all the deities are also pleased. Since the marriage union takes place in the presence of fire, the husband is the wife's greatest deity. The wife with whom her husband is not pleased gets reduced to ashes, like a flowering creeper in a forest fire."

Having reflected thus, the kind she-pigeon, overcome with sorrow, and casting her eyes upon her lord from inside the cage where the fowler had imprisoned her, said to her grief-stricken husband, "Listen while I tell you how you can rescue me. This fowler lies here by your home, stricken with cold and hunger. Do him the duties of hospitality. The sin that one commits by Brahmahatya or by slaying a cow, the mother of the world, is equal to that which one incurs by allowing a supplicant to perish for want of help. You possess knowledge of self; therefore, follow the course that our swadharma has ordained for us. We have heard that the householder who practises dharma according to his abilities wins inexhaustible regions of bliss hereafter. You have sons and progeny; therefore do not be concerned about your own body and, for the sake of winning dharma and artha, offer worship to this fowler so that his heart will be pleased. Do not, O bird, indulge in any grief on my account. You may continue to live, taking other wives!" So said the amiable she-bird, overcome with sorrow, gazing at her husband from within the fowler's cage where she had been immured.'"

"Bhishma says, 'Hearing his wife's words, full of morality and reason, the pigeon was thrilled, and his eyes filled with tears of joy. He then, according to the rites laid down in the shastras, scrupulously honoured the fowler whose avocation was the slaughter of birds.

He addressed the fowler, "You are welcome today. Tell me what I can do for you. This is your home, so tell me your pleasure and what I can do for you. Do not fret. I ask you out of regard, for you have solicited shelter at our hands, and hospitality should be shown even to one's foe. Like the tree, which does not withdraw its shade even from one who approaches to cut it down, one should faithfully carry out the duties of hospitality to those who need shelter. Indeed, one is especially bound to do so if one happens to be a grihasta, leading a life of domesticity consisting of the five sacrifices. According to the shastras, if one blunders in performing the five sacrifices, he loses both this world and the next. Tell me then clearly and confidently what your wishes are, and I will accomplish them all."

The fowler replied, "I am stiff with cold. Let provision be made to warm me."

The bird gathered together a number of dry leaves on the ground and, taking a single leaf in his beak, speedily went to a spot where fire was kept, and returned with a little cinder. He then set fire to the dry leaves and, when they leapt into vigorous flames, invited his guest, "Come and warm your limbs trustfully and without fear." The fowler said, "Tathaasthu," and set to warm himself. Recovering, he demanded of his winged host, “I am hungry. I want you to give me some food.”

The bird said, “I have no means to appease your hunger. We denizens of the woods always live upon what we get every day. Like the Munis of the vana we never hoard for the morrow.” Mentally deploring this method of living, the bird grew pale with shame and began to reflect silently on what he should do. Soon, however, his mind became clear. Addressing the slaughterer of his species, the bird said, “I will gratify you. Wait for a moment.”

He stoked the fire with the some dry leaves and, filled with joy, said to the fowler, “I heard in former days from Maharishis, Devas and Pitris that there is great punya in honouring a guest. O amiable one, be kind to me. I tell you truly that my heart is set upon gratifying you, my guest.” Having formed his resolution, the high-souled bird thrice circumambulated the fire with a smiling face and plunged into it directly. Seeing the bird enter the flames, the fowler began to upbraid himself, “Oh, what have I done! Alas, dark and terrible will be my sin, without doubt, as a result of my own deeds! I am exceedingly cruel and worthy of reproof!” Indeed, observing the bird lay down his life, the fowler, filled with remorse for his own actions, began to lament like you.’”

"Bhishma says, 'The fowler, seeing the pigeon cast himself into the fire, was filled with compassion and began to reproach himself, "Alas, cruel and senseless that I am, what have I done! I am certainly a mean wretch! Great will be my sin for everlasting years!'

He went on repeating, "I am unworthy of any punya. My understanding is perverse, and I am sinful in all I do. Alas, I am a cruel wretch for discarding any kinds of honourable occupation and becoming a fowler. This high-souled pigeon, by laying down his own life, has taught me a grave lesson. Abandoning wives and sons, I will certainly give up this life that I held so dear. From this day, denying every comfort to my body, I will wear it out like a shallow tank in the season of summer. I will suffer hunger, thirst and penances and, reduced to emaciation, covered all over with visible veins, I will, by diverse methods practise such vows so as to be in touch with the other world. By giving up his body, the pigeon has shown the worship that one should pay to an atithi. From now on I will follow dharma —the highest refuge. Indeed, I will practise such dharma as the righteous pigeon, the greatest of all winged creatures, has shown me."

Having formed this resolution and said these words, the fowler, once a man of fierce deeds, proceeded to make a Mahaprasthana—a tour of the world from where there is no return, observing the most rigid vows. He threw away his stout staff, his sharp-pointed iron-stick, his nets, snares and his iron cage, and set at liberty the she-pigeon that he had captured.'"

"Bhishma says, 'After the fowler had left, the she-pigeon, grieving for her husband, wept copiously and lamented, "I cannot, O dear lord, recollect a single instance of you having done me an injury! A widow, even if mother of many children, is still miserable without a husband, for she becomes helpless and an object of pity with her friends. You always cherished and honoured me with sweet, pleasant, charming and delightful words. I sported with you in valleys, in springs and on delightful tree-tops. You made me happy when we wandered through the skies but, dear lord, where are those joys now?

Limited are the gifts of a father, a brother and a son. The gifts that her husband alone makes to her are unlimited. Which woman would not, therefore, adore her lord? A woman has no protector like her lord, and no happiness like her lord. Abandoning all her wealth and possessions, a woman should take to her lord as her only refuge. Life here is of no use to me, now that I am separated from you. What chaste woman would venture to bear the burden of life when deprived of her lord?"

Filled with sorrow and lamenting piteously, the she-pigeon, devoted to her lord, threw herself onto the blazing fire. She saw her dead husband, adorned with bracelets, seated on a celestial carriage, adored by many Mahatmans and meritorious beings standing around him. Indeed, there he was in the firmament, decked with fine garlands, attired in splendid robes and adorned with every ornament. Around him were innumerable divine chariots ridden by beings who had acted meritoriously while in this world.

Seated on his own carriage, the bird ascended to heaven and, obtaining honours for his deeds in this world, continued to sport joyfully in the company of his wife.'"

"Bhishma says, 'The fowler, O Rajan, was filled with sorrow at the sight of that pair of pigeons seated on their heavenly chariot and at his own misfortune, and began to reflect on how he could achieve the same consummation. He resolved to himself, "By austerities like those of the pigeon, I must attain just such a high end!" The fowler, who had lived by the slaughter of birds, set out on a journey without return. Living upon air alone, without any exertion, he cast off all desires in order to acquire Swarga.

After he had walked for some distance, he saw an extensive and delightful lake full of cool and pure water, blooming with lotuses and teeming with diverse waterfowl. The very sight of such a lake would slake the thirst of a man. The fowler, emaciated with fasts, without even glancing at the lake, gladly entered a vana he saw to be large and inhabited by beasts of prey. He wandered lacerated by prickles and pointed thorns and covered all over with blood, in that forest devoid of men but abounding with animals of diverse species. Some time later, a powerful wind caused a forest fire to break out from friction between mighty trees. The raging element, splendid as if it had been the end of the Yuga, began to consume that large forest of tall trees, thick bushes and creepers. With flames fanned by the wind and myriads of sparks flying about in all directions, the all-consuming deity began to burn that dense forest abounding with birds and beasts. The fowler, ready to die, ran with glad heart into the spreading conflagration and, consumed by fire, was cleansed of all his sins. The fever of his heart dispelled, he beheld himself at last in heaven, shining in splendour like Indra in the midst of Yakshas, Gandharvas and men crowned with ascetic success.

Thus did the pigeon and his devoted spouse, along with the fowler, ascend to heaven for their meritorious deeds. The woman who follows her husband thus speedily ascends to heaven and shines there in splendour, like the she-pigeon of whom I have spoken.

This is the old story of the high-souled fowler and the pigeon and how they earned a highly meritorious end by their dharmic deeds. No evil befalls one who listens to this story or recites it daily, even if error invades his mind. O Yudhisthira, foremost of righteous persons, the protection of a supplicant is truly meritorious. Even the slayer of a cow, by practising this duty, maybe cleansed of sin, but one who slays a supplicant will never be purified. By listening to this sacred and sin-cleansing story, one becomes freed from distress and attains Swarga.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, Bhaaratottama, when a man lacking judgment commits sin, how can he be purified?'

Bhishma replies, 'Let me narrate to you the old story, much-lauded by the Rishis, of what the Muni Indrota, the son of Sunaka, advised the valiant king Janamejaya. There was in days of yore a king of great energy called Janamejaya, the son of Parikshit. That lord of earth, Janamejaya, once from lack of judgment slew a Brahmana. At this, all the Brahmanas, together with his priests, abandoned him. Deserted by his subjects as well, and burning day and night with remorse, the king retired into the vana to undergo the most rigid tapasya in order to earn punya, to cleanse himself of the sin of Brahmahatya. He questioned many Brahmanas, and wandered from country to country over the whole earth.

One day, in course of his wanderings, he met Indrota, the son of Sunaka, of rigid vows and, approaching him, touched his feet in reverence. The sage, seeing the king before him, reproved him gravely, saying, "You have committed a great sin. You are guilty of foeticide. Why have you come here, and what is your business with us? Do not touch me at any cost! Go away, your presence does not give me any pleasure. You smell like blood and you look like a corpse. Though polluted, you seem to be pure, and though dead you move like a living man! Dead within, you are of defiled soul, for you are always intent upon sin. Though you sleep and wake, your life is miserable and useless, O Rajan. You have been created for ignoble and sinful deeds. Fathers wish for sons from a desire to obtain all kinds of blessings, and in the hope that their sons will perform tapasyas and yagnas, worship the Devas and practise vairagya. Behold, the whole varna of your ancestors has fallen into hell as a result of your actions. All the hopes your ancestors placed on you have become fruitless. You live in vain, for you have treated with hatred and malice the Brahmanas, whom other men worship to obtain long life, fame and Swarga. Leaving this world when the time comes, you will have to fall headlong into hell, as a result of your sinful deeds, and remain in that posture for innumerable years, tortured by iron-beaked vultures and peacocks. Returning to this world, you will have to take birth in a lowly order of creatures. If you think, O Rajan, that this world is nothing and that the next world is the shadow of a shadow, the legions of Yama in hell will dispel your disbelief!"""

"Bhishma continues, 'Janamejaya replied to the sage Indrota, "You rebuke one who deserves to be rebuked, you censure one deserving censure when you harangue me for my misdeeds. My actions have been sinful, but I implore you to be merciful towards me, since I burn with remorse as though in a blazing fire! Recalling my deeds makes me wretched. Truly, I am afraid of Yama. How can I bear to live without extracting that dart from my heart? O Saunaka, suppress your wrath, instruct me now.

I solemnly declare that I will once more show the same regard for Brahmanas as I did before. Let not my line become extinct and my race sink into the dust. Those who have wronged Brahmanas and thereby forfeited all claim to the respect of the world and to social interaction with their fellowmen, as decreed in the Vedas, should have no one to bear their names or continue their lineage. Utterly desolate, I reiterate my resolve. Protect me like sages who protect the poor without accepting gifts. Sinful men who abstain from sacrifices never attain heaven and have to pass their time in the pits of hell like the unclean Pullindas and Khasas. Ignorant that I am, grant me wisdom, like an Acharya to his shishya or a father to his son. Bless me, O Indrota, son of Sunaka!"

Saunaka replied, "It is no wonder that a man without wisdom does many improper deeds. Knowing this, a person of real understanding is never angry with mortals but grieves for others, being then beyond an object of others’ regrets. One surveys all creatures in the world like a man on a mountain-top surveying people below.

He who becomes an object of censure, who dislikes good men and avoids them, will never obtain blessings and never understand the impropriety of his actions. You know the energy and the nobility of the Brahmanas, as the Vedas and other scriptures have laid down. Let your acts now gain you tranquillity of heart, and let Brahmanas be your refuge. If they cease to be angry with you, that will ensure your happiness in heaven. If you repent your sin, your vision will be clear and you will perceive dharma.”

Janamejaya said, “I repent my sins, and I will never again seek to tarnish my dharma. I desire to be cleansed. Bless me.”

Indrota said, “Drive out your arrogance and pride, Janamejaya, and show your regard for me! Employ yourself in the good of all creatures, and always remember the mandates of dharma. I do not reprove you from narrowness of mind or avarice. Listen now, with these Brahmanas here, to the words of truth that I speak. I ask for nothing but to instruct you in the ways of dharma. People will croak and bray and condemn me for what I am going to do. They will even call me sinful, and my kinsmen and friends will reject me. However, they will benefit from my utterance that will help them surmount the difficulties of life. Those possessed of wisdom will understand my motives.

These are my views, O child, regarding the Brahmanas. Listen to me, O Bhaarata, and act so that, through my efforts, they procure every blessing. Also pledge your word that you will never again injure the Brahmanas.”

Janamejaya replied, “I swear, even touching your feet, that I will never again, in thought, word, or deed, injure the Brahmanas.”’

'Saunaka said, "As your heart has been greatly perturbed, I will speak to you about dharma. You are knowledgeable, powerful, and now, with a placid heart, of your own will in search of dharma. A king who is stern at first and compassionate later, and who acts for the good to all creatures, is certainly wonderful. People say that the king who commences with severity burns the whole world. You were earlier harsh, but now you turn your eyes to dharma. Forsaking luxurious food and articles that you have long enjoyed, you have taken to strict tapasya. All this, O Janamejaya, is certain to appear wonderful to kings who are sunk in sin.

That an affluent man should become liberal, or a wealthy one become an ascetic reluctant to spend wealth, is not a marvel. Such a man is little different from Agastya who was unwilling to create wealth in order to gratify his wife; the same cause that makes an affluent man charitable operates to make an ascetic careful of his wealth. An ill-judged action creates much misery, while one accomplished with the aid of discernment has beneficial results. Sacrifice, gift, compassion, the Vedas and truth: these five are purifying. The sixth is well-performed tapasya, salutary for kings. By conducting it properly, Janamejaya, you are certain to earn great merit and punya. It is said that visiting sacred places is also highly cleansing, as Yayati sang in the following verses: 'That mortal who would earn life and longevity should, after having performed sacrifices with devotion, renounce them and practise penances.'

The field of Kuru is held to be sacred, and the river Saraswati more so. The tirthas of the Saraswati are more sacred than Saraswati herself; and the tirtha called Prithudaka is more sacred than all the tirthas of the Saraswati. One who has bathed in Prithudaka and drunk its waters will not have a premature death to lament. You will regain life and acquire longevity if you go to Mahasaras, to all the tirthas designated by the name of Pushkara, to Prabhasa, to the northern lake Manasa and to Kalodaka. Lake Manasa is on the spot where the waters of the Saraswati and the Drisadwati mingle, and one with Vedic knowledge should bathe in these places.

Manu has said that charity is the best of all duties, and that renunciation is better than charity. In this connection there is a verse composed by Satyavat. One should act as a child, innocent, without either goodness or sin. In the true nature of all creatures in this world, there is neither misery nor happiness. That which is called misery and happiness is the result of a troubled imagination. This is also true of all living creatures. The lives are superior, of those who have taken to renunciation and abstained from action, both meritorious and sinful.

I will now tell you those actions best for a king. With your might and charity, conquer Swarga, O Rajan! He who possesses force and energy will attain dharma. Rule the earth for the Brahmanas and for happiness. You formerly used to condemn the Brahmanas, so gratify them now. Though they have denounced and deserted you, do still, guided by knowledge of self, solemnly pledge never to injure them. Engage in work that is suitable for you, and seek what is for your greatest good.

Amongst rulers, some are as cool as snow; some as fierce as fire; some become like a plough; and some like a thunder-bolt. He who wishes to prevent self-destruction should never mix with evil men for any reason, general or specific. For a sinful deed committed only once, one can cleanse oneself by repentance, and for one committed twice. by vowing never to commit it again. For such an action committed thrice, one can cleanse oneself by resolving to bear oneself righteously. By committing such a deed repeatedly, one can cleanse oneself by a pilgrimage to sacred places.

One who wants to obtain prosperity should do all that results in punya. Those who live amid fragrant odours, smell sweet, while those who live in amid foul odours, smell disgusting. One devoted to the practice of tapasya gets soon cleansed of all one’s sins. By worshipping the homa fire for a year, one stained by diverse sins becomes purified, and worshipping the fire for three years cleanses one guilty of foeticide. One guilty of foeticide becomes cleansed at even a hundred yojanas from Mahasaras, or by setting out on the tirthas called Pushkara, Prabhasa, or Manasa in the north.

A slayer can be purified by saving from danger as many creatures of a particular species as those he has killed. Manu has said that by diving in water after thrice reciting the Aghamarshana mantras, one reaps the fruits of the final bath in an Aswamedha. Such an action soon cleanses one of all one's sins, and causes one to regain the esteem of the world. All creatures become docile to such a man, like the feeble-minded to those around them.

Once, long ago, the Devas and Asuras approached the celestial guru Brihaspati and humbly asked him, 'You know, O Maharishi, the rewards of dharma, and of those other deeds that lead to hell. Does not he to whom good and bad are the same, liberate himself from both punya and paapa? Tell us, Maharishi, what the fruits of dharma are and how a dharmatman drives out his sins.'

Brihaspati answered, 'If having committed a sin by mistake, one understands its nature and performs meritorious acts, one will cleanse oneself like dirty cloth washed clean by some saline substance. If one does not boast after committing a sin, but through faith, frees oneself from malice, one will acquire punya. He who hides the faults of good men, even when exposed, earns punya despite committing faults himself. As the sun rising in the morning disperses darkness, one dispels all ones sins by acting righteously.'"

Indrota, the son of Sunaka, said these words to king Janamejaya and personally assisted him in the performance of the Aswamedha yagna. The king, cleansed of his sins, regained his punya, shone with splendour like a blazing fire, and then entered his kingdom like Soma in his full form entering Swarga.'"

"Yudhishtira asks, 'Have you, O Pitamaha, ever seen or heard of any mortal who was restored to life after death?'

Bhishma says, 'Listen, O Rajan, to this story of the conversation between a vulture and a jackal which took place long ago in the forest of Naimisha. Once upon a time, a Brahmana, after great difficulties, obtained a son with beautiful, large eyes. The child died of infantile convulsions. Some of his grief-stricken kinsmen, lamenting aloud, picked up that boy of tender years, the sole wealth of his family, and took him to the crematorium. There they began to pass the child from one breast to another, clamouring more bitterly in grief as they recalled the beloved prattle of the child, heavy-hearted and unable to go leaving its body on the bare ground.

Hearing their cries, a vulture came there and told them: "Go away and do not tarry, you have to cast off but one child. Thousands of men and thousands of women are left here by relatives in the course of time. See, the whole universe is subject to happiness and sorrow. Union and disunion can be seen, turn by turn. Those who have come to the crematorium bringing the dead bodies of their kinsmen, and those who sit by those bodies from affection, themselves disappear from the world as a result of their own actions, when their allotted life-span run out. There is no need to linger in the crematorium, this horrible place full of vultures and jackals, abounding with skeletons and fearsome creatures. No one, friend or foe, having once succumbed to the power of Time, ever comes back. This is the fate of all creatures. In this world of mortals, every one that is born is sure to die. Who will restore to life one who is dead and gone on the way, as ordained by the Yama? At this hour when men are about to close their daily toil, and the sun is retiring to the Asta hills, return to your homes and give up your attachment to the child."

Hearing these words of the vulture, the grief of the kinsmen seemed to abate and, placing the child on the bare ground, they prepared to go away. Assuring themselves of the fact that the child was indeed dead, and with no hope of seeing him again, they began to leave, with loud plaints. At this time a jackal, black as a raven, issued out of his hole and said to the departing kinsmen, "Surely you kinsmen of this dead child have no affection for him. The sun still shines in the sky, you fools! Indulge your feelings without fear. Many are the virtues of the hour, and this one may come back to life! Why do you spread a few blades of Kusa grass on the ground and with hearts of steel abandon this dear child to the crematorium? Surely you have no affection for this young child whose words, as soon as they left his lips, used to gladden you so greatly!

Look at the affection that even birds and beasts bear towards their offspring. They get no return for bringing up their young ones. Like the sacrifices of the Rishis that are never undertaken from a desire for recompense, the affection of animals, birds and insects does not result in any reward, either here or hereafter. Yet they cherish their young ones, who grow up and never cherish them in return in their old age. Are they not grieved when they do not see their little ones? Where, indeed, is affection to be seen in human beings, that they claim the influence of grief? Where would you go, leaving here this child who is the perpetuator of his race? Shed tears for him for awhile, and look at him lovingly a little longer, for objects so dear are difficult to abandon.

They are friends who wait by the side of one who is weak, of one who is prosecuted in a court of law, of one who is borne towards the crematorium. Life's breath is dear to all, and all feel the influence of affection. Behold the devotion exhibited by even those that belong to the intermediate species! How can you leave, casting off this boy with eyes large as the petals of the lotus, and handsome as a newly-married youth, washed clean and adorned with floral garlands?" Hearing these touching words of the jackal, the men turned back for the sake of the corpse.

The vulture now said, "Alas, you men of no strength of mind, why do you turn back at the bidding of a cruel and mean jackal of little intelligence? Why do you mourn for that compound of five elements deserted by their presiding deities, no longer tenanted, motionless, and stiff as a piece of wood? Why do you not grieve for your own selves? Do you practice austere tapasya to cleanse yourselves from sin? Everything may be had by tapasya, what will your lamentations do? Ill-luck is born with the body, because of which this boy has died, plunging you into infinite grief. Wealth, cattle, gold, precious gems, children, all have their root in tapasya. Tapasya is the result of yoga.

Among animate beings, the measure of sorrow or joy depends on the actions of a previous life. Indeed, everyone comes into the world bringing with him his own measure of happiness and suffering. The son is not bound by the actions of the father, nor the father by those of the son. Bound by their own deeds, good and bad, all have to travel by this common road. Duly practise all the duties, and abstain from adharmic acts. Wait reverentially upon the Devas and the Brahmanas according to the directions of the shastras. Give up sorrow and unhappiness, and abstain from parental affection. Leave the child on this exposed ground, and go away without delay.

The doer alone enjoys the fruit of his actions, good or bad. What have kinsmen to do with it? Relatives abandon their deceased kinsman, however dear. Eyes bathed in tears, they go away and cease to display affection for the dead. Wise or ignorant, rich or poor, everyone with their good and bad karma succumbs to Time. What will you do by mourning for one who is dead? Time is the lord of all and, in obedience to his very nature, casts an equal eye on all things. In pride of youth, or in helpless infancy, bearing the weight of years, or lying in the mother's womb, everyone is subject to be assailed by Death. Such, indeed, is the course of the world."

The jackal said, "Alas, that light-brained vulture has diminished the affection cherished by your weeping selves, overwhelmed with sorrow for your deceased child. This is obvious because, convinced by his calm and well-expressed words, you go back to town, abandoning an affection so entrenched. Alas, I had supposed that the grief felt by men who loudly lament the death of a child, like cattle who miss their calves, would be great. Today, however, I understand what the measure of bereavement is of human beings on earth. Witnessing their great attachment, I had shed tears. It now seems that their affection is frail!

One must always strive to succeed with the help of destiny. Hard work, hope and destiny, together produce rewards. How can happiness be had from despondency? Objects of desire can be won by resolution. Why, then, do you go back so heartlessly? Where do you go, abandoning in the wilderness your own son, this perpetuator of the race of his fathers? Stay here till the sun sets and the evening twilight comes. You may then take away this boy with yourselves, or stay with him."

The vulture now said, "I am a full thousand years old today, but I have never seen a dead creature, male or female, or of ambiguous sex, revive after death. Some die in the womb, some soon after birth, some in infancy, some in youth and some in old age. The fortunes of all creatures, including even beasts and birds, are unpredictable. The life-span of all creatures, mobile and immobile, is fixed beforehand. Men who have lost spouses, children and dear ones go back to their homes every day with hearts filled with sorrow, leaving on this spot their innumerable friends and foes.

This lifeless body no longer has any animal heat in it and is as stiff as a piece of wood! Why, then, do you not depart, leaving the body of this child whose life has entered a new body? This affection is meaningless, and hugging the child is useless. He does not see with his eyes, or hear with his ears. Leave him here and go away without delay to your respective homes. My words may appear cruel but are rational and bear directly on the high religion of Moksha."

Addressed thus by the sagacious vulture in words efficacious in awakening understanding, the men resolved to leave the spot and prepared to turn their backs upon the crematorium. Grief increases twofold at the sight of its object, remembering the actions of that object when alive.

Just at that time the jackal came with quick steps and looked at the child lying in the sleep of death. The jackal said, "Why do you, at the vulture's bidding, leave this child of golden complexion, adorned with ornaments, and capable of making offering to his pitris? If you abandon him, your affection will not come to an end, nor will your piteous lamentations. On the other hand, your grief will certainly increase. We have heard the story of how Rama killed a Sudra named Samvuka to uphold dharma, and restored to life a Brahmana child who had died prematurely. There is a similar story of the son of the Rajarishi Sweta who died too early, but the king, devoted to dharma, succeeded in reviving his dead child. In your case, also, some sage or deity may be willing to grant your desire and show compassion to you who are crying so piteously.” The men, grief-stricken and full of affection for the child, retraced their steps and, placing the child’s head on their laps, one after another, began to lament loudly.

Hearing their cries, the vulture, returned and said, “Why are you bathing this child with your tears? Why are you pressing him in this fashion with the touch of your palms? At the command of the grim king of justice the child has been sent to that sleep which knows no waking. Those who are endued with the punya of penances, who are wealthy and intelligent, in fact, all, succumb to death. This is the place intended for the dead. One sees relatives abandon thousands of kinsmen, young and old, and pass their nights and days in grief, rolling on the bare ground. Cease this fervor in exhibiting your sorrow. It is beyond belief that this child will come back to life. He will not get back his life at the jackal’s bidding. If a person once dies and takes leave of his body, it can never come to life again. Hundreds of jackals, by laying down their own lives, will not succeed in reviving this child in hundreds of years. Only if Rudra, or Kumara, or Brahman, or Vishnu, grant him a boon, can this child come back to life. The jackal, you, and all the kinsmen of this one, and I, with all our merits and sins, are on the same road. For this reason, the wise should avoid behaviour that displeases others, harsh speeches, inflicting pain on others, adultery, sin and falsehood. Carefully seek dharma, truth, good of others, justice, compassion for all creatures, sincerity and honesty. They incur sin who do not look after their mothers, fathers, kinsmen and friends when alive. What will you do by weeping for him, who does not see with his eyes, nor stir in the least, after death?”

Thus addressed, the men, overwhelmed with sorrow and burning with grief on account of their affection for the child, departed for their homes, leaving the body.

The jackal said, “Alas, terrible is the world of mortals, where no creature can escape! Every creature’s life-span is short, and beloved friends are always departing. It is full of vanity, falsehoods, accusations and evil reports. This dismal incident makes me dislike the world of men. Alas, shame on you, who thus turn back like foolish men at the vulture’s bidding, though you are burning with grief for this child. Heartless ones, how can you go away, casting off parental affection, upon hearing the words of a sinful vulture of uncleansed soul? Happiness is followed by misery, and misery by happiness. In this world, enveloped by both, neither of these exists uninterruptedly. Men of little understanding, where do you go, casting off on the bare ground this child of such beauty, this son who is an ornament of your varna?

Truly, I cannot dispel the idea from my mind that this handsome child, blazing with beauty, is alive. He is not meant to die. I feel that you who are grief-stricken on his death will surely have good luck today. But you are concerned only for your own ease and trying to avoid possible inconvenience and discomfort. Where would you go, like fools, leaving this darling?"

Bhishma continued, 'Thus, O Rajan, the kinsmen of the deceased child, unable to decide upon what they should do, were persuaded to remain by the sinful and smooth-tongued jackal for his own purpose, the denizens of the crematorium who roamed there every night in quest of food.

The vulture said, "Dreadful is this spot, this wilderness resounding with the screech of owls and teeming with spirits, Yakshas and Rakshasas, terrible and ghastly like a mass of blue clouds. Give up the dead body and finish the funeral rites. Indeed, cast off the corpse and accomplish those rites before the sun sets and the points of the horizon are enveloped in gloom. Hawks are uttering their harsh cries, jackals are howling fiercely, lions are roaring. The sun is setting, the trees in the crematorium are turning dark from the blue smoke of the funeral pyres. The flesh-eating dwellers of this place are yelling in rage with hunger. Creatures of horrible forms that live in this frightful place, all those carnivorous animals of fearful visage that haunt this desert, will soon set upon you. This wilderness is terrifying. Danger will overpower you. Indeed, if you listen to these false and futile words of the jackal against your own good sense, all of you will surely be destroyed."

The jackal said, "Stay where you are! There is no fear, even in this desert, as long as the sun shines. Till the god of day sets, remain here with hope, engendered by your love. Lament as you please, unafraid, looking at this child with loving eyes. Frightful though this wilderness is, no danger will befall you. In reality it is an aspect of quiet and peace. It is here that the Pitris by their thousands took leave of the world. Wait as long as the sun shines. What are this vulture's words to you? If with benumbed intellect you accept the cruel vulture's harsh words, your child will never come back to life!"

The vulture then told those men that the sun had set. The jackal said it was not so. Both the vulture and the jackal felt the pangs of hunger, addressing the kinsmen of the dead child. Both of them had girded up their loins to accomplish their respective purposes. Exhausted with hunger and thirst, they thus disputed, taking recourse to the shastras. Moved by the words of the bird and the beast, sweet as nectar, wise and knowledgeable, the kinsmen at one moment wished to go away and at another to remain. Finally, moved by grief and sorrow, they waited, wailing bitterly, not knowing that the beast and the bird, skilled in accomplishing their own purposes, had only confused them by their words.

While the adroit bird and beast were thus disputing, and while the kinsmen of the dead child sat listening to them, the great god Sankara, urged by his divine spouse Uma, came there, his eyes moist with compassion. Addressing the kinsmen of the deceased child, the Deva said, "I am Sankara, giver of boons." With burdened hearts the men prostrated themselves before the great deity and said to him, "We have lost our only child, and all of us are at the point of death. We beg you to grant us life by granting life to this our son."

The Mahadeva, taking up a quantity of water in his hands granted to the dead child a life extending a hundred years. Then the ever-benevolent and illustrious wielder of the bow Pinaki granted a boon to both the jackal and the vulture which appeased their hunger. The men bowed to the Deva, filled with delight at their great good fortune, O Rajan, and left that spot in jubilation.

Through persistent hope, firm resolution and the grace of the great god, one can obtain the fruits of one's actions without delay. Witness the combination of circumstances and the resolve of those kinsmen: while they were crying with agonised hearts, their tears were wiped away. See, how within only a short time, through their persistence, they obtained the grace of Sankara and, their sorrows dispelled, were made happy. Indeed, O Bhaarata, those dejected kinsmen were filled with amazement and delight at the restoration of their child to life through Sankara's compassion. Casting off their grief, those Brahmanas, overjoyed, hastened back to their town with the restored child.

Behaviour like this has been ordained for all the four varnas. By listening to this auspicious story about dharma, artha, and mukti, a man obtains happiness both here and hereafter.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'What should a weak, worthless and light-brained man do, O Pitamaha, who from stupidity provokes, through insulting and boastful speeches, a powerful neighbour who can favour or punish, and is always ready for action, when the enemy advances against him in anger to exterminate him?'

Bhishma replies, 'Let me narrate, O Bhaarata, the old story of the discourse between Pavana and the lordly Salmali tree, growing on one of the heights of Himavat. Having grown for many centuries, the tree had stretched out his branches. His trunk was huge, its girth being four hundred cubits, and his myriad twigs and leaves cast a dense shade under which toil-worn elephants in rut used to rest, bathed in sweat, as did many animals of other species. Loaded with flowers and fruits, he was the abode of numberless parrots, male and female. Caravans of merchants and traders travelling along their routes, and munis living in the vana, used to rest under the shade of the delightful monarch of the forest.

One day, O Bharatarishabha, the sage Narada, seeing the wide-extending and innumerable branches of the tree and the circumference of his trunk, approached him and said, "You are delightful and charming, O Salmali, greatest of trees. I am always captivated by the sight of you, as enchanting birds of diverse kinds live on your branches, and elephants and other animals cheerfully dwell in your shade. Your limbs and trunk are gigantic, O wide-branched monarch of the forest. I never see any of them broken by the god of the wind. Is it the case, child, that Pavana is pleased with you and is your friend, that he always protects you in this vana?

The illustrious Pavana with great speed and force moves from their sites the tallest and strongest trees, even mountain summits. The sacred bearer of perfumes, blowing whither he wants, dries up rivers, tanks and seas, down to the very nether regions. Pavana protects you out of friendship, for certain. This is why, though having countless branches, you still bear leaves and flowers. O king of the forest, your verdure is delightful since these winged creatures sport joyfully on your twigs and branches. During the season when you break into bloom, the sweet notes of all these denizens of your branches are heard separately singing melodious songs. Then, O Salmali, these elephants that are the ornaments of their species, bathed in sweat, approach you with cries of delight, and are happy here. Diverse other species of animals living in the vana embellish you further. You are beautiful like the mountains of Meru inhabited by creatures of every kind. Frequented also by rishis and others engaged in tapasya, and by Yatis devoted to contemplation, this place, I think, must resemble Swarga itself."'

'Narada said, "Without doubt, O Salmali, the terrible and irresistible Vayu Deva always protects you out of amity, and a close intimacy exists between you and the Wind. It is as if you have told him, 'I am yours,' and for that reason Vayu Deva shields you. I do not think there is tree or mountain or mansion in this world that the Wind has not broken. Assuredly, you stand here with all your branches, twigs and leaves intact, simply because, for some reason, that Deva shelters you."

The Salmali said, "The Wind is neither my friend, nor mate, nor well-wisher, nor my great Ordainer, O Narada Muni, that he should protect me. My fierce energy and might, O Narada, are greater than the Wind's. In truth, the strength of the Wind comes up to about only an eighteenth part of mine. When he advances in rage, tearing up trees and mountains in his path, I curb his strength by putting forth mine. Indeed, the Wind that breaks many things has himself been repeatedly broken by me. This is why, O Devarishi, I am not afraid of him even when he comes in anger."

Narada said, "O Salmali, your protection seems to be thoroughly perverse. There is no doubt that there is nothing equal to the Wind in strength. Even Indra, Yama, or Vaisravana, the lord of the waters, is not equal in might to Vayu Deva, whereas you are only a tree! The illustrious Wind god is at all times the cause of any act performed by the creatures in this world, since it is he that is the giver of life. When that god exerts himself with propriety, he makes it possible for all living creatures to live at their ease. When he moves with anger, calamities sweep over the creatures of the world. What can it be other than feeble understanding that induces you to not revere the Vayu Deva, the greatest in the universe, who deserves worship? You are worthless and of depraved perception. Indeed, you only indulge in meaningless bragging. You utter lies because your intellect is confused by anger and other evil passions.

O Salmali, I am certainly angry with you for speaking thus. I will myself report to Vayu Deva all your derogatory words. Chandanas, Syandanas, Salas, Saralas, Devadarus, Vetavas, Dhanwanas and other trees of good souls that are far stronger than you, have never uttered such invectives against the Deva as you of wicked understanding have done. All of them know the might of the Wind and their own, and these foremost of trees bow down their heads in respect to the deity. You, however, through folly, know not the infinite might of the Wind. I shall go to the Deva.”””

"Bhishma continues, 'Narada, the greatest of all knowers of Brahma, reported to the Vayu Deva all that the Salmali had said about him.

Narada said, "There is a certain Salmali, a tree on the breast of Himavat, decked with branches and leaves spread wide around and with roots that extend deep into the earth. That tree has disparaged you and spoken many insulting words about you that are improper for me to repeat. I know that you, the foremost of all created things, are a superior and mighty entity, resembling in wrath the Destroyer himself."

Hearing these words of Narada, the Vayu Deva went to Salmali, and said to him in rage, "O Salmali, you have spoken spoken slightingly of me before Narada. Know that I am Vayu Deva, and I will certainly show you my power and might. You are no stranger to me, I know you well. It is only because the great Pitamaha, while he was creating the world, had for a time rested under you, that I have so far shown you grace. That is why you stand unharmed, O worst of trees, not because of your own might. You regard me lightly as if I were a common creature. I will show myself to you in such a way that you will not again affront me."

Bhishma continues, 'The Salmali laughed in derision and replied, "O Vayu Deva, you are angry with me! Do not hesitate to show me the extent of your might. Throw all your anger upon me. What will you do to me by giving way to wrath? Even if your strength had been your own, I would not be afraid of you, as I am your superior in might. Those are not to be regarded as strong who possess physical strength alone."

The Vayu Deva left, saying, "Tomorrow I will test your strength."

When night fell, Salmali, calculating mentally the extent of the Wind's might, and realising his own self to be inferior to the Deva, said to himself, "All that I said to Narada is false. I am certainly inferior in might to the Wind, who is truly powerful. He is always mighty, as Narada said, and I am certainly weaker than other trees. But in astuteness no tree is my equal, so, relying upon my intelligence I will examine this fear that arises from the Wind. If all the other trees in the forest only relied upon the same kind of intelligence, surely no injury could result to them from Vayu Deva when he becomes angry. All of them, however, are devoid of understanding, and therefore do not know, as I do, why or how the Wind succeeds in shaking and tearing them up.""'

"Bhishma says, 'Having settled this in his mind, Salmali sadly caused all his branches, principal and subsidiary, to be cut off. He cast off his branches and leaves and flowers, and in the morning the tree looked steadily at the Wind, as he came towards him. Filled with rage and breathing hard, the Wind advanced, felling large trees, towards the spot where the Salmali stood. When he saw him divested of top and branches and leaves and flowers, the Wind smiled exultantly and addressed the lord of the forest who earlier had such a gigantic appearance.

"O Salmali, I would have done to you in my anger precisely what you have done to yourself by lopping off all your branches. You are now divested of your proud top and flowers, and without your shoots and leaves. In consequence of your own evil counsels, you have been brought under my power."

Salmali felt great shame. He remembered the words of Narada and began to repent his folly. Similarly, O Naravyaghra, a weak and foolish man, if he provokes the enmity of a powerful one, is obliged to repent like the Salmali of fable. Even when of equal might, men do not suddenly commence hostilities with those who have injured them. On the other hand, O Rajan, they display their might by degrees.

A foolish man should never provoke the hostility of an intelligent one. In such cases the intelligence of the astute man is like fire penetrating a heap of dry grass. Intelligence is the most precious possession that one can have. Similarly, Rajan, a man can have nothing here more valuable than might. One should therefore, overlook the wrongs which one of superior strength inflicts, just as one should would kindly overlook the actions of a child, an idiot, or a blind or deaf person.

The wisdom of this saying is witnessed in your case, O Parantapa. The eleven akshauhinis of Duryodhana, O you of great splendour, and the seven collected by you, were not in might equal to the single-handed mahatman, Arjuna. Therefore that illustrious Pandava, son of Paka's chastiser, routed and slew all the troops as he coursed the field of battle, relying on his own strength. I have told you of the duties of kings and the morality of duties in detail, Bhaarata. What else, Yudhishtira, do you wish to hear?'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'I desire to hear in detail about the source of sin, O Bharatarishabha, and the foundation upon which it rests.'

Bhishma replies, 'Listen, Rajan: Lobha, greed alone, is the great destroyer. From lobha comes paapa and adharma, and they flow together and cause great misery. Covetousness is the source also of cunning and hypocrisy, which makes men sin in the world. Lobha causes anger, lust, loss of judgment, deception, pride, arrogance and malice, as well as vindictiveness, shamelessness, loss of prosperity, loss of virtue, anxiety, infamy, miserliness, cupidity, and partiality for every kind of impropriety. It causes conceit on account of birth, learning, beauty and wealth, as well as insensitivity, malevolence, mistrust, insincerity towards all, appropriation of other people's wealth, ravishment of other people's wives, harshness of speech, propensity to speak ill of others, ravening lust, gluttony, liability to premature death, malice, irresistible propensity for falsehood, unconquerable appetite for indulging in the passions, insatiable desire for gossip and slander, boastfulness, arrogance, neglect of duties, rashness, and perpetration of every kind of evil deed: all these proceed from lobha.

Men, whether infant, youth or adult, are unable to abandon covetousness. Such is the nature of greed that it never decays, even with the decay of life. Like the ocean that can never be filled, even by the constant discharge of innumerable rivers of immeasurable depth, covetousness is incapable of being gratified by any extent of acquisitions. However, a Muni should conquer this covetousness which is never gratified by acquisitions or satiated by the accomplishment of desires, which is not known in its real nature by the gods, the Gandharvas, the Asuras, the great snakes—in fact, by all classes of beings, this irresistible passion and folly which lures the heart to the unrealities of the world. Pride, malice, slander, crookedness, and incapacity to bear other people's good, are vices, O Kurusthama, that are seen in men of uncleansed soul in the grip of greed. Even great learned men who bear in their minds all the voluminous shastras, and who are competent to dispel the doubts of others, show themselves in this respect to be weak-minded and undergo great misery in consequence of this passion.

Greedy men are wedded to envy and anger and are outside the pale of good behaviour. With crooked hearts they utter sweet speeches, like dark pits with mouths covered with grass. Being of low minds, they rob the world wearing the hypocritical cloak of religion and virtue. They use equivocation to create diverse schisms in religion and destroy the ways of dharma. When evil men under the domination of lobha apparently practise the duties of dharma, the desecrations committed by them soon become acceptable among men. Pride, anger, arrogance, self-importance, insensibility, outbursts of joy and sorrow, all these can be seen in men swayed by greed. Understand, they who remain under the influence of covetousness are evil.

I shall now tell you about those who are designated good and whose practices are pure. One regards as virtuous, O Bhaarata, those who have no fear of an obligation to return to this world after death, and no fear of the next world; they who are not addicted to animal food; who cherish salutary behaviour and practise self-restraint; for whom pleasure and pain are equal, who have truth for their refuge, who are compassionate and give, rather than take; who worship Pitris, Devas and Atithis; who are universal benefactors, always ready to work for the good of others; whose minds are staunch and who observe all the duties laid down in the shastras, who are devoted to the good of all, who can give their all and lay down their very lives for others!

These advocates of dharma are incapable of being forced away from the path of virtue. Their conduct, conforming to the model set by the dharmatman of old, cannot be otherwise. They are fearless, tranquil, mild and always adhere to the right path. Full of compassion, they are always worshipped by the good. They are free from pride, lust and anger, and are not attached to any worldly object. They observe excellent vows and are always objects of regard. You should therefore, always wait upon them and seek instruction from them. They never aspire to virtue for the sake of wealth or fame, O Yudhishtira. They acquire it, rather, because it is a duty, like cherishing the body. Fear, wrath, restlessness and sorrow do not dwell in them. There is no mystery about them and they do not wear the outward garb of religion to mislead their fellowmen. They are perfectly contented, and make no error of judgment out of covetousness. They are devoted to truth and sincerity, and never fall from righteousness. You should always show regard for them, O son of Kunti!

They are neither delighted at any gain, nor pained at any loss. Free of attachment to anything, free of pride, they are wedded to goodness and look on everything equally. Gain and loss, happiness and sorrow, the agreeable and the disagreeable, life and death, are one in the eyes of these men of steady tread, engaged in the pursuit of divine knowledge, and devoted to the path of tranquillity and righteousness. Keep your senses under restraint, do not yield to imprudence, and always worship those Mahatmans who bear such love for dharma. Words cause good only through the favour of the Devas, O blessed one. Under different circumstances, they can produce evil consequences.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'You have said, O Pitamaha, that the foundation of all evil is lobha. I wish, O sire, to hear of ignorance, avidya, in detail.'

Bhishma replies, 'The man who commits sin through avidya, who does not know that his end is near and who always hates the virtuous, soon incurs infamy. Avidya is the source of misery through which one suffers hardship, incurs great danger, and sinks into hell.'

Yudhishtira says, 'O Rajan, I desire to hear in full all the inseparable attributes of avidya: its origin, rise, place, growth, decay, root, course, time, cause and consequence. The misery that is felt in this world, is all born of ignorance.'

Bhishma replies, 'Attachment, hate, loss of judgment, joy, sorrow, vanity, lust, anger, pride, procrastination, idleness, desire, aversion, jealousy and all other sinful actions are known by their common name of avidya. Hear now, O Rajan, about its tendency, growth and other features about which you have enquired. These two, ignorance and covetousness, are the same. Both produce the same fruits and same faults, O Bhaarata! Avidya exists where lobha exists, and grows or shrinks along with lobha.

Manifold again is the course that it takes. Loss of judgment is the inseparable attribute and root of lobha. Eternity is ignorance's path and when avidya is apparent, the objects of covetousness are forfeited. From ignorance proceeds covetousness, and vice versa. Lobha should be shunned by all. Janaka, Yuvanaswa, Vrishadarbhi, Prasenajit and other kings attained

Swarga because they repressed Lobha. Therefore let it be seen that you are resolute in avoiding covetousness, O Kurusthama. Thus will you obtain happiness, both here and in the next world.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'O Pitamaha, Mahatman, how can a person engaged in the study of the Vedas earn the highest happiness in heaven? According to the shastras, diverse kinds of action are considered in this world as productive of great punya. Tell me, what is regarded as great, both here and hereafter? The path of dharma is long and has innumerable branches, O Bhaarata! Amongst those, which are the few that should be preferred above others, according to you? Tell me about this, that is so inclusive and multifarious.'

Bhishma replies, 'I will tell you how you can attain great punya. Being wise, you will be as happy with the knowledge that I will impart to you as if you had drunk amrita. Each Maharishi has prescribed many rules of dharma, based upon his own wisdom, of which the highest is self-restraint. Among the ancients, those acquainted with truth have said that self-restraint leads to the highest punya, and that, for the Brahmana, it is his eternal duty, from which he obtains the rewards of his actions. In his case, the punya of self-restraint enhances tejas and surpasses charity, sacrifice and study of the Vedas.

Self-restraint is highly sacred; by it a man is cleansed of all his sins, is imbued with tejas and attains to the highest blessedness. Self-restraint, according to all dharmatman, is the highest of virtues in this world, O Narottama, and we have not heard of any other dharma that can equal it for acquiring the highest happiness both here and hereafter. The self-restrained man sleeps sweetly, wakes up happy, and moves through the world contentedly, his mind always cheerful. The man who is without self-restraint suffers misery and brings upon himself many calamities, all born of his own faults. It is said that for all the four varnas, self-restraint is the best of vows.

I will now tell you those attributes whose sum total is called self-restraint. Forgiveness, patience, abstention from injury, impartiality, truth, sincerity, conquest of the senses, cleverness, mildness, modesty, steadiness, liberality, freedom from wrath, contentment, sweetness of speech, benevolence, freedom from malice: the union of all these is called self-restraint. It also includes, O son of Kuru, veneration for the guru and universal compassion. The self-restrained man avoids adulation and slander, depravity, infamy, false speech, lust, covetousness, pride, arrogance, self-glorification, fear, envy and disrespect. He never incurs disgrace and is free from envy. He is not gratified with small acquisitions; he is just like the ocean that can never be filled.

The man of self-restraint is never bound by attachments that arise from earthly connections or sentiments like, “I am yours, you are mine, They are in me, and I am in them.” Such a man, who adopts the practices of either cities or the vana, and who never indulges in slander or adulation, attains mukti. He is cheerful and of virtuous conduct, practises universal friendliness, has knowledge of the soul and, liberated from the diverse attachments of the earth, obtains great reward in the world. A man of excellent conduct, observant of duties, cheerful, learned and with knowledge of self, wins esteem here and attains to a high end hereafter.

All actions that one regards as good on earth, all those that dhartman practise, constitute the path of the Rishi possessed of knowledge. A good man never deviates from that path. Retiring from the world and taking to vanavasa, the learned man, having mastered his senses, who treads that path in quiet expectation of his death, is sure to attain to the state of Brahma. He who has no fear of any creature, and of whom no creature is afraid, has no fear to encounter after the dissolution of his body. He who exhausts his punya by actual enjoyment, rather than seeking to accumulate it, who views equally all creatures and practises a course of universal friendliness, attains Brahma. Just as the track of birds along the sky or of fowl over the surface of water cannot be discerned, the track of such a man does not attract notice.

For one who, abandoning home, adopts the dharma of moksha, many bright worlds wait to be enjoyed for eternity, O Rajan. By abandoning all actions, including in due course tapasya and the various branches of study, one becomes pure in one's desires and liberated from all restraints, a cheerful soul of pure heart, conversant with self, who then wins esteem in this world and at last attains Swarga. That eternal region of Brahman which springs from Vedic tapasya, and which is within hidden in a cave, can be won by only self-restraint. He who takes pleasure in true knowledge, who has become enlightened injures no creature, has no fear of coming back to this world, far less, any fear in respect of the others.

There is one fault in self-control, none other: that men regard one who has self-control as weak and unintelligent. Its merits are many, for by forgiveness, which is only another form of self-control, a man may easily acquire innumerable worlds. What need does he have for self-control who dwells in a forest? Similarly, O Bhaarata, of what use is vanavasa to one that has no self-control? Wherever a man of self-control dwells is a forest, even a sacred retreat.'"

Vaisampayana continued, "Hearing these words of Bhishma, Yudhishtira is highly gratified, as if he had imbibed amrita. He asks the greatest of Dharmatmans again to speak, and the perpetuator of Kuru's race once more begins to discourse cheerfully."

"Bhishma says, 'The wise say that tapasya is the root of all things. The foolish man who has not undergone tapasya does not get the rewards of even his own actions. The mighty Brahma created the entire universe by tapasya. The Rishis acquired the Vedas through the power of tapasya. It was with the aid of tapasya that Pitamaha created food, fruit and roots. It is by tapasya that rishis and munis with rapt souls see the three worlds. It is through tapasya that medicines and antidotes to injurious substances, and diverse processes, produce their intended results. The accomplishment of all purposes depends upon tapasya. Things apparently unattainable are sure to be won by tapasya. Without doubt the Rishis obtained their six-fold divine attributes through tapasya.

Tapasya, when properly practiced, cleanses one who drinks alcoholic stimulants, one who robs others, one guilty of foeticide and one who violates his acharya's bed. Penances are of many kinds and can be seen in many different guises. However, of all the tapasyas that can be practised by refraining from pleasure and enjoyment, abstaining from food is supreme. It is superior, Rajan, to even compassion, truthfulness of speech, gifts, and restraining the senses. There is no action more difficult to accomplish than gift. There is no mode of life that is superior to serving one's mother. There is no creature superior to those who know the three Vedas. Similarly, sannyasa constitutes the greatest tapasya. People keep their senses under control for the sake of dharma and Swarga. In respect of such control over the senses, and in the acquisition of dharma, there is no tapasya greater than complete fasting. The Rishis, the Devas, humankind, beasts, birds, and all other creatures, mobile or inert, are all devoted to tapasyas, and whatever success they win is won through tapasya. Thus it was through tapasya that the Devas acquired their superiority The moon and stars too got their share of happiness through tapasya. Without doubt, the very status of godhead may be gained through tapasya.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Brahmanas, Rishis, Pitris and the Devas all approve the dharma of truth. Tell me about truth, O Pitamaha! What are its characteristics, and how can it be acquired? How can one practice truth, and what can one gain by it?'

Bhishma replies, 'Confusion of duties of the four varnas is never approved. That which is called Truth always exists in a pure and pristine state in every one of the four varnas. With the righteous, Truth is always an eternal duty, and one should reverentially bow to it. Truth is the highest refuge of all, Truth is dharma; Truth is tapasya; Truth is Yoga; Truth is the eternal Brahman. Truth is said to be a yagna of a high order, upon which everything rests.

I will now tell you the forms of Truth and its characteristics, in due order, so that you may learn how it can be acquired. Truth, O Bhaarata, as it exists in the world, is of thirteen kinds. The forms that Truth assumes are impartiality, self-control, forgiveness, modesty, endurance, goodness, renunciation, contemplation, dignity, fortitude, compassion, and abstention from injury. These, O Rajan, are the thirteen forms of Truth.

Truth is immutable, eternal and permanent. It can be acquired through practices which do not militate against any of the other virtues, and through Yoga.

When desire, aversion, lust and wrath are shed, that trait which allows one to look upon oneself and one's foe, upon one's good and one's evil, with parity, is called impartiality.

Self-control consists in never coveting another man's possessions, in gravity and patience, a capacity to allay others' fears in respect to oneself, and immunity from maladies. One can acquire this through knowledge.

Devotion to the practice of charity and the observance of dharma constitutes goodwill, the sages say. One acquires universal goodwill by constant devotion to truth.

Forgiveness is that attribute which enables an esteemed and good man to endure both what is agreeable and disagreeable. One can acquire this virtue through the practice of truthfulness.

Modesty is that virtue by which an intelligent man, contented in mind and speech, achieves many good deeds and never incurs the censure of others. It can be acquired through the aid of dharma.

Endurance is that virtue which forgives for the sake of dharma and artha. It is a form of forgiveness which one acquires through patience, and its purpose is to attach people to oneself.

Sannyasa is the giving up of attachment and also of all earthly possessions. Only he who has given up anger and malice can achieve renunciation.

Goodness is that virtue by which one does what is beneficial to all creatures with alertness and care. It has no particular form and consists of divestment of all selfish attachments.

Fortitude is that virtue by which one remains tranquil in happiness and misery. The wise man, mindful of his own good, practises this virtue which teaches forgiveness and devotion to truth. He who casts off joy, fear and wrath, succeeds in acquiring fortitude. Abstention from injury to all creatures in thought, word and deed, kindness and charity, are the eternal duties of those who are good.

These thirteen attributes, though apparently distinct from one another, have but one and the same form, which is Truth. All these, O Bhaarata, support Truth and strengthen it. It is impossible, O Rajan, to enumerate the merits of Truth. It is for these reasons that the Brahmanas, the Pitris and the Devas acclaim Truth. There is no duty higher than Truth and no sin more heinous than untruth. Indeed, Truth is the very foundation of dharma. One should never destroy Truth. From Truth proceed gifts, and yagna with offerings, as well as the threefold Agnihotras, the Vedas, and everything else that leads to dharma. Once upon a time a thousand Awamedha yagnas and Truth were weighed against each other in the balance. Truth weighed more than the thousand Aswamedha yagnas.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'O you of great wisdom, tell me about the source of anger, lust, sorrow, loss of judgment, inclination to do evil, jealousy, malice, pride, envy, slander, incapacity to bear the good of others, unkindness and fear. Tell me everything truly and in detail, O Bharatarishabha,' Bhishma says, 'These thirteen vices are considered powerful enemies of all beings. These, O Rajan, approach and tempt men from every side. They goad and trouble a reckless man or one who is not in his senses. Indeed, as soon as they see a man, they attack him fiercely, like wolves leaping upon their prey. From these proceed all kinds of grief, all kinds of sin. Every mortal, O Purushottama, should know this. I will now tell you of their origin, of the objects upon which they rest, and the means of their destuction. Listen with undivided attention, O Rajan, as I tell you precisely and in detail about the origin of wrath.

Anger springs from greed, which is strengthened by others' faults. Through forgiveness it remains dormant and disappears.

Lust springs from resolution. Indulgence strengthens it. When the wise man resolutely turns away from it, it disappears and dies.

Envy is caused by anger and covetousness. It disappears through compassion for all creatures, knowledge of self, and disregard for all worldly objects. Envy also arises from seeing the faults of other people, but in intelligent men it vanishes with true knowledge.

Loss of judgment has its origin in ignorance, and grows from sinfulness of habit. When one who suffers from this fault begins to take pleasure in the society of wise men, this vice at once and immediately hides its head.

Men perceive conflicting shastras, O scion of Kuru. From this circumstance springs the desire for diverse kinds of action. When one gains true knowledge, this desire is allayed.

Grief in a living being is caused by affection intensified by separation. When one comes to understand that the dead will not return, it subsides.

Incapacity to bear others' good fortune proceeds from anger and greed. Through compassion for every creature and a disregard for all earthly objects, it gets extinguished.

Malice proceeds from abandonment of Truth and indulgence in evil. This vice, O child, disappears if one serves the wise and the good.

Pride arises from conceit of birth, learning and prosperity. However, when one truly knows these three, it instantly disappears.

Jealousy springs from hankering and fellowship with ignoble and ill-bred people. Wisdom eradicates it.

Slander takes its rise from errors of conduct and through offensive and hateful speech. It disappears, O Rajan, upon seeing the world as it is.

Hate is born when one who causes affliction is powerful and the injured one unable to avenge the injury. It subsides through kindness.

Compassion proceeds from the sight of helpless and miserable creatures, with which the world abounds. The sentiment disappears when one understands the strength of dharma.

Covetousness in all creatures spring from ignorance. It dissolves once the impermanence of all objects of enjoyment is perceived.

One says that tranquillity of the soul alone can subdue all these faults. The sons of Dhritarashtra suffered from all these thirteen faults, while you, who were always in search of truth, have conquered all these vices because of your regard for your elders.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'From my observation of good men, I know what compassion is. However, O Bhaarata, I do not know evil men, or the nature of their actions. People avoid cruel men as they avoid thorns, pitfalls and fire. It is evident, O Bhaarata, that they will burn both here and hereafter. Therefore, O Kurusthama, tell me what, in truth, are the acts of such men.'

Bhishma says, 'Evil men are irresistibly inclined towards wicked acts. They slander others and incur infamy themselves. They always feel themselves to be cheated of their due. A spiteful man brags of his own deeds of charity, sees others with malicious eyes and is very mean, deceitful and full of cunning. He never gives others their due. He is arrogant, boastful and keeps evil company. He cannot distinguish the merits and faults of others, fears and suspects all with whom he comes into contact and praises only his associates. He detests all Munis who have taken to vanavasa. He is stupid, discontented, a miser, and a liar. He is cruel, takes delight in injuring others, and is exceedingly covetous.

Such a person regards a virtuous and accomplished man as a pest. Thinking everyone else to be like himself, he trusts nobody. He proclaims the faults of other people, however unjustified. As for his own faults, he does not glance at them because of the advantage he reaps from them. He regards someone who does him good as a simpleton whom he has cleverly deceived. He is filled with regret if he has at any time made any gift of wealth, even to a benefactor. Such a heartless person will calmly eat and drink all kinds of choice food by himself, in the presence of others who may be looking on longingly. He who dedicates the first portion of food to Brahmanas and shares what remains with friends and kinsmen, attains great happiness in the next world and infinite happiness here.

I have now, O chief of the Bhaaratas, told you the indications of an evil and malevolent man. Such a person should always be avoided by a wise man.'"

"Bhishma says, 'O Bhaarata, wealth and knowledge should be given to poor Brahmanas who have been robbed of their wealth and who know all the Vedas and perform yagnas, in order to acquire the punya of dharma, so that they can discharge their obligations to Gurus and the Pitris, and pass their days in reciting and studying the shastras. To those Brahmanas who are not poor, only the dakshina need be given, while to those who have fallen from the status of Brahman due to their sinful deeds, uncooked food should be given outside the limits of the sacrificial altar.

The Brahmanas are the Vedas themselves and all yagnas with generous gifts. Their virtuous inclinations drive them to outdo one another in performing yagnas. The king should, therefore, make diverse costly gifts to them. The Brahmana who can provide for his family for three years or more deserves to drink the Soma. If despite the presence of a virtuous king on the throne, the yagna someone begins, especially a Brahmana, cannot be completed for want of only a fourth part of the estimated expenses, then the king should, to ensure the completion of that sacrifice, take away from his kinsmen the wealth of a Vaisya possessesing a large herd of cattle who is averse to sacrifices and abstains from quaffing Soma.

As the Sudra is not competent to perform a yagna, the king should take wealth away from him for this purpose. He should also, without any scruple, take away wealth from kinsmen who do not perform yagna though possessing a hundred head of cattle and also from him who abstains from yagna though possessing a thousand head of cattle. The king should publicly confiscate the wealth of men who do not practise charity, for by doing so he earns great punya.

The Brahmana forced by want to go without six meals, according to the rules, can take without permission what he requires for a single meal, from the husking tub or field or garden or any other place of a man who cares only for today, without any thought of the morrow, even a man of low pursuits. He should however, on his own, inform the king of his action. If the king knows his duty, he will not inflict any punishment upon such a Brahmana, remembering that a Brahmana faces want and hunger only through the fault of the Kshatriya. Having ascertained a Brahmana's learning and behaviour, the king should make provision for him, and protect him as a father protects a son of his own body. On the expiry of every year, one should perform the Vaisvanara sacrifice.

They who know religion say that the practice of a prescribed alternative does not destroy dharma. The Viswedevas, the Sadhyas, the Brahmanas and Maharishis, fearing death in times of trouble, have no scruple in following any alternative provisions laid down in the shastras. However, one who takes the alternative while able to live according to the primary provision is regarded as an evil man who will never succeed in winning any felicity in Swarga.

A Brahmana who knows the Vedas should never vaunt his power and knowledge to the king. The power of a Brahmana will always be superior to that of a king, which is why a king cannot bear or resist the power of the Brahmanas. The Brahmana is said to be the creator, ruler, lawmaker and god. No word of abuse or sarcasm should be addressed to a Brahmana. The Kshatriya should solve all his difficulties with the aid of the might of his arms, the Vaisya and the Sudra by wealth, and the Brahmana by mantras and homa. None, a maiden or young woman, one unacquainted with mantras, an ignorant person, or one who is impure, is competent to pour libations on the yagna fire. If any of these do so, he or she is sure to fall into hell, along with him for whom they officiate. For this reason, none but a Brahmana with knowledge of the Vedas and skilled in all yagnas should pour sacrificial libations. They who know the shastras say that the man who, having kindled the yagna fire, does not give away the dedicated food as dakshina, is not the kindler of a yagna fire. One should, with his senses under control and with proper devotion, perform all the acts of punya. One should never worship the deities in yagnas in which dakshina is not given.

A sacrifice not concluded with dakshina, rather than producing punya, brings about the destruction of one's children, animals and Swarga. Such a yagna destroys also one's senses, fame and achievements, one's very life-span.

Those Brahmanas who lie with women in their season, or who never perform yagnas, or whose families have no members who are educated in the Vedas, are veritable Sudras. The Brahmana who, having married a Sudra girl, resides for twelve continuous years in a village which is supplied only by a single well, becomes a Sudra in action. The Brahmana who summons to his bed an unmarried maiden, or suffers a Sudra to sit upon the same carpet with him, thinking him worthy of respect, can be cleansed only if he sits on a bed of dry grass behind some Kshatriya or Vaisya and gives him respect in that way. Listen, O Rajan, to my words on this subject. The sin that a Brahmana commits in a single night by serving a member of a lower varna, or by sporting with him in the same spot or on the same bed, can only by cleansed by sitting for three continuous years on a bed of grass behind a Kshatriya or Vaisya.

A falsehood, spoken in jest, or to a woman, is not sinful, O Rajan, nor one on the occasion of marriage, or for the benefit of one's guru, or to save one's own life; these five kinds of falsehood are said not to be sinful. One can acquire useful knowledge from even a man of low pursuits, with devotion and reverence. One can take up gold, without any scruple, from even an unclean place. A woman who is the ornament of her sex is acceptable from even a vile varna. Amrita, if extracted from poison, can be quaffed; water, women, jewels and other valuables can never be impure or unclean, according to the shastras. Even a Vaisya can take up weapons for his own safety, for the benefit of Brahmanas and cattle and on occasions of transfusion of varna.

Drinking alcohol, Brahmahatya, and the violation of the Acharya's bed are sins that, if committed consciously, have no reparation except death. The same can be said of stealing gold or a Brahmana's property. By drinking alcohol, having sexual congress with someone prohibited, mingling with a degraded person or, for a person of any of the other three varnas, having congress with a Brahmani, one becomes inevitably sullied. By mixing with such a person for one whole year in such matters as officiating in yagnas and teaching sexual congress, one too becomes corrupted. One, however, does not become so by mixing with a fallen person in such matters as riding on the same vehicle, sitting on the same seat, and eating in the same line.

Excluding the five grave sins mentioned above, all other sins have expiations prescribed for them by law, provided one does not indulge in them again. In the case of those who have been guilty of the first three of these five sins, drinking alcohol, Brahmahatya, and violation of the acharya's bed, there is no restriction on their surviving kinsmen about food and wearing ornaments, even if their funeral rites remain unperformed when they die. A Dharmatman should, in the observance of his dharma, discard his very friends and revered elders. In fact, until expiation is undertaken, the virtuous should not even talk with sinners.

A sinful man destroys his sin by acting virtuously afterwards and by tapasya. By calling a thief a thief, one incurs the sin of theft. By calling a man a thief who, however, is not a thief one incurs a sin twice the sin of theft. The maiden who suffers her virginity to be deflowered incurs three-fourths of the sin of killing a Brahmana, while the man who deflowers her incurs a sin equal to a fourth part of that of Brahmahatya.

By slandering or striking Brahmanas, one sinks in infamy for a hundred years, and by killing a Brahmana one sinks into hell for a thousand years. No one, therefore, should speak ill of a Brahmana or slay him. If a person strikes a Brahmana with a weapon, he will have to live in hell for as many years as the grains of dust that are soaked by the blood flowing from the wound. One guilty of foeticide becomes cleansed if he dies of wounds received in battle fought for the sake of cattle and Brahmanas. Casting himself on a blazing fire can also cleanse him.

A drinker of alcoholic liquors becomes cleansed by drinking hot alcohol. Burning his body with that hot drink, he gets cleansed through death in the other world. A Brahmana stained by such a sin obtains regions of felicity by such a course, not by any other. For violating the bed of a guru, the evil-souled and sinful wretch becomes cleansed by death from embracing a heated female figure of iron. Or, he could cut off his organ and testicles and, bearing them in his hands, he should go in a straight course towards the south-west and then end his life. He could also wash away his sin by dying in order to benefit a Brahmana, or by performing an Ashwamedha yagna or a cow-sacrifice or an Agnishtoma, and thus regain esteem both here and hereafter.

The slayer of a Brahmana should practise the vow of Brahmacharya for twelve years and devoting himself to tapasya and the life of a Muni, wander, holding all the while in his hands the skull of the slain, and proclaiming his sin to all. This is also the expiation provided for one who slays a pregnant woman, knowing her condition. The man who knowingly slays such a woman incurs double the sin that follows from Brahmanicide. A drinker of alcohol could regain his purity if he lived on frugal fare, practiced Brahmacharya vows, slept on the bare ground, performed for more than three years the sacrifice next to the Agnishtoma, and then gave away a thousand cattle with one bull.

For slaying a Vaisya one should perform such a sacrifice for two years and make a present of a hundred cattle with one bull, and for a Sudra, one should perform such a sacrifice for one year and make a present of a hundred cattle with one bull. For slaying a dog or bear or camel, one should perform the same penance laid down for the slaughter of a Sudra. For slaying a cat, a chasa, a frog, a crow, a reptile, or a rat, one says that, one incurs the sin of animal slaughter

O Rajan, I will now tell you of other kinds of expiations in their order. For all minor sins one should repent or practise some vow for one year. For congress with the wife of a Brahmana adept in the Vedas, one should for three years practise the vow of Brahmacharya, taking a little food at the fourth part of the day. For congress with any other woman who is not one's wife, one should undergo a similar penance for two years. For taking delight in a woman's company by sitting with her on the same spot or on the same seat, one should live only on water for three days to doing cleanse oneself. The same is laid down the same for one who defiles a blazing fire.

The shastras conclude that he who kills his father, mother or acharya, without adequate cause, is definitely disgraced, O Kurusthama. Only food and clothes should be given to a wife guilty of adultery or one confined in a prison. Indeed, the vows that the shastras lay down for a male guilty of adultery should also be applied to a woman. In the case of a woman who abandons her husband of a superior caste and has congress with a vile person of a lower varna, the king should cause her to be devoured by dogs in a public place, in the midst of a large concourse of spectators. A wise king should cause the male committing adultery under such circumstances to be placed upon a heated bed of iron and then, placing faggots underneath, burn the sinner. The same punishment, O Rajan, is provided for a woman guilty of adultery.

The sinner who does not perform expiation within a year of the commission of the sin incurs paapa that is double of what attaches to the original sin. One who associates with such a person for two years must wander over the earth, devoting himself to tapasya and living upon alms. One associating with a sinner for four years should adopt such a mode of life for five years.

If a younger brother weds before his elder brother, then all three, the elder brother, the younger brother and his wife, become tainted. To cleanse themselves, they should either observe the vows prescribed for one who has neglected his sacrificial fire, or practise the vow of Chandrayana for a month, or some other painful vow. The younger brother should give his wife to his unmarried elder brother and afterwards, with his permission, take her back. By such means all three can be cleansed of their sin.

By slaying animals except a cow, the slayer is not stained. The learned know that man has dominion over all the lower animals. A sinner, holding in his hand a yak-tail and an earthen pot, should go about proclaiming his sin. He should every day beg only from seven families and live upon what he thus obtains. By doing this for twelve days he can be cleansed of his sin. He who is unable to carry in his hand the yak-tail while practising the vow should observe the vow of the sannyasi for a whole year. Among men such expiation is the best.

For those who are able to practise charity, the shastras lay down the practice of in all such cases. By giving away only one cow, those who have faith and dharma can cleanse themselves. One who eats or drinks the flesh, ordure or urine, of a dog, a boar, a man, a cock, or a camel must have his investiture of the sacred thread re-performed. If a soma-drinking Brahmana inhales the scent of alcohol from the mouth of one who has drunk it, he should drink warm water for three days or warm milk for the same period. Alternatively, drinking warm water for three days, he should live for that period upon air alone. These are the eternal injunctions laid down for the expiation of sin, especially for a Brahmana who has committed these offences through ignorance and want of judgment.'" Vaisampayana said, "Upon the completion of this speech, Nakula, an accomplished swordsman, questions the Kuru Pitamaha lying on his bed of arrows.

Nakula says, 'The bow, O Pitamaha, is regarded in this world as the foremost of weapons. I, however, prefer the sword, O Rajan, for when the bow is cut off or broken, when horses are dead or weakened, a good warrior, well-trained in swordsmanship, can protect himself with his sword. He can single-handedly withstand many bowmen, or adversaries armed with maces and darts. I have this doubt, and I am curious to know the truth. O Rajan, which is really the greatest weapon in battle? How and for what purpose was the sword created? Who was the first guru of the weapon? Tell me all this, O Pitamaha.'" Vaisampayana continued, "Hearing these words of the intelligent son of Madri, the virtuous Bhishma, the supreme master of the science of archery, as he lay stretched upon his bed of arrows, answers the high-souled adept Nakula, Drona's disciple, in profound and melodious words, displaying his considerable knowledge on the subject.

Bhishma says, 'Hear the truth, O son of Madri, about what you have asked me. Your question has caused my excited heart to send a flow of blood through my wounds like a hill of red chalk. In ancient times the universe was one vast expanse of water, motionless and skyless, and without this earth occupying any space in it. Enveloped in darkness and intangible, its aspect was exceedingly awesome. In extent it was immeasurable, and utter silence reigned over all.

In his own proper time the Pitamaha of the universe took his birth. He then created the wind and fire, and the sun also of great energy. He also created the sky, the heavens, the nether regions, earth, the directions, the firmament with the moon and the stars, the constellations, the planets, the year, the seasons, the months, the two fortnights, lighted and dark, and the smaller divisions of time.

The divine Pitamaha, then, assuming a visible form, obtained by the power of his will some sons of great tejas. They are the sages Marichi, Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, Vasishtha, Angiras, the mighty and powerful lord Rudra and Prachetas. The last begot Daksha, who in his turn had sixty daughters. Maharishis took away all these daughters with the object of fathering children upon them. From them sprang all the creatures of the universe, including the Devas, Pitris, Gandharvas, Apsaras, diverse kinds of Rakshasas, birds and animals and fishes, monkeys, great snakes and diverse species of fowl that range the air or sport on the water, as well as vegetables, and all oviparous or viviparous beings or those born of filth. Thus the whole universe of animate and inanimate creatures sprang into existence.

The universal Pitamaha, having thus summoned into existence all mobile and immobile creatures, then promulgated the eternal religion laid down in the Vedas. That was accepted by the Devas, with their Gurus, priests, the Adityas, the Vasus, the Rudras, the Sadhyas, the Maruts, the Aswins, Bhrigu, Atri, Angiras, the Siddhas, Kasyapa rich in penances, Vasishtha, Gautama, Agastya, Narada, Parvata, the Valikhilya Rishis, those other Rishis known under the names of Prabhasas, the Sikatas, the Ghritapas, the Somavayavyas, the Vaiswanaras, Marichipas, the Akrishtas, the Hansas, those born of Fire, the Vanaprasthas, and the Prasnis. All of them obeyed Brahman.

The foremost of the Danavas, however, yielding to wrath and covetousness in the night, and against the Pitamaha's commands, began to cause the destruction of dharma. They were Hiranyakasipu, Hiranyaksha, Virochana, Samvara, Viprachitti, Prahlada, Namuchi and Vali. These and many other Daityas and Danavas, transcending all restraints of duty and religion, sported and took delight in all kinds of evil deeds. Regarding themselves equal in point of birth with the Devas, they began to challenge them and the sages of pure behaviour. They never did any good to the other creatures of the universe or showed compassion for any of them. Disregarding the three well-known means, they began to persecute and afflict all, wielding the rod of chastisement. Indeed, the greatest of Asuras, filled with pride, abandoned every friendly interaction with other creatures.

The divine Brahman, accompanied by the sages, went to a delightful summit of Himavat a hundred yojanas in area, adorned with diverse kinds of jewels and gems, upon whose surface the stars seemed to rest like so many lotuses on a lake. On that prince of mountains, overgrown with forests of flowering trees, the greatest of the gods, Brahman, remained to carry out the business of the world. After the lapse of a thousand years, the powerful god made arrangements for a grand yagna, according to the forms laid down in the scriptures. The sacrificial altar was arrayed with Rishis adept in performing all yagnas, with faggots of sacrificial fuel and blazing fires, and embellished with beautiful sacrificial plates and vessels all made of gold. All the chief gods took their seats on the platform which further scintillated with the presence of high regenerate Rishis.

I have heard from the Rishis that soon something very awful occurred in that sacrifice. A creature appeared whose splendour equalled that of the Moon himself, when he rises in the star-studded firmament. Tall, lean, and dark with gleaming, sharp teeth, scattering the flames around him, he seemed irresistible and possessed of surpassing energy. Seeing him materialize, the earth trembled and the Ocean became agitated with tall waves and terrifying eddies. Meteors foreboding catastrophe shot through the sky. Inauspicious winds began to blow, branches of trees came crashing down, and all the points of the compass became unquiet. Creatures began to quake with dread. Seeing the fearful agitation of the universe at the entity which had sprung from the sacrificial fire, the Pitamaha said to the great Rishis, the Devas, and the Gandharvas, "It was I who thought into existence this being of powerful tejas. His name is Asi, sword. I have created him for the protection of the world and the destruction of the enemies of the gods."

The being, abandoning the form he first assumed, then took the shape of a sword of great magnificence, highly polished and sharp-edged, which rose like the instrument of annihilation at the end of the Yuga. Then Brahma handed over that sharp weapon to the blue-throated Rudra, to enable him to put down irreligion and sin. At this, the divine Rudra of immeasurable soul, whose emblem on his banner is Nandi, the foremost of bulls, whom the Maharishis praised, took up the sword and assumed a different shape. Putting forth four arms, he grew so tall that, though standing on the earth, he touched the very sun with his head. With eyes turned upwards and with every limb extended, he began to vomit flames of fire from his mouth. Assuming diverse colours in his complexion, turning from blue to white to red, wearing a black deer-skin studded with stars of gold, he bore on his forehead a third eye resembling the sun in splendour. His other two eyes, one of which was black and the other tawny, glittered brightly. The divine Mahadeva, the bearer of the Sula, lacerater of the eyes of Bhaga, took up the sword whose splendour resembled that of the all-destructive Yuga fire. Wielding an immense shield with three high bosses which looked like a mass of dark clouds adorned with flashes of lightning, he began to perform diverse transformations. Mighty and powerful, he began to whirl the sword in the sky, hungry for an encounter. Loud were the roars he uttered, and terrifying the bellow of his laughter. Indeed, O Bhaarata, Rudra's form was exceedingly fearsome.

The Danavas, hearing that Rudra had assumed the form in order to undertake fierce deeds, began to advance upon him exultantly with great velocity, showering huge rocks upon him as they came, blazing brands of wood, and several terrible weapons made of iron, each as sharp as a razor. The Danava host, however, witnessing the swelling might of the indestructible Rudra, soon began to tremble with fear. Although Rudra was alone and single-handed, he moved on the battle-field like quicksilver, sword in hand, so that the Asuras thought there were a thousand identical Rudras battling with them.

Tearing, piercing, afflicting, cutting, lopping off and grinding down, the Mahadeva moved among the masses of his foes like a forest fire raging through heaps of dry grass. The mighty Asuras, broken by the god whirling his sword, their arms, thighs and chests cut off and pierced, their heads severed from their trunks, began to fall down on the earth. Others among the Danavas, wounded by the strokes of the sword, broke and fled in all directions, inciting one another to escape. Some plunged into the bowels of the earth, others found cover under mountains, some went upwards and others dived into the depths of the sea.

As the dreadful and fierce battle progressed, the earth became mired with flesh and blood, and horrible sights were to be seen all around. Strewn with the fallen bodies of blood-drenched Danavas, the earth appeared overspread with mountains covered with Kinsukas, or like a beautiful woman attired in crimson robes, intoxicated with alcohol. After the Danavas had been slain and Dharma re-established on earth, the auspicious Rudra cast off his terrifying form and assumed his own benevolent shape.

All the Rishis and celestials then worshipped the Deva of gods with loud acclamations and hailed his conquest. The divine Rudra, gave the sword, the protector of religion, dyed with the blood of Danavas, with due worship to Vishnu. He presented it to the divine Marichi, who gave it to all the Maharishis, who in turn passed it on to Vasava. Vasava presented it to the Regents of the world, O Yudhishtara, who gave that large sword to Manu, the son of Surya.

At the time they gave it to Manu, they said, “You are the lord of all men. Protect all creatures with this sword that contains religion within its womb, meting out punishment to those who have transgressed dharma for the sake of the body or the mind. They should be protected in conformity with the law, never according to caprice. Some should be punished with oral rebukes, fines and forfeitures. Loss of limb or death should never be inflicted for slight reasons. These punishments should be regarded as diverse forms of the sword, of which verbal censure is the first. These are the shapes that the sword assumes as a result of the transgressions of men under protection.”

In time, Manu installed his own son Kshupa as the sovereign of all creatures, and gave him the sword for their protection. From Kshupa, Ikshvaku took it, and Pururavas from Ikshvaku. From Pururavas, Ayus took it, and Nahusha from him. From Nahusha, Yayati took it, and Puru from Yayati. From Puru Amurtarya took it, and from him it descended to the royal Bhumisaya. From Bhumisaya to Dushmanta’s son Bhaarata. From Bhaarata, O Rajan, to righteous Ailavila. From Ailavila king Dhundumara took it and from Dhundumara Kamvoja took it, and from Kamvoja, Muchukunda. From Muchukunda Marutta took it, and from Marutta Raivata. From Raivata Yuvanaswa took it, and from Yuvanaswa Raghu. From Raghu the valiant Harinaswa took it. From Harinaswa Sunaka took the sword and from him the Dharmatman Usinara. From the last the Bhojas and the Yadavas took it and Sivi from the Yadus. From Sivi it descended to Pratardana. From Pratardana Ashtaka received it, and from Ashtaka by Prishadaswa. From Prishadaswa Bharadwaja received it, and from the last Drona. After Drona Kripa took it. From Kripa, you and your brothers obtained that best of swords. The constellation under which the sword was born is Krittika. Agni is its deity, and Rohini is its Gotra. Rudra is its great acharya.

The sword has eight names, not generally known. Listen to me as I reveal them to you. If one mentions these, O son of Pandu, one can always win victory. The names then are Asi, Vaisasana, Khadga, Sharp-edged, Difficult of Acquisition, Sirgarbha, Victory, and Protector of Righteousness. Of all weapons, son of Madravati, the sword is the foremost. The Puranas truly declare that it was first wielded by Mahadeva. As regards the bow, again, Parantapa, it was Prithu who first created it. It was with the aid of this weapon that that son of Vena, while he governed the earth virtuously for many years, milked her of crops and grain in profusion. It becomes you, son of Madri, to regard what the Rishis have said, as conclusive proof. All men skilled in battle should worship the sword. I have now told you truly the first portion of your query, in detail, about the origin and creation of the sword, Bharatarishabha! One who listens to this excellent story of the origin of the sword will succeed in winning fame in this world and eternal felicity in the next.'" Vaisampayana said, “When Bhishma falls silent, Yudhishtira and the others return home. The king, addressing his brothers, with Vidura forming the fifth, says, ‘The course of the world rests upon dharma, artha, and kama. Among these three, which is the greatest, the second, and the last, in point of importance? For subduing the triple aggregate, upon which of the first three should the mind concentrate? It becomes you all to answer this question truthfully and cheerfully.’

The highly intelligent Vidura, familiar with the science of artha, with the course of the world and with truth, first speaks, recollecting the contents of the shastras. Vidura says, ‘Study of the various shastras, asceticism, gift, faith, performance of yagnas, forgiveness, sincerety of disposition, compassion, truth, self-restraint, these constitute benefits of dharma. Adopt dharma, never let your heart stray from it. Both dharma and artha have their roots in these, and all these are capable of being included in one term. It is by dharma that the Rishis have crossed sansara. It is upon dharma that the worlds depend for their existence, that the Devas attained their position of superiority. It is upon dharma that artha rests. The wise say that dharma, O Rajan, is highest in point of punya, artha is in the middle and kama is the lowest of the three. For this reason, one should live with restrained soul, paying attention primarily to dharma. One should also behave towards all creatures as towards oneself.’

After Vidura, Pritha’s son Arjuna, well skilled in the science of Artha, and conversant with the truths of both dharma and artha, urged on by the drift of Yudhishtira's question, says, 'This world, O Rajan, is the field of action, and therefore one lauds action. Agriculture, trade, cattle-rearing and diverse arts constitute artha, which is the end of all such actions. The Srutis declare that without artha or dana, both dharma and moha cannot be won. Even men of uncleansed souls, if they have diverse kinds of Wealth, are able to perform the highest deeds of dharma and gratify desires apparently difficult to attain. The Sruti declares both dharma and moha to be the limbs of dana. Through artha, both dharma and objects of moha can be gained. Just as all creatures worship Brahman, even men of superior birth worship a wealthy man. Even those attired in deer-skins and bearing matted locks on their heads, self-restrained men who smear their bodies with mire, who have their senses under complete control, even shaven-headed Brahmacharins, and those who live separated from one another, cherish a need for wealth. The excellence of dana is attested by those attired in yellow robes, bearing long beards, graced with modesty, learned, contented, and freed from all attachments; those following the practices of their ancestors, and their respective duties and others desirous of heaven, believers and unbelievers, and rigid practitioners of the highest yoga. It is said that he who gives his dependants objects of enjoyment, and afflicts his foes with punishments truly possesses dana. Even this O best of intelligent men, is truly my opinion. However, listen now to these two speak.'

The two sons of Madri, Nakula and Sahadeva, then say, 'Sitting or lying, walking and standing, one should strive to acquire dana even by the most vigorous means. If one obtains dana, which is highly prized and difficult to acquire, one is certain to get all the objects of moha. The dana which is connected with dharma, and also the dharma which is connected with dana, is certainly like amrita. For this reason, our opinions are that one without wealth cannot gratify any moha; similarly, there can be no dana in one lacking dharma. He who is outside the pale of both dharma and dana, is therefore to the world an object of fear. For this reason, one should seek dana devotedly but without disregarding the requirements of dharma. They who believe this succeed in acquiring whatever they desire. One should first practise dharma; next acquire dana without sacrificing dharma; and then seek the gratification of moha, for this should be the last action of one who has been successful in acquiring wealth.'" Vaisampayana continues, "The twin sons of the Aswins then fall silent, and Bhimasena begins to speak. 'One without moha never wishes for dana.

One without moha never wishes for dharma. One without moha never feels any wish. For this reason, moha is the greatest of all the three. It is under the influence of moha that the very Rishis devote themselves to tapasyas, subsisting upon fruits or living only upon roots or air. Similarly, others who have Vedic knowledge study the Vedas and their branches, or rites of faith and sacrifice, or on making or accepting gifts. Traders, agriculturists, keepers of cattle, artists, artisans, and those who are employed in rites of propitiation, all work from moha. There are some who dive into the depths of the ocean, induced by moha. Indeed the principle of moha takes various forms and pervades everything. A man outside the pale of moha never is, was, or will be, seen in this world.

This is the truth, O Rajan. Both dharma and artha are based upon moha. Just as butter represents the essence of curds, moha is the essence of artha and dharma. Oil is better than oil-seeds, ghee is better than sour milk, and flowers and fruits are better than wood. Similarly, moha is better than dharma and artha. As honeyed juice is extracted from flowers, so moha is extracted from these two. It is the parent of dharma and artha, and the soul of both. Without moha the Brahmanas would never receive sweets or wealth, without moha the diverse kinds of action evident in the world would never occur. For these reasons, moha is the best of the triple aggregate.

Attired in excellent robes, adorned with every ornament, and exhilarated with sweet wines, you approach beautiful damsels to sport with them. Moha, O Rajan, should be for us the greatest of the three. Reflecting upon the question to its very roots, this is the conclusion to which I have come. Do not hesitate to accept it, O Dharmaputra! My words, not hollow but loaded with dharma, will be acceptable to all good men. Dharma, artha, and moha should all be minded equally. He who devotes himself to only one of them is certainly not a superior man. He who devotes himself to only two of them, is average, but he who attends to all the three is the best of his species.' Having said these words briefly and comprehensively to the heroes, the wise Bhima, smeared with sandal-paste, adorned with beautiful garlands and ornaments, and surrounded by friends, falls silent.

Then king Yudhishtira the Just, that most learned of virtuous men, duly reflecting for a while upon the words spoken by everyone and considering them all to be false philosophy, says, 'Without doubt, all of you have settled conclusions in respect of the shastras, and all of you know what the authorities say. I have heard the words you have spoken with such certainty, so listen now with concentrated attention to what I say. He who is not employed in punya or in paapa, he who does not attend to artha or dharma or moha, who is above all faults, who regards equally gold and a brickbat, becomes liberated from pleasure and pain and the need to accomplish his purposes. All creatures are subject to birth and death, and are liable to change and decay. Awakened repeatedly by the benefits and evils of existence, all of them applaud mukti. We do not know, however, what mukti is. The self-born and divine Brahma says that there is no mukti for one bound by ties of attachment and affection. The learned, however, seek Nirvana. For this reason, one should never regard anything as either agreeable or disagreeable. This view seems to be the best. No one in this world can do as he pleases. I work precisely as I am made to act. The great Ordainer, who makes all creatures proceed as He wills, is supreme. Understand that no one can, by his deeds, get what is unobtainable; whatever is to be, will be. And since he who has withdrawn himself from the triple aggregate can win mukti, it is clear that mukti produces the highest good.'"

Vaisampayana continued, "Having heard these significant, reasonable and persuasive words of Yudhishtira, Bhima and others are filled with delight and joining their hands, bow to the Kuru prince and applaud him. Indeed, O Rajan, hearing the beautifully turned speech of the king, so agreeable to the heart, so well adorned with sweet syllables and devoid of discordance and dissonance, those foremost of men begin to applaud Yudhishtira enthusiastically. The high-souled son of Dharma, of great tejas, in turn praises his auditors. Then, once more, the king addresses the great soul, Gangaputra, questioning him about dharma."

"Yudhishtira says, 'O Pitamaha, you who are great in wisdom, I will ask you a question which I trust you will answer completely, O enhancer of the happiness of the Kurus. What kind of men are of gentle disposition? With whom can the most agreeable friendship exist? Tell us also who are always able to do good, now and later. I am of the opinion that neither immense wealth, nor relatives, nor kinsmen occupy the place of friends who wish us well. A friend who will listen to beneficial advice and will also do good, is exceedingly rare. O Mahatman, discourse fully on these topics.'

Bhishma replies, 'Listen to me, O Yudhishtira, as I tell you in detail of men with whom friendships may and may not be formed. You should avoid one who is covetous; one who is ruthless; one who has renounced the duties of his varna; one who is mean, cruel, or suspicious of all; one who is idle or procrastinates; one who is of a crooked disposition, who is an object of universal disgrace, who brings dishonour to his Guru; one of sinful practices, wedded to sin, addicted to the seven well-known vices; one of an evil soul, shameless, whose sight is always directed towards sin; one who is an atheist, a slanderer of the Vedas; one whose senses are not controlled, who transgresses all restraints, who gives free indulgence to lust; one who is untruthful, deceitful and a rogue; one who is foolish; one who is envious, whose conduct is bad, whose soul has not been cleansed; one who is a gambler, one who is deserted by all, and one who abandons or seeks to injure friends,

You should shun that wicked soul, O Bharatarishabha, who is never satisfied with what another may give him according to his means; who becomes angry on occasions that do not justify anger and wrangles without cause; who is restless of mind, a sinful person; who is never pleased with his friends, has no scruple in deserting well-meaning friends, and quarrels with friends when they do him a very slight injury or unintentionally inflict on him a wrong; one who speaks like a friend but acts like an enemy; a wretch of perverse perceptions who is always mindful of his self-interest but blind to his own good; one who never takes delight in what is good for himself or others.

Avoid one who drinks alcoholic liquors; one who is engaged in killing living creatures; one who hates others, is wrathful and without compassion; one who is pained at the sight of others' happiness; one who injures friends, is ungrateful and vile. Never form alliances of friendship with any of them, or with one who is always intent upon pointing out the faults of others.

Listen now to me as I specify those with whom alliances can be formed. Kings should accept those who are well-born, from good families, and perpetuators of their races; those possessed of agreeable qualities, eloquence and politeness of speech, varied knowledge and science; those who have accomplishments and merit, who have no faults; those who are free from covetousness and avarice; those who are never exhausted by hard work; those who are good to their friends, grateful, and firm in truth; those who have subdued their senses and are devoted to athletic and other exercises; those who are famous for forming alliances of friendship.

You should regard as persons worthy of friendship, O Rajan, those who are contented if one treats them according to the best of one's powers, who do not get angry on occasions that do not justify anger and are never displeased without sufficient cause; those who know well the science of Artha and who, even when annoyed, succeed in keeping their minds tranquil; those who devote themselves to the service of friends at personal sacrifice; those who are never estranged from friends but continue unchanged in their attachment like a blanket made of wool that retains its colour; those who never spurn anyone for being poor, who never dishonour young women by yielding to lust and loss of judgment; those who are trustworthy, who never point out the wrong way to friends; those who are devoted to the practice of dharma, who look equally on gold and brickbats; those who adhere with firmness to friends and well-wishers; and those who muster their own people to accomplish the business of friends, disregarding their own dignity and status. Indeed, the dominions of a king who befriends such superior men will spread in every direction like the light of the lord of the stars.

Alliances should be formed with men who are experts in weaponry, who have subdued their anger, who are always strong in battle and are of high birth, good behaviour and varied accomplishments. Among the vicious men that I have mentioned, O Rajan, the vilest are those who are ungrateful and who injure friends. Everyone should avoid these men of evil conduct. That much is certain.'

Yudhishtira says, 'I want to hear in detail a description of those who are injurers of friends and ungrateful persons.'

Bhishma replies, 'I will narrate to you an old story of what happened in the country of the Mlecchas to the north. There was a certain Brahmana belonging to the middle country, without any Vedic learning, who entered a prosperous village of hunters to beg for alms. In that village lived a wealthy robber, conversant with the distinctive features of all the varnas, who was devoted to the Brahmanas, firm in truth, and always engaged in charity. Going to the den of that robber, the Brahmana begged for alms, including a house to live in and such necessities of life as would last a year. The robber also bestowed on him a piece of new cloth and a young widowed woman. The Brahmana, Gautama, was filled with delight and began to live happily in the spacious house which the robber chief assigned to him, accommodating as well the relatives and kinsmen of the female slave he had been given. In this way he lived for many years in that prosperous village of hunters.

Gautama also began assiduously to practise archery and every day, like the other robbers living there, went into the vana and slaughtered wild cranes and other living creatures in great numbers. Through his intimacy with the robbers he soon forgot compassion, grew adept at killing creatures and became like one of the band. Living happily in that robber village for many months, he slew large numbers of wild cranes.

One day a Brahmana came to the village, clad in rags and deer-skins, with matted locks on his head. Pure of conduct, he was proficient in his study of the Vedas, humble in his disposition, frugal of habit, devoted to Brahmanas, and observant of Brahmacharya vows. The Brahmana belonged to Gautama's native area and had been his dear friend. In the course of his wanderings, he had come to the robber village where Gautama now lived. Since he never accepted food given by a Sudra, he began to search for the house of a Brahmana from where he could receive hospitality. Roving through the village infested with robber-families, he finally arrived at Gautama's house, just as he was returning home from the vana. Gautama was armed with bow and sword, carrying a load of slaughtered cranes, his body smeared with the blood that trickled down from the bag on his shoulders. The two friends met.

Recognising the man who had fallen away from the pure practices of the varna of his birth and now resembled a cannibal, the newly-arrived guest exploded: "What folly is this! You are a Brahmana, and the perpetuator of a Brahmana family. Born in a respectable family belonging to the middle country, how have you become a robber? Recollect, Muni, your famous kinsmen of earlier times, who were all well versed in the Vedas. Alas, born in their varna, you have become a stigma to it! Awaken yourself by your own exertions, O Muni, recollect the energy, the conduct, the learning, the self-restraint, the compassion that are yours, and abandon this present abode!"

Gautama answered him, great moved by the words of his well-meaning friend, "O Maharishi, I am poor and have no knowledge of the Vedas. Understand, O best of Brahmanas, that I abide here for the sake of wealth alone. However, today the sight of you is a blessing to me. We shall leave this place together tomorrow. Spend the night here with me."

The newly-arrived Brahmana, through compassion, passed the night there, but refrained from touching anything. Indeed, though hungry and invited repeatedly to eat, the guest refused to touch any food in that house.'"

"Bhishma says, 'When the night had passed, O Bhaarata, and that best of Brahmanas had left, Gautama emerged from his house and walked towards the sea. On the way he fell in with some merchants setting out to voyage on the ocean, and with them he proceeded onwards. It so happened, O Rajan, that while the large merchant caravan was passing through a valley, an elephant in musth assailed it and killed almost everyone. Having escaped the peril somehow, the Brahmana fled northwards to save his life, not knowing where he was going. Parted from the caravan and far from where he started out, he began to wander alone in a forest like a Kimpurusha.

At last he came upon the road that led to the ocean, and on it he journeyed till he reached a forest abounding with flowering trees, inhabited by Yakshas and Kinnaras. Marvellous mango trees that put forth flowers and fruits throughout the year adorned that vana, in splendour like the very Nandana in Swarga. Salas, palmyras, tamalas with clusters of black aloes, and many venerable sandal trees also grew there. Upon that delightful tableland, fragrant with manifold perfumes, birds of various species poured forth their melodies. Winged creatures called Bharundas, with human faces, Bhulingas, and other birds belonging to mountainous regions and the sea, warbled sweetly.

Gautama made his way through the vana, absorbed in the mellifluous strains of birdsong. He came upon a level spot of land covered with golden sands, like Swarga itself in beauty. On the plot stood a towering and graceful nyagrodha with a spherical crown with many branches extending like a cupola over the plain, each branch like the parent tree in beauty and size. The area beneath the magnificent tree was drenched with water perfumed with heady sandal.

So enchanting was the place that it seemed to him a garden in the sabha of Brahma himself. Gautama was entranced by this auspicious glade, like the home of a Deva, and sat down with a contended heart. O son of Kunti, a delicious breeze, laden with the perfume of many kinds of flowers, began to blow softly, cooling his limbs and filling him with bliss. Fanned by that redolent breeze, the Brahmana was overcome by a fine languor and fell asleep.

Meanwhile the sun set behind the Asta hills in the west and, with the advance of twilight, a marvellous bird, the foremost of its kind, returned from the realm of Brahma to that magical glade which was his home. Nadijangha was his name and he was a prince of cranes, the wise son of sage Kasyapa, and a dear friend of the Creator. He was also well known on earth by the name of Rajadharman. Indeed, he surpassed all in fame and wisdom. The child of a celestial maiden, herself possessed of great beauty and learning, he was like a Deva in splendour. Adorned with many ornaments as brilliant as the sun, Rajadharman blazed with beauty. Seeing that amazing bird, Gautama was filled with wonder. But, exhausted and ravaged as he was by hunger and thirst, the Brahmana could only stare at the bird with the thought of killing it for food.

Rajadharman said affectionately, in exquisite human speech, “Welcome, O Brahmana! It is my great good fortune that has brought you to my home. The sun has set, and twilight is here. You are today my dear and precious guest. Let me worship you according to the rites laid down in the shastras, and you can go where you want tomorrow morning.”””

"Bhishma says, 'Hearing these sweet words, Gautama was astonished. Seized with great curiosity, he gazed fixedly at Rajadharman, who said, "O Brahmana, I am the son of Kasyapa by one of the daughters of the sage Daksha Prajapati. Welcome, O foremost of Brahmanas of great merit, you are my guest today."

After he offered him hospitality according to the rites laid down in the shastras, the crane made an excellent couch of the Sala flowers that lay all around. He also offered Gautama several large fish caught from the deep waters of the Bhagirathi, and offered his guest a blazing fire. After the Brahmana had eaten and was sated, the bird, possessed of tapodhana, the bounty of penances, began to fan him with his wings to drive away Gautama's fatigue.

Seeing his guest seated at his case, he questioned him about his ancestry. Gautama answered, "I am a Brahmana and my name is Gautama," and then fell silent. The bird made his guest a soft bed of tender leaves strewn with fragrant flowers. Gautama lay down on it, and was contented. The eloquent son of Kasyapa, who was like Yama himself in his knowledge of dharma, asked him about how and why he had come there. Gautama answered him, "I am very poor, O Mahatman. I want to go to the sea to earn wealth for myself."

The son of Kasyapa cheerfully told him: "Do not be anxious, you will succeed, O best of Brahmanas, and return home with much wealth. The sage Brihaspati has spoken of four means to acquire wealth: inheritance, sudden luck or the favour of the Devas, by labour, and through the aid or kindness of friends. I have become your friend. I cherish kind feelings towards you, and I will exert myself to help you acquire wealth."

The night faded and morning came. Seeing his guest rise refreshed from bed, the crane said to him, "Go, friend, follow this very route and you are sure to succeed. At the distance of about three yojanas from this place, there is a strong and mighty king of the Rakshasas. His name is Virupaksha, and he is a friend of mine. Go to him, O Brahmanottama. At my request, Virupaksha will surely give you as much wealth as you want."

Thus, Yudhishtira, Gautama cheerfully set out from that place, eating to his fill, on the way, fruits sweet as amrita. Gazing at the sandal, aloe and birch trees that stood along the road and enjoying their refreshing shade, the Brahmana went along quickly till he reached the city of Meruvraja. It had lofty archways and high walls of stone, and was surrounded by a deep moat. Large rocks and engines of defence were kept ready on the ramparts. Gautama was announced to the intelligent Rakshasa as a guest sent to him by his friend the crane, and received very gladly.

O Yudhishtira, the king of the Rakshasas ordered his attendants, "Let Gautama be fetched here immediately." At the king's command, his men, quick as hawks, went from his splendid palace to the gate and accosted Gautama, "You may have heard of our king Virupaksha, of boundless courage. He is impatient to see you. Make haste, do not tarry."

The Brahmana forgot his toil, in his surprise, and ran with the messengers. He was awestruck by the great affluence of the city and filled with wonder. Soon he entered the king's palace in the company of the messengers, agog for a sight of the king of the Rakshasas.'"

"Bhishma says, 'Gautama was led into a spacious apartment, and introduced to the king of the Rakshasas. Virupaksha welcomed him with the customary offerings and gave him an opulent seat to make him comfortable. The king asked him about his antecedents and his practices, his study of the Vedas and his observance of the Brahmacharya vow. The Brahmana, however, only stated his name and vamsa, without answering his other queries.

The king, seeing that his visitor was destitute of Brahmanic splendour and Vedic knowledge, went on to ask about his country of residence. He asked, "Where do you live, O blessed one, and to what vamsa does your wife belong? Speak truly, do not fear. Trust us without anxiety."

Gautama said, "I belong by birth to the middle country. I live in a village of hunters. I married a Sudra woman, a widow. This is the truth."

Bhishma continues, 'The king then began to reflect as to what he should do, and how he might acquire punya. He thought to himself, "This man is by birth a Brahmana and a friend of the high-souled Rajadharman who has sent him to me. I must do what is agreeable to my beloved friend. He is is my brother, a dear relative and a true friend of my heart.

On this day of this month of Kartika, a thousand of the foremost Brahmanas are to be entertained in my house. This Gautama also shall be entertained with them, and I shall give wealth to him too. This is a sacred day and Gautama has come here to me as a guest. The wealth that is to be given away to the Brahmanas is ready. What is there, then, to think about?"

Even as Virupaksha was pondering this, a thousand learned Brahmanas came to the palace, purified by baths, anointed with sandalwood paste and flowers, attired in long robes of linen. The Rakshasa king received the guests according to the rites laid down in the shastras. At his command, O best of the Bhaaratas, skins were spread out for them for them to sit upon. The royal servants placed mats of kusa grass on the ground.

Those thousand Dvijottamas, having been duly honoured by the king sat down on those kusasanas. The Rakshasa chief ritually worshipped his guests, as decreed by the shastras, with sesame seeds, green blades of grass and water. Those among them who were selected to represent the Viswedevas, the Pitris and the deities of fire, were smeared with sandal-paste and received flowers as well as other kinds of costly offerings. After such worship, every one of them looked as effulgent as the moon in the heavens.

Then bright and polished plates of gold, adorned with engravings, and filled with excellent food prepared with ghee and honey, were laid before those Brahmanas. Every year on the days of full moon of the months of Ashadha and Magha, a large number of Brahmanas would be honoured thus by the Rakshasa chief and fed the rarest delicacies they could desire.

On the day of the full moon in the month of Kartika, after the end of autumn, the king used to give to the Brahmanas diverse wealth—gold, silver, priceless jewels and gems, pearls, magnificent diamonds, lapis lazuli, deer-skins, and hides of the Ranku deer. Indeed, O Bhaarata, having piled up a heap of wealth of many kinds to distribute as Dakshina to his blessed guests, the mighty Virupaksha would say to those Brahmanottamas, "Take from these jewels and gems as much as you wish and can carry away." He also used to urge them, "Take these plates of gold and vessels which you have used for your meal and go your way, O foremost of Brahmanas."

Invited by the high-souled Rakshasa king, those bulls among Brahmanas took as much wealth as each desired. Worshipped with treasures and clothed in excellent robes, those best of Brahmanas were elated. Meanwhile Virupaksha restrained the Rakshasas that had come to his palace from diverse lands and said again to the thousand Brahmanas, "This one day, regenerate ones, have no fear from the Rakshasas here. Sport as you wish, then leave us quickly when your hearts are full."

The Brahmanas then, having taken all they wanted, streamed out of Virupaksha's city with celerity. Losing no time, Gautama also took a sizeable quantity of gold and went his way. Carrying his burden with difficulty, he reached that same banyan under which he had met the crane. He sat himself down, exhausted and hungry.

While Gautama was resting there, O king, that best of birds Rajadharman came to him. Devoted to his friends, the marvellous krauncha gladdened Gautama by bidding him a warm welcome. Flapping his wings, he fanned his guest to dispel his fatigue. The wise crane worshipped Gautama, and made arrangements for his food.

Having eaten and refreshed himself, Gautama began to think, "Moved by greed and foolishness, I have taken this heavy load of bright gold. I have a long way to travel and no food to eat on my journey. How will I keep myself going?" He thought and thought, but could not devise how he would find any food to eat on his way home. Then, O Naravyaghra, a vile thought struck him, ungrateful as he was: "This prince of cranes, so large and amply fleshed, is here by my side. I will remain here quietly until I bag him, and then leave this spot and travel with great speed.""

"Bhishma says, 'There, under that majestic banyan tree, the prince of birds had kindled and kept up a fire with high and blazing flames for the warmth and protection of his guest. On one side of the fire, the bird slept trustfully. The ungrateful and evil-souled wretch, with a flaming branch from that very fire, killed his sleeping host. He was delighted at having dispatched the crane, never thinking that he had committed a sin. Peeling off the feathers and skin, he roasted the flesh on the fire. Then, taking the cooked meat up with the gold he had brought, the Brahmana departed quickly from the glade of golden sand and the great nyagrodha tree.

The next day, the Rakshasa king Virupaksha, said to his son, "Alas, my son, I do not see Rajadharman, that best of birds, even today. Every morning he goes to the abode of Brahma to worship the Pitamaha, and never returns home without paying me a visit. Two mornings and two nights have passed without him visiting me and my mind is not at peace. Go and enquire after my friend.

Gautama, who came here, is without Vedic learning and Brahmanic tejas. He has found his way to the abode of my friend. I greatly fear that worst of Brahmanas has slain Rajadharman. I saw through him by the signs he showed of an evil mind and evil ways. Of cruel and grim visage, without compassion, that vile man is like a robber. This Gautama has gone to the abode of my friend, and my heart has grown very anxious. Fly, my son, to Rajadharman's home and find out whether that pure-souled bird is still alive. Hurry!"

The prince, accompanied by other Rakshasas, set forth with great speed and, at the foot of the banyan, beheld the remains of Rajadharman. Sobbing with grief, the son of the Rakshasa king ran as fast as he could to seize Gautama. The Rakshasas did not have to go far before they caught the Brahmana and found on him the remains of Rajadharman, without wings, bones and feet. The Rakshasas hastened to Meruvraja with their captive. They showed the king the mutilated body of Rajadharman, and thrust the ungrateful sinner down at his feet.

Seeing the remains of his friend, the king, with his counsellors and priest, began to weep aloud. Indeed, the voices of lamentation were heard in his home and in the entire city of the Rakshasa king, as men, women, and children were plunged in grief. The king then said to his son, "Let this sinful wretch be slain, and let these Rakshasas here feast on his flesh. He is of sinful deeds, sinful habits, sinful soul, and inured to sin. You must kill this brute yourself."

Though commanded by their king, many fearsome Rakshasas of terrible prowess declared their unwillingness to eat the flesh of that sinner. Indeed, those wanderers of the night said to the king, "Let this vilest of men be given away to the cannibals of the forest." Bending their heads to their king, they told him, "It does not become you to give us this sinful wretch for our food." The king said, "Tathaastu! Let this ungrateful creature then be given to the man-eating brigands without delay."

The Rakshasas, armed with lances and battle-axes, hacked that vile wretch into pieces and gave his flesh away to the cannibals. However, even they refused to eat the flesh of that ungrateful man. For one who slays a Brahmana, drinks alcohol, who steals, or who has fallen away from a vow, there is expiation, O Rajan, but there is none for an ingrate. The cruel and heinous man who injures a friend will neither be eaten even by savage cannibals, nor even by the worms that feed on carrion.'"

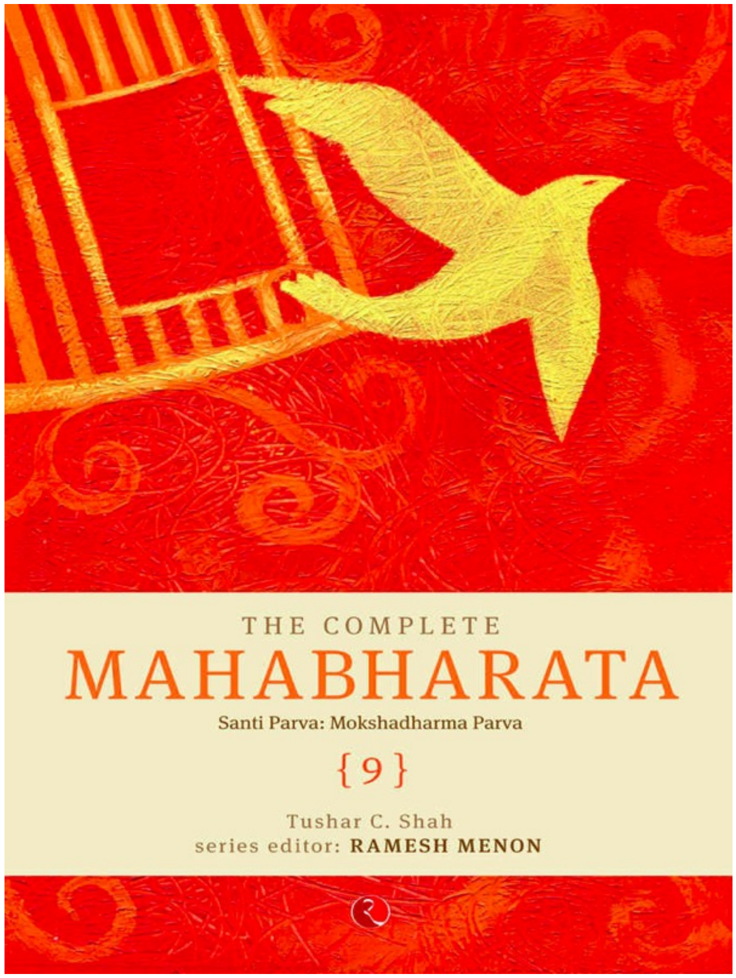
"Bhishma says, 'The Rakshasa king then had a funeral pyre made for the prince of cranes and adorned it with jewels, gems, perfumes and costly robes. Setting the body of the prince of birds upon it, the mighty chief of the Rakshasas had the obsequial rites of his friend performed according to the law.

Just then, the auspicious Devi Surabhi, the celestial cow and daughter of the sage Daksha, appeared in the sky above the place where the pyre had been set up. Her breasts were full of milk. From her mouth, O sinless king, froth mixed with milk fell upon Rajadharman's funeral pyre. At this, the prince of cranes revived and was whole again. Rising, he approached his friend, the king of the Rakshasas. The chief of the celestials himself also appeared in the city of Virupaksha. Indra said to the Rakshasa king, "How fortunate it is that you have revived the prince of cranes!" The lord of the Devas narrated to Virupaksha the story of the curse that Brahma had called upon Rajadharman, the best of birds.

Indra said, "Once upon a time, Rajan, this prince of cranes absented himself from Brahmaloka when his attendance was expected. In wrath the Pitamaha said, 'Since this vile krauncha has not presented himself today in my assembly, that wicked one will not die quickly so as to be able to leave the earth.' Because of the curse of Brahma, the prince of cranes, though slain by Gautama, has come back to life, through the virtue of the nectar with which his body was drenched."

After Indra had fallen silent, Rajadharman, bowing to the chief of the celestials, said, "O first of devas, if your heart is inclined graciously towards me, let my dear friend Gautama be restored to life!"

At this, O Narottama, Vasava sprinkled nectar over Gautama and restored him to life. Rajadharman, the prince of cranes, approached his friend Gautama, who still bore on his shoulders the load of gold that he had got from the king of the Rakshasas, embraced him joyfully and, dismissing the sinful Gautama, with his wealth, returned to his own home.



The next day, at the appointed time, he went to the Pitamaha, who honoured the high-souled bird with such attentions as are shown to a cherished guest. Gautama, too, returned to his home in the village of the hunters and sired many sinful children upon his Sudra wife. A dire curse was pronounced on him by the gods, that the ungrateful sinner should sink into a terrible hell for many years along with his children and wife.

This is the story that Narada once told me, Yudhishtira, and, recollecting the incidents of this weighty narrative, O Bharatarishabha, I have told you all its details. Whence can an ungrateful person derive repute? Where is his place? Whence can he derive happiness? An ingrate does not deserve to be trusted and can never escape a dire fate. He who injures a friend sinks into terrible and everlasting hell.

Everyone should be appreciative of friends and try to help them. Everything can be obtained from friends, honours and all kinds of objects of enjoyment. Through their efforts, one can escape from various kinds of danger and distress. A wise person should distinguish his friend with his best attentions. He should shun ungrateful men, for the shameless and sinful person who mistreats his friends is a wretch of his varna and the vilest of creatures.

I have thus told you, Yudhishtira, what the characteristics of that sinner are who is tainted by ingratitude and who harms his friend. What else do you want to hear?'"

Vaisampayana said, "O Janamejaya, hearing these words spoken by Bhishma, Yudhishtira is deeply gratified."

PART III
Mokshadharma Parva

Vaisampayana said, "Yudhishtira says, 'O Pitamaha, you have spoken of the auspicious karma to be performed by men in distress, with regard to the Rajadharma, the dharma of kings. Now tell me the main duties of the four asramas, the stages of life.'

Bhishma says, 'Dharma has many doors. The observance of dharma can never be in vain. Duties or kartavyas have been laid down for every asrama of life. The fruits of these karmas are invisible here, being attained in the next world. The fruits, however, of tapasya directed towards realising the Atman are obtained in this world.

Whatever be the object to which one devotes oneself, that object, O Bhaarata, and nothing else, appears to one as the highest of acquisitions fraught with the greatest of blessings. When one reflects properly and one's heart is purified by such dhyana, one knows that the things of this world are as straw. Beyond doubt, one is then freed from attachment to all things mundane. When the flawed world, O Yudhishtira, is an illusion, every man of intelligence should surely strive for the emancipation of his Soul.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, Pitama, through what means should one kill one's grief when one loses one's wealth, or when one's wife, son, or father, dies.'

Bhishma says, 'When one's wealth is lost, or one's wife, son or father dies, one says to oneself "Alas, this is a great sorrow!" But then one should, through dhyana, seek to quell that sorrow. The old story is told of the discourse that a Brahmana friend of his, coming to Senajit's court, made to that king.

Seeing the king burning with sorrow because of the death of his son, the Brahmana said to the troubled sovereign, "Why are you so stricken? You have no intelligence. Yourself an object of grief, why do you grieve for others? Just some few days hence, others will grieve for you, and in their turn, others will grieve for them. You, me, and all who wait upon you, O king, shall all return to that place from where all of us have come."

Senajit said, "What is that buddhi, what is that tapasya, what is that dhyana, O Tapodhana, what is that gyana, and what is that vigyana, by acquiring which you do not yield to sorrow?"

The Brahmana said, "Behold, as a result of their various deeds, their karma, all creatures, the superior, the middling, and the inferior, are entangled in grief. I do not regard my own body to be mine; I regard the whole world as being mine. I again think that all this that I see is as much mine as it belongs to others. Because of this firm conviction, grief cannot approach me. Having acquired this understanding, I do not yield either to joy or to sorrow. As two pieces of driftwood floating on the ocean come together momentarily and again separate—even such is the union of living creatures in this world.

Sons, grandsons, relatives and dependants are all like this. One should never feel attachment or indeed affection for them, for separation from them is certain. Your son came from an invisible realm; he has returned thence. He did not know you and you did not know him. Who are you and for whom do you grieve? Grief arises from the sickness created by desire. Happiness again results from the disease of desire being cured. From joy also comes sorrow, and thus sorrow arises repeatedly. Sorrow follows joy, inevitably, and joy comes after sorrow. The joys and sorrows of human beings revolve on a wheel.

After joy, sorrow has come to you, and in time, you will again have happiness. No one suffers sorrow for ever, and no one enjoys happiness forever. The body is the refuge of both sorrow and happiness.

Whatever karma an embodied creature does with his body, he has to reap the fruit of those deeds in the body. Life begins with the coming into existence of the body. The two exist together, and the two perish together.

Men of tainted Souls, bound to things worldly by various bonds, meet with death like sandbanks dissolving in water. Woes of diverse kinds, born of ignorance, act like grinders of oil-seeds, to punish all creatures for their attachments. These sorrows press them like oil-seeds in the great oil-press of the circle of births and rebirths. For the sake of his wife and others, a man commits many sins, but he suffers alone for them both in this and the next world. Attached to children, wives and relatives, all sink in the sea of grief, even like wild elephants in a marsh when their strength is gone. Indeed, upon the loss of wealth or a son or relatives, man suffers great distress; he burns with grief like a forest fire.

All this joy and grief, existence and non-existence, depends on destiny. One having friends as one destitute of friends, one having enemies as one without foes, one having wisdom as one of no wisdom—every one of these finds happiness through destiny.

Friends are not the cause of one's happiness. Enemies are not the cause of one's misery. Wisdom is not competent to bring an accession to wealth, nor is wealth able to bring an accession to joy. Intelligence is not the cause of wealth, nor is stupidity the cause of penury. Only he that is possessed of wisdom, and none else, understands the order of the world. Amongst the intelligent, the heroic, the foolish, the cowardly, the learned, the weak or the strong, happiness comes to him for whom it is ordained. Among the calf, the cowherd that owns her, and the thief, the cow belongs to him who drinks her milk.

They whose minds are quiescent, and they who have attained that state which lies beyond the sphere of the intellect, succeed in finding bliss. Only they that are between these two conditions suffer.

The wise delight in the two extremes but not in the states that are in between. The sages have said that the attainment of any of these two extremes constitutes happiness. Suffering consists of the states that are between the two.

They who have succeeded in attaining true felicity, which samadhi alone can confer, and who have become free from the pleasures and pains of this world, and who are without envy, are never agitated by either the acquisition of wealth or its loss. They who have not succeeded in acquiring the intelligence which leads to true bliss, but who have transcended folly and ignorance through a knowledge of the shastras, give way to excessive joy and excessive sorrow. Men without all notions of right or wrong, insensate with pride and with success over others, yield to transports of delight like the gods in heaven.

Such transport must surely end in misery. Idleness is misery; while genius in action is the cause of true joy. Affluence and prosperity dwell in one possessed of intelligence, but not in one that is idle. Be it happiness or be it sorrow, be it agreeable or be it disagreeable, what comes to one should be enjoyed or endured with an unconquered heart. Every day a thousand occasions for grief, and a hundred occasions for fear assail the man of ignorance and folly but not the man of wisdom. Sorrow can never touch the intelligent man who has acquired wisdom, who is mindful of the instructions of his elders and superiors, who is without envy, and who is self-restrained. Relying upon such wisdom, and protecting his heart from the influence of desire and the passions, should the man of wisdom live in this world. Sorrow cannot touch him who knows that Supreme Self, the Paramatman from which everything springs and into which everything disappears.

The very root of that for which grief is felt, or by which one is impelled to exertion, should be removed, even if it be a part of one's body. That object, whatever it may be, for which the idea of the self and ego is cherished, becomes a source of grief and torment.

Whatever objects, amongst things that are desired, are relinquished become sources of happiness. The man that pursues objects of desire meets with destruction in the course of his pursuit. Neither the happiness that is derived from a gratification of the senses nor that great rapture, which one may enjoy in swarga, approaches to even a sixteenth part of the bliss which arises from the destruction of all desire.

The deeds of a former life, right or wrong, visit, with their consequences, the wise and the foolish, the brave and the timid. It is even so that joy and sorrow, the agreeable and the disagreeable, continually revolve, as on a wheel, among living creatures. Relying on an understanding of this, the man of intelligence and wisdom lives at ease. A man should disregard all his desires, and never allow his anger to get the better of him. This anger springs up in the heart and grows there into vigour and luxuriance. This wrath that dwells in the bodies of men and is born in their minds is spoken of by the wise as death.

When a man succeeds in withdrawing all his desires like a tortoise withdrawing all its limbs, then his Soul, which is self-luminous, succeeds in looking into itself.

That object, whatever it may be, for which the idea of mine is nourished becomes a source of grief and suffering.

When a man himself feels no fear, and is feared by no one, when he nurtures no desire and no aversion, he attains the state of Brahman.

Casting off both truth and falsehood, grief and joy, fear and courage, the agreeable and the disagreeable, you can become a tranquil Soul. When a man abstains from doing wrong to any creature, in thought, word or deed, he attains the state of Brahman. True happiness is his who can cast off that thirst which the misguided cannot renounce; he finds bliss, which does not decay, and leaves desire that is a fatal sickness.

In this regard, O king, listen to what Pingala said about the manner in which she acquired eternal punya even at a most unfavourable time. A fallen woman, Pingala, having gone to the place of an assignation, was denied the company of her lover through an accident. Even at that time of great anguish, she succeeded in acquiring peace.

Pingala said, 'Alas, I have lived for long years and many lives, all the while overcome by frenzy, by the very side of that self in whom there is nothing but peace. Death has been at my door, yet until now I did not approach that essence of purity. Now I will cover this house of one column and nine doors with true knowledge. What woman is there that regards that Paramatman as her beloved lord, even when he comes near?

I am now awake. I have been roused from the sleep of ignorance. I am no longer influenced by desire. Human lovers, who are embodied forms of hell, will no longer deceive me by approaching me lustfully. Evil produces good through destiny or the deeds of a former life. Awakened now from the sleep of ignorance, I have discarded all desire for worldly things. I have acquired complete mastery over my senses. One freed from desire and hope rests in bliss. Freedom from every hope and desire is felicity. Having driven off desire and hope, this Pingala now rests in that freedom and bliss.' Thus spoke the Brahmana to King Senajit."

Bhishma continues, 'Convinced with this and other wisdom told him by the learned Brahmana, King Senajit cast off his grief, experienced delight again and became truly happy.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Time, which destroys every created thing, passes swiftly. Tell me, O Pitama, what is that final human goal which should be sought?'

Bhishma says, 'In this regard, O king, the old itihasa of a discourse between a father and his son is often told. A certain Brahmana, who was devoted to the study of the Vedas, had a most intelligent son who was called Medhavin. One day, Medhavin, who knew the truths of the Mokshadharma, the religion of emancipation, as also the affairs of the world, spoke to his father thus.

The son said, "What should a wise man do, O father, seeing that human life passes away so very quickly? Tell me the successive course of duties that one should perform, as well as the fruits of each. Having listened to you, I wish to observe those karmas."

The father said, "O son, observing brahmacharya, a man should first study the Vedas. He should then wish for children and enter into the grihastasrama to save his ancestors. Setting up his fire next, he should seek to perform the prescribed sacrifices with their due rites. At last, he should enter the forest as a vanaprastha and devote himself to dhyana and tapasya."

The son said, "When the world is assailed on all sides, and when such irresistible things of deathly consequences fall upon it, how can you say this so calmly?"

His sire said, “How is the world assailed? What is that by which it is shrouded? What, again, are those irresistible things of mortal consequences that fall upon it? Why do you frighten me so?”

The son said, “Death is that by which the world is assailed. Decay encompasses it. The inexorable things that come and go are the days and nights, which continually lessen human life. When I know that death tarries for none but approaches every creature inexorably, how can I waste my time without covering myself in the kavacha of knowledge?

When each night lessens the allotted span of one’s life, the man of wisdom should regard the day to be fruitless. When death stalks ever closer, who is there that would, being like a fish in shallow water, feel happy? Death comes to a man before his desires have been gratified. Death snatches away a man while he is plucking flowers and when his heart is otherwise set, ah, death comes like a tigress bearing away a ram.

This very day, accomplish that which is for your good. Let not this death come to you. Death snatches away his victims before their deeds are accomplished. The actions of tomorrow should be done today, those of the afternoon in the forenoon. Death does not wait to see whether the tasks of its victim have all been achieved. Who knows that death will not come to him even today?

In one’s very prime, one should betake oneself to the practice of dharma. Life is transitory and brief. If virtue is practiced, fame here and felicity hereafter will be the consequences. Overwhelmed by ignorance, one is ready to exert oneself for sons and wives. Through virtuous or vicious acts, one aggrandises them. Like a tiger bearing away a sleeping deer, death snatches away the man addicted to the gratification of desire and engaged in the enjoyment of his wives, sons, his wealth and animals. Before he has been able to pluck the flowers on which he has set his heart, before he has gratified his desires, death bears him away in its jaws.

Death overpowers a man while he is still in the midst of the hollow pleasure that accrues from the gratification of desire, and while still thinking, ‘This has been done; this is to be done; this has been half-done.’ Death bears away the man, whatever his profession, attached to his field, his shop or his home, before he has obtained the fruit of his actions. Death bears away the weak, the strong, the brave, the timid, the foolish and the learned, before any of these enjoys the fruits of his work. When death, decrepitude, disease and sorrow arising from diverse causes, all dwell in your body, how is it that you live as if you are perfectly hale?

As soon as a creature is born, decay and death pursue him to fetch his end. All existent things, mobile and immobile—chala and achala—are affected by these two. The attachment that one feels for villages and towns, in the midst of fellowmen, is the very maw of death. The forest, on the other hand, is the fold within which the senses may be penned. This is what the srutis declare. The attachment a man feels towards living in a village or town in the midst of men is like a rope that binds him fast. They that are good break that rope and attain mukti, while they that are wicked do not succeed in breaking the bonds of attachment.

He, who never injures living creatures by thought, word or deed, is never injured by the agencies that destroy life and property. Nothing can resist the messengers of death when they advance other than truth, which devours illusion and falsehood. In truth is immortality. For these reasons one should practice the Satyavrata, the vow of truth; one should devote oneself to a union with truth; one should accept truth for one's Veda; and restraining one's senses, one should vanquish death with truth.

Both immortality and death are planted in the body. One comes to death through ignorance and the loss of judgement; while immortality is achieved through truth. I will, therefore, abstain from injury and seek to achieve truth, and transgressing the sway of desire and wrath, regard pleasure and pain with an equal eye and, attaining peace, avoid death like an immortal.

Upon the advent of Uttarayana, when the sun will turn towards his northern course, restraining my senses, I will set myself to the performance of the Santi-yagna, the Brahma-yagna, the Manasa-yagna and the Karma-yagna. How can one like me worship his maker with animal sacrifices involving cruelty, or sacrifices of the body, such as only Pisachas, demons, can perform and such as yield fruit that are transitory?

That man whose words, thoughts, penances, renunciation and yoga dhyana, all rest upon Brahman, succeeds in earning the highest good. There is no eye that is equal to the eye of knowledge. There is no penance like that involved in truth. There is no sorrow equal to attachment. There is no happiness like renunciation. I have sprung from Brahman, through Brahman. I will devote myself to Brahman, even though I am childless. I shall return to Brahman. I do not need a son to save me.

A Brahmana can have no wealth comparable to the state of ekanta, being alone, through which he can regard everything with an equal eye, practice truthfulness, good conduct, patience, ahimsa, simplicity and avoid all rituals and visible sacrifices. What use have you, O Brahmana, of wealth or kinsmen and relatives, of wives, when you will have to die? Seek your Soul, which is concealed in a cave deep within you. Where are your grandsires now, and where your sire?"'

Bhishma continues, 'Do you also, O king, conduct yourself in the way in which the father in this story does, devoting himself to the Satyavrata, after having listened to his son.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, whence and how joy and sorrow come to the rich, as also the poor, who live in the observance of different dharma and karma.'

Bhishma continues, 'Listen to the ancient tale of what was declared by Sampaka who had gained peace and achieved mukti for himself. Once, a Brahmana, rendered miserable by a bad wife, tattered clothes, and hunger, and living in the observance of the vow of renunciation, said this to me:

"Diverse kinds of sorrow and happiness overtake everyone, from the day of their birth into this world. If he could ascribe them to the action of destiny, he would not then feel either glad when happiness came or miserable when sorrow overtook him. Even though your mind is divested of desire, you bear a heavy burden. You do not seek to achieve moksha. Are you not successful in controlling your mind?

If you renounce home and possessions, you will taste true happiness. A person divested of everything, sleeps in happiness, and wakes in happiness. Complete poverty in this world is happiness. It is a great regimen; it is the source of blessings; it is freedom from danger. This foe-less path cannot be attained by those that cherish desire, and is easily attained by those that are free from desire. Casting my eyes on every part of the three worlds, I do not behold anyone who is equal to a poor man of pure conduct and without attachment to worldly things.

I weighed poverty and sovereignty in a balance. Poverty weighed heavier than sovereignty and seemed to possess greater punya. Between poverty and sovereignty there is this great distinction—that the sovereign, possessed of every affluence, is always agitated by anxiety and seems to live in the very jaws of death. However, the poor man, because of being without any wealth has freed himself from hope, and emancipated himself. Neither fire, nor foe, nor death nor robbers can get the better of him. The very gods applaud such a man who wanders the world at his sweet will, who lies down on bare ground with his arm for a pillow, and who is possessed of peace.

Affected by anger and lust, the man of affluence is stained by a wicked heart. He casts oblique glances and makes dry speeches. He becomes sinful, and his face is always darkened by frowns. Biting his lips, and excited with anger, he utters harsh and cruel words. If such a man desires to even make a gift of the whole world, who would like even to look at him?

Constant companionship with prosperity stupefies a person of weak judgement; why, it drives out his judgement like the wind blowing away autumn clouds. Companionship with prosperity induces him to think I am handsome. I am rich. I am high-born. I meet with success in whatever I undertake. I am not an ordinary man! These three intoxicate his very heart. With his heart deeply attached to worldly possessions, he wastes the wealth hoarded by his ancestors. Reduced to want, he then regards the appropriation of other people's wealth as being blameless. At this stage, when he transgresses all bounds of dharma and violates other men to appropriate the possessions of others from every side, the rulers of men attack him like hunters a deer in the forest. Such a man is then overwhelmed by many afflictions that originate in fire and weapons. Therefore, disregarding all worldly propensities, such as your desire for wives and children, together with all fleeting delusions, even as the body itself, one should, helped by one's intelligence, use the appropriate specifics to cure those painful afflictions.

Without renunciation, one can never attain happiness. Without vairagya one can never acquire what is one's highest good. Without renunciation, one can never sleep at ease. Therefore, renouncing everything, make happiness your own."

All this was told to me once in Hastinapura by a Brahmana about what Sampaka had sung in olden days. For this reason, I regard renunciation to be the foremost of all things.’

Yudhishtira says, 'If anyone who wants to give dana, dakshina or perform yagnas fails to find the necessary wealth for these, and thirst for wealth overwhelms him, what must he do?'

Bhishma says, 'He that regards all things, joy and sorrow, honour and insult, with an equal eye, who never exerts himself to gratify his desire for earthly possessions, who is always truthful in speech, who is free from all kinds of attachment, and who has no desire for action, is, O Bhaarata, a happy man. These five, the ancients say, are the means for the acquisition of perfect peace, of moksha. These are called swarga. These are the sanatana dharma, the true religion. These constitute the highest happiness.

Yudhishtira, hear the old story and song of Manki in this regard, when he found mukti! Desirous of wealth, Manki found that he was repeatedly doomed to disappointments. At last, selling a small remnant of his property he bought a pair of young bulls and a yoke to train them to plough the earth. One day, the two bulls were taken out to the fields. At the sight of a great camel that lay supine on the road, the bulls bolted towards the camel, and fell upon its neck. Enraged at this, the great camel sprang up and ran, carrying away the two helpless young bulls dangling on either side of its neck.

Seeing his bulls borne away by the mighty camel, and seeing that they were on the very point of death, Manki cried, "If wealth be not ordained by destiny, it can never be acquired by even a clever man exerting himself with attention and confidence, and accomplishing with skill all that is needed towards that end. Before this, I have, through diverse means and with devotion, endeavoured to earn wealth. Ah, behold the misfortune brought by destiny to the property I had. My bulls are borne away, rising and falling, as the camel runs an uneven course. Alas, my precious bulls dangle on the camel's neck like a couple of gemstones.

This is surely the result of destiny. Exertion is futile against fate. Else, even if effort were admitted as being an agent in yielding fruit, a deeper investigation would discover destiny to be at its source. So, the man who wants happiness should renounce all attachment. The man without attachments or desires can sleep peacefully."

That was well said by Suka while going into the great forest from his father's asrama, renouncing everything.

Amongst these two, the one who gains the fruition of all his wishes, and the one who casts off every wish, the second, who renounces all, is superior to the first, even if the first acquires the fruition of all his desires, which would then multiply.

No one can ever attain the end of desire. Only he that is destitute of knowledge and judgement feels avid to protect his body and life. Forbear from every desire for action. O my Soul, which is possessed by lust, adopt serenity by freeing yourself from all attachments. Repeatedly, you have been deceived by desire and hope. How is it that you still do not free yourself from attachment? If I am not one that deserves destruction at your hands, if I am one with whom you should sport in delight, then, O my wealth-coveting Soul, do not induce me towards greed. You have repeatedly lost your hoarded wealth. O my wealth-coveting and foolish Soul, when will you succeed in freeing yourself from the desire for wealth?

Ah, shame on my foolishness! I have become a toy of yours. It is thus that one becomes a slave of others. No one born on earth did ever attain the end of desire, and no one that will be born will succeed in attaining it. Casting off all action, I have at last been roused from sleep. I am now awake. Without doubt, O desire, your heart is as hard as adamant, since though afflicted by a hundred distresses, you do not shatter in a hundred pieces. I know you, O want, and all those things that are dear to you. By not seeking what is dear to you, I shall know joy in my own self. O desire, I know your root. You spring from will. I will, therefore, avoid will and effort, and you will be destroyed along with all your roots.

The want for wealth can never fetch real happiness. If acquired, great is the anxiety that the acquirer feels. If lost after acquisition, that is felt as death. Lastly, regarding acquisition itself, it is so uncertain. Wealth cannot be got by even the surrender of one's person. What can be more painful than this? When acquired, one is never satisfied with its measure, but one continues to seek more of it. Like the sweet water of the Ganga, wealth only increases one's hankering. It has been my destruction, and I am now awakened. Do you, O desire, leave me. Let the need, which has taken refuge in this my body, this compound of five elements, go wherever it chooses and live happily wherever it likes. You all that are not of the Soul, I have no joy in you, for you follow the lead of desire and lust.

Abandoning all of you, I will take refuge in the quality of goodness, which is sattva. Beholding all creatures in my own body and my own mind, and devoting my reason to yoga, my life to the teachings of the wise, and my Soul to Brahman, I will rove happily through the world, without attachment and without losses or disasters of any kind visiting me, so that you, O desire, O moha, may never again plunge me into such sorrows. If I continue to be agitated by you, O want, I shall necessarily be without a path by which to effect my deliverance. You, O desire, are always the progenitor of thirst, of grief, fatigue and toil. I think the grief that one feels at the loss of wealth is sharp and keen, and far greater than any other. Relatives and friends disregard him that has lost his wealth.

With various kinds of humiliation that number in their thousands, there are many faults in property that are more painful still. On the other hand, the very small happiness that dwells in wealth is always mingled with pain and sorrow. Robbers kill, in the sight of all, the man who has wealth, or afflict him with various kinds of threats and danger, always filling him with dread. At last, after a long time, I have understood that the desire for wealth is fraught only with sorrow.

Whatever the object, O desire, upon which you set your heart, you force me to pursue it. You are without discernment or judgement. You are a fool. You are difficult to satisfy; indeed, you can never be gratified. You burn like fire, always demanding fresh fuel. You do not ask, while pursuing an object, whether it is easy or difficult to attain. You cannot be filled to the brim, being even like the patalas. You wish only to plunge me into sorrow.

From this day, O desire, I cannot live with you! I who felt despair once, at the loss of my property, have now attained the high state of perfect freedom from attachment. At this moment, I no longer think of you and your train. I once felt great misery on your account. I do not now regard myself as being destitute of intelligence. Having adopted renunciation in consequence of the loss of my property, I can now rest, freed from every kind of fever. I cast you off, O desire, with all the passions of my heart. You will not again dwell with me or sport with me. I shall forgive them that will slander or speak ill of me. I shall not injure even when injured. If, from aversion, anyone speaks harshly of me, disregarding what they say, I will address them agreeably. In contentment of heart and with all my senses at ease, I will always live upon what fate gives me. I shall not contribute to the gratification of the wishes entertained by you that are my enemy.

Freedom from attachment, emancipation from desire; contentment, tranquillity, truth, self-restraint, forgiveness and universal compassion are the qualities that have now come to me. Therefore, let desire, greed, thirst and miserliness avoid me. I have now adopted the path of dharma. Having cast off desire and greed, great now is the joy surging in my heart. I will no longer yield to the influence of desire and no longer suffer like a man with an impure Soul. One is certain to obtain happiness according to the measure of the desires he is able to cast off. Truly, he who yields himself up to desire always suffers. Whatever passions linked to want are cast off by a man, all pertain to the Rajoguna, the quality of passion.

Sorrow, shamelessness and discontent all arise from desire and wealth. Like a man plunging in the hot summer into a cool lake, I have now entered into Brahman. I have abjured work. I have freed myself from grief. Pure happiness has now come to me. The felicity that results from the satisfaction of desire, or that other purer felicity which one enjoys in heaven, does not come to even a sixteenth part of that which arises upon the abandonment of all kinds of thirst. Killing the very principle of desire, which along with the body makes an aggregate of seven, and which is a bitter enemy, I have entered the immortal city of Brahman and shall pass my days there in happiness like a king!"

Relying upon such wisdom, Manki freed himself from attachments, casting off all desires and attaining Brahman, that abode of the ultimate felicity. Because of the loss of his two bulls, Manki attained immortality. Indeed, because he cut the very roots of desire, he attained perfect bliss.'

Bhishma continues, 'In this matter, the old tale of the verses sung by Janaka, king of the Videhas, who had attained mukti, is also told. What the monarch said was, "Unlimited is my wealth. At the same time I have nothing, and if the whole of my kingdom, Mithila, be consumed in a conflagration, I shall incur no loss." The great Bodhya also spoke about freedom from attachments. Listen to what he said, Yudhishtira.

Once on a time, Yayati, the royal son of Nahusha, questioned the Rishi Bodhya who had, through the abandonment of desire, attained peace and had an intimate knowledge of the scriptures. The monarch said, "O you of great wisdom, instruct me about peace and emancipation. What is that intellect, relying on which, you succeed in wandering over the world in serenity and disengaged from all karma?"

Bodhya said, "I conduct myself according to the instructions of others but never instruct others myself. I will, however, mention the indications of those teachings. You may glean their spirit through reflection. My six preceptors are Pingala, the osprey, the snake, the bee in the forest, the maker of arrows and the maiden.

Hope is very potent in agitating the heart, O king. Freedom from hope is high felicity. Reducing hope to an absence of expectation, Pingala sleeps in peace. Beholding an osprey with meat in his beak, others that have not found any meat attack and destroy him. A certain osprey, by altogether abstaining from meat found felicity. To build a house for one's own self produces sorrow and not happiness. The snake, taking up his dwelling in another creature's abode, lives in peace. Betaking themselves to mendicancy, ascetics live happily, without being injured by any creature, even like bees in the forest. A certain maker of arrows, while employed at his work, was so deeply attentive to it that he did not notice the king who passed by his side. When many are together, dispute ensues. Even when two live together, they are sure to converse. I, however, wander alone like the bracelet made of seashells on the wrist of the maiden in the story."

Yudhishtira says, 'O you who know the ways of men, tell me with what conduct a man may succeed in this world, and be freed from grief. How also should a man conduct himself in this world so that he may attain an excellent end?'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to the old story of the discourse between Prahlada and the sage Ajagara. Once on a time, King Prahlada of great intelligence questioned a wandering Brahmana of untold wisdom, and a purified and tranquil Soul.

Prahlada said, "Freed from desire, with a cleansed Soul, possessed of humility and self-restraint, without desire for action, free from malice, agreeable in speech, endowed with dignity, intelligence and wisdom, you live in simplicity like a child. You never covet any kind of gain, and never grieve over any kind of loss. You are always contented, O Brahmana, and do not seem to regard anything in the world. While other men are being borne away upon the currents of desire and passion, you are perfectly indifferent to everything that has to do with dharma, artha and kama. You seem to be in a state of quietude that can never be disturbed. Disregarding all objects of the senses, you move about like an emancipated Soul, only witnessing all things but never taking part in any. What, O Muni, is your wisdom, what your learning, and what your conduct, because of which this becomes possible for you? Tell me this, if, O Brahmana, you think it will do me good."

The intelligent Brahmana, who knew well the dharma of the world, answered Prahlada in sweet words of grave import. “O king, the origin of creatures, their growth, decay and death, are traceable to no intelligible cause. It is for this that I do not indulge in either joy or sorrow. All the propensities that exist in the universe are seen to flow from the very natures of the creatures to which they inhere. All things in the universe depend on their respective natures. Hence, I am not delighted with anything. O Prahlada, all kinds of union have an inherent aptitude for disunion. All acquisitions are certain to end in loss. Hence, I never set my heart upon acquiring any object.

All things possessed of attributes are certain to meet with death. What then remains for one like me to do, who knows both the origin and the end of things? Of all things, large or small, born in the ocean of waters, the end I see. I see also the death, which is manifest, O King of Asuras, of all things, chala and achala, that belong to the earth. Best of Danavas, death comes in season to even the mightiest of winged creatures that range the sky. I see again that the luminous bodies, large and small, which move in the firmament, fall and are extinguished when their time comes.

Beholding all created things possessed of knowledge to be liable to death, and thinking all things to possess the same nature, I sleep in peace without any anxiety of heart. If I find without exertion a copious repast, I do not scruple to enjoy it. On the other hand, I pass many days together without eating anything. Sometimes people feed me with costly viands in profusion, at times with a small quantity, at others with even less, and sometimes I get no food whatever. I sometimes eat only a portion of a single grain, at times the dry sesame cakes from which the oil has been pressed out and I sometimes eat rice and other food of the richest kind.

At times, I sleep on an elevated bedstead of the most luxurious kind. At others, I sleep on bare ground. Sometimes my bed is made within a fine palace or mansion; at others in the wilderness. I am at times clad in rags, at other times in sackcloth, at yet others in raiment of fine texture, sometimes in deerskin, sometimes in robes of the costliest fabric. I never reject such enjoyments as are consistent with dharma and as I come by without effort. I do not, at the same time, strive to attain such objects as are difficult of acquisition.

The rigid vrata I have adopted is called Ajagara. That vow can secure immortality. It is auspicious and griefless. It is incomparable and pure. It is consistent with the counsels of the wise. It is disapproved of by men of foolish intellects, who can never follow it. With a pure heart, I conduct myself according to it. My mind naturally never swerves from this vow. I have not swerved from the practices of my order. I am abstemious in everything.

I know the past and the present. Divested of fear, wrath and greed, and errors of judgement, I follow this vow with a pure heart. There are no restrictions in respect of food and drink and other objects of enjoyment for one practising this vow. As everything is dependent on destiny, there is no observance of considerations of time and place for one like me. The vow I follow contributes to true happiness of the heart. Those that are evil never observe it. I follow it with a pure mind.

Induced by greed, men pursue different kinds of wealth. If thwarted in the pursuit, they are plunged in sorrow. Reflecting properly upon all this with my intelligence, which has penetrated the truths of things, I follow this vow with a pure heart.

I have seen persons in distress seeking, for the acquisition of wealth, the shelter of men, good and bad. Devoted to serenity, and with my passions under control, I follow my vrata with a pure heart.

Seeing, with the help of truth, that joy and sorrow, gain and loss, attachment and renunciation, life and death, are all ordained by destiny, I follow this vow with a pure heart.

Rid of fear, attachment, errors of judgement and pride, imbued with wisdom, intelligence, intellect, and devoted to calm, and hearing that large snakes, without moving, enjoy the fruit that comes to them of itself, I follow their practice with a pure heart.

Without restrictions of any kind in respect of food and where I sleep, endowed by my very nature with self-restraint, abstemiousness, pure vows, truth and purity of conduct, and without any desire to store, for future use, the rewards of action, I follow, with a delighted and pure heart, this vow.

All causes of sorrow have fled from me once I had driven out desire. Having received an accession to light, I follow this vow with a pure heart to control my Soul which is thirsty and unrestrained, yet with proper culture, is able to depend upon itself without needing external objects to keep it engaged. Without paying any heed to the concerns towards which my heart, mind and words would like to lead me, and marking that the happiness connected with these is both difficult of acquisition and fleeting in duration, I follow this vow with a pure heart.

Learned men possessed of great intelligence, wanting to proclaim their own feats, while establishing their own theories and censuring those of others, have said this and that on a subject which can never be settled by disputation. Foolish men fail to understand this vrata in a proper light. I, however, see it as destructive of ignorance. Regarding it also as being full of immortality and as a remedy against diverse kinds of evil, I wander among men, having subdued all faults and having freed myself from every thirst."

That Mahatman who, having freed himself from attachments and divested himself of fear, greed, foolishness and anger, follows this Ajagara vrata, or indulges in this sport, as it might be called, certainly succeeds in passing his days in great delight.'

Yudhishtira says, ‘Which of these, O Bhishma, kinsmen, actions, wealth or wisdom should be the refuge of a man? Answer me this.’

Bhishma says, ‘Wisdom is the refuge of creatures. Wisdom is regarded as the highest of acquisitions. Wisdom is the highest felicity in the world. Wisdom is heaven in the estimation of the good and virtuous. It was through wisdom that Bali, Prahlada, Namuchi and Manki, when they lost their earthly prosperity, succeeded in acquiring felicity. What is there that is superior to wisdom? In this regard, the old story is told of the discourse between Indra and Kasyapa. Listen to it, O Yudhishtira.

Once upon a time, a prosperous Vaisya, in the enjoyment of prosperity, and proud of his affluence, ran down, by driving his chariot negligently, a Rishi’s son of rigid vows named Kasyapa, devoted to penances. Prostrate on the ground, the young man, in exceeding pain, gave way to his wrath; and under the influence of despair, resolved, “I shall cast off my life. A poor man has no need of life in this world.”

While the Brahmana lay in that state, silent and agitated, deprived of energy and on the point of death, Indra appeared on the scene in the form of a jackal and, addressing him, said, “All inferior creatures covet birth in the human race. Among men, again, the status of a Brahmana is much desired. You, O Kasyapa, are a human being. Amongst Manavas, you are again a Brahmana. Among Brahmanas, you are still one that knows the Vedas.

Having obtained that which is attainable with very great difficulty, it does not become you to give up your life from folly.

All kinds of worldly acquisitions are fraught with pride: that declaration of the srutis is perfectly true. You look the picture of contentment. In deciding to die, you make a most foolish and base resolve. O, they are crowned with success that have hands. I eagerly wish for the condition of those creatures that have hands. We covet hands as eagerly as you covet riches. There is no acquisition that is more valuable than the acquisition of hands. Behold, O Brahmana, I cannot extract this thorn that has entered my body, or crush these insects and worms that bite me constantly. They that have bestowed upon them two hands with ten fingers, succeed in removing or crushing the insects that bite their limbs. They succeed in constructing shelters for themselves from rain, cold and heat. They succeed also in enjoying excellent clothes, fine cooked food, comfortable beds and excellent habitations.

On this earth, they that have hands enjoy kine and other animals and cause them to carry burdens or haul their vehicles, and with the help of diverse means bring those animals under sway for their own purposes.

Those living creatures that are without tongues, that are helpless, of little strength, and without hands, bear the several kinds of misery I have told you of. By good fortune, O Brahmana, you are not like them. Through good fortune, you are not a jackal, a worm, a mouse, a frog or an animal of any other miserable species. With this measure of gain that you have won, you should, O Kasyapa, be contented. How happy, again, should you feel at the thought that amongst living creatures you are a superior Brahmana.

Ah, these worms and insects bite me incessantly. For want of hands I am unable to drive them off. Behold my miserable plight. I do not cast off my life because to do so is the greatest sin, and I am afraid that I might fall into a yet more miserable order of existence. This order of existence, that of a jackal, to which I now belong is tolerable. Miserable as it is, there are many kinds of existence below it that are still worse. By birth, some creatures become happier than others that are subject to great woe. But I never see that there is any order of being which can be said to be in the possession of perfect happiness.

Human beings, obtaining affluence, next wish for sovereignty. Having achieved sovereignty, their next wish is to become gods. Having won that, they then wish for the lordship of the celestials. If you become affluent, you will never succeed in becoming a king—for you are a Brahmana by birth—nor in becoming a deity because, in truth, your status of Brahmanahood is equal if not superior to that of a Deva. If by any means, led away by the alluring prospect of heavenly bliss, you do become a god, you will then covet lordship over the gods.

In no condition will you be contented. Contentment does not result from acquiring desirable objects. Thirst is never slaked although there is a profusion of water. The thirst for acquisitions only blazes up with each fresh acquisition like a fire with new fuel fed into it. In you, there is grief. However, joy also dwells in you. Both happiness and misery dwell in you. Why then should you yield to grief? One should restrain, like birds in a cage, the very springs—the intellect and the senses—of all one's desires and actions.

There can be no cutting of a second head, nor of a third hand. That which does not exist can inspire no fear. One that is not acquainted with the enjoyment a certain object affords never feels desire for it. Desires arise from the actual experience of the pleasures that touch or sight, or hearing, give.

You have no idea of the taste of the wine called Varuni or of the meat of the birds called Ladwaka. There is no drink and no food more delicious than these. You have no idea also, O Kasyapa, of every other superior kind of drink and food that exists among men, for you have never tasted these. Without doubt, therefore, not to taste, not to see, should be the vow of a man if he is to win happiness. Creatures that have hands become strong and earn wealth. Men are reduced by other men to servitude, and are repeatedly afflicted at the hands of their own kind with imprisonment, death and other tortures. Although such is their condition, even they do not yield to grief but laugh, play and indulge in merriment.

Others, again, though imbued with might of arms, and possessed of knowledge and great energy of mind, follow censurable, sinful and miserable callings. They seek to change such professions for other pursuits that are more dignified but then they are bound by their own actions of a previous life and by the force of destiny.

The vilest man of the Pukkasa or the Chandala orders never wishes to cast off his life. He is quite contented with the order of his birth. Behold the illusion in this. Looking at those amongst your species that are without arms, or struck with palsy, or afflicted with other diseases, you can regard yourself as very happy and possessed of valuable endowments amongst the members of your own species. If your regenerated body remains safe and sound, and free from disease, and all your limbs remain perfect, you are sure of never incurring any reproach amongst men. It would not become you, O Brahmana, to cast off your life even if any blame, founded on fact and bringing about your being excommunicated from your varna, attached to you. Arise, and practice virtue. It is not right that you should throw away your life.

If, O Dvija, you listen to me and place credence in my words, you will have the highest reward of the dharma set down in the Vedas. Set yourself to Vedic studies, duly maintain your sacred fire, and observe truth, self-restraint and charity. Never compare yourself boastfully with another. They, who, by devoting themselves to the study of the Vedas, become competent to perform sacrifices for themselves and others, have no need to indulge in any kind of regret or fear any kind of evil. They that are born under an auspicious constellation on an auspicious lunation and at an auspicious hour, and strive to perform sacrifices, practice charity, beget children and wish to pass their time gladly in such karma, eventually win very great happiness.

They, on the other hand, that are born under evil constellations, inauspicious asterisms and at evil hours, become destitute of sacrifices and progeny and at last fall into the Asura order. In my former life, I had much useless learning. I always sought after reasons and had little faith. I was a slanderer of the Vedas. I was without the four purusharthas, and was devoted to the empirical science of argumentation, which is based upon ocular or tangible proofs. I would utter bold, brash words based on plausible logic. Indeed, in assemblies, I always spoke of reason, and never of faith. I would speak irreverently of the declarations of the srutis and address Brahmanas in taunting, haughty tones. I was an unbeliever, sceptical of everything, and though ignorant, proud of my learning.

This state of a jackal that I have acquired in this life is the result, O Brahmana, of those sins of mine. If even after hundreds of days and nights that I am a jackal, I can once again become a man, I will pass my life in contentment, heedful of the true purposes of existence, and engaged in sacrifices and giving gifts. I will know what should be known, and avoid what should be avoided."

Thus addressed, the ascetic Kasyapa stood up, and said, “O, you are certainly possessed of knowledge and great intelligence. I am truly surprised by all this.”

With eyes whose vision was extended by knowledge, the Brahmana then beheld that being who had addressed him as Indra, king of the Devas and the lord of Sachi. Kasyapa then worshipped that god who has the best of steeds, Uchchaisravas, for his mount. Then, receiving Indra’s leave, the Brahmana returned to his abode.’

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, if gifts, sacrifices, penances and dutiful services rendered to preceptors, yield wisdom and high rewards.'

Bhishma says, 'If the mind becomes affected by desire, anger and other evil passions, it then runs towards sin. If one's actions are stained by sin, one is obliged to dwell in painful hells. Sinful men are born in indigent circumstances and repeatedly suffer the pangs of famine, woe, fear and death. Those that are virtuous in their deeds, and possessed of faith, and that have their senses under control, are born as affluent men and repeatedly sport in festivities, swarga and joy.

Unbelievers, with their arms manacled, are sent to regions rendered inaccessible by carnivorous beasts and wild elephants, and full of terrors from snakes and brigands. What more needs be said of them? They, on the other hand, who have reverence for the gods and guests, who are liberal, who are fond of good and honest men, go, because of their actions of charity, along that happy way which belongs to those of cleansed Souls. They that have no reverence for virtue are as vile among men as seedless grains among corn or the gnat among winged creatures. That which is ordained due to the deeds of a past life pursues the doer even if he strives with all his might to leave it behind. It sleeps when he sleeps and does whatever else he does. Like his shadow it rests when he rests, goes forth when he goes, and acts when he acts. Whatever karma a man does he has certainly to experience the fruits of it. Death hauls along all creatures who are inexorably destined to fall into the orders of existence they deserve, and who are surely liable to enjoy or suffer that which has been ordained as the fruit of their actions.

The deeds of a past life develop repercussions in their own time even as flowers and fruits, without extraneous effort of any kind, unfailingly appearing when their time arrives. After the consequences, as ordained, of the karma of a past life have been exhausted, through enjoyment or suffering, honour and disgrace, gain and loss, decay and growth, they cease to flow or appear. This occurs repeatedly. A creature while still in the mother's womb enjoys or suffers the happiness or the sorrow that has been ordained for him because of his own actions. In childhood, youth or old age, at whatever period of life one does something good or bad, the results thereof are sure to visit him in his next life at the very same time of his life. As a calf recognises and approaches its mother in the midst of even a thousand kine, even so the deeds of a past life recognise and visit the doer in his new life. Washed in water a dirty piece of cloth becomes clean. Similarly, men burning in repentance gain endless happiness through proper penances.

Those that can live in the forest and, by performing tapasya for a long time, wash themselves of their sins, succeed in acquiring the objects on which they set their hearts. As no one can mark the trail of birds in the sky or of fish in the water, similarly, the trail of those whose Souls have been cleansed by knowledge cannot be marked by anyone. There is no need of any more eloquence or any more reference to sinful deeds. Suffice it to say that one should, with proper judgement and as befits one best, do what is good for one's own weal. This is the means by which wisdom and high rewards can be achieved.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Whence has this universe consisting of mobile and unmoving creatures been created? Whom does it go to when destruction sets in? Tell me this, Pitamaha. Indeed, by whom has this universe with its oceans, its firmament, its mountains, its clouds, its lands, its fire and its wind, been created? How were all objects created? Whence this division into separate orders of existence? Whence are their purity and impurity, and the ordinances about virtue and vice? Of what kind is the life of living creatures? Where do they go who die? Tell us everything about this and the other world.'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to the old story of the sacred words that Bhrigu said in reply to the questions of Bharadwaja. Beholding the Maharishi Bhrigu, blazing with energy and splendour, seated on the summit of Kailasa, Bharadwaja said to him, "By whom was this world with its ocean, its firmament, its mountains, its clouds, its lands, its fire and its wind, created? How were all creatures first created? Whence this distinction of castes? Whence the purity and the impurity of conduct, and whence the ordinances about virtue and vice for living creatures? Of what kind is the life of living creatures? Where do they go who die? It befits you to tell me everything about this and the other world."

Thus addressed by Bharadwaja, the illustrious and illumined Maharishi Bhrigu, who resembled Brahma himself, replied, "There is a primeval being, known to the great Rishis as Manasa. He is without beginning and without end. Weapons cannot pierce that Divine Being. He is without decay and is immortal. He is said to be unmanifest. He is eternal, undecaying and unchangeable. Through Him are creatures born and through Him, they die. He first created a second Divine Being known by the name Mahat. Mahat created Chitta, consciousness. Chitta created Akasa. That puissant being is the holder of all created objects.

From Akasa was born Apah, water, and from Apah were born Agni and Vayu, fire and wind. Through the union of fire and wind was born Bhumi, the earth. Self-born Manasa then created a divine lotus pregnant with tejas, energy. From that lotus sprang Brahma, that ocean of Veda.

The srutis say that as soon as born, the Divine One uttered the words, 'I am He!' For this, He came to be called by the name of Chitta. He has all created things for his body and He is their creator. Five elements that we see are that Brahma of great energy. The mountains are His bones. The earth is His fat and flesh. The oceans are His blood. Space is His stomach. The wind is His breath. Fire is His energy. The rivers are His veins and arteries. Surya and soma, the sun and the moon, are His eyes. The firmament above is His head. The earth is His two feet. The cardinal and subsidiary points of the horizon are His arms. Beyond doubt, He is unknowable and his Soul is inconceivable by even those crowned with the highest ascetic success.

The Divine Being, who pervades the whole universe, is also known by the name of Ananta, the infinite. He lives in consciousness, and cannot be known by those of impure Souls. Asked by you, I have now told you of Him who created consciousness to fetch into existence all created objects, and from whom this universe has sprung."

Bharadwaja said, "What is the extent of the firmament, of the cardinal points of the horizon, of the surface of this earth, and of the wind? Tell me of these."

Bhrigu said, "The sky you see above is infinite. It is the abode of Souls crowned with ascetic success and of Divine Beings. It is blissful, and consists of various regions. Its limits cannot be ascertained. The sun and the moon cannot see, above or below, beyond the range of their own rays. There, where the rays of the sun and the moon cannot reach, are luminaries which are self-effulgent and which possess splendour like that of the sun. Know this, O giver of honours, that, possessed of far-famed splendour, even these do not behold the limits of the firmament due to the inaccessibility and infinity of those boundaries. This space, which the very gods cannot measure, is full of many blazing and self-luminous worlds each above the other.

Beyond the limits of land are oceans of water. Beyond water is darkness. Beyond darkness is water again, and beyond that is fire. Downwards, beneath the patalas, is water. Beneath water is the region that belongs to the great Nagas. Beyond that is sky once more, and beyond the sky is water again. Thus, there is water and sky alternately, without end. Even such are the limits of the divinity, water. The very gods are unable to ascertain limits of fire and wind and water. The nature of fire, wind, water and land is like that of space. They are distinguished through want of true knowledge. Sages read in diverse scriptures the limits that have been declared of the three worlds and the ocean. Who is there, however, that would set limits to what cannot be grasped by vision and what is inaccessible in its totality?

Even if it becomes possible to ascertain the limits of the firmament, which is the trail of the gods and beings, crowned with tapodhana, it can never be possible to set limits to that which is limitless and known as infinite, to that which corresponds with the name by which it is known—what has been called the high-Souled Manasa? When again his form is sometimes contracted and sometimes expanded, how can any except one that is equal to him, be able to comprehend his limits? From the lotus, of which I have already spoken, was first created the omniscient Lord Brahma, endued with form, of essence comprised of dharma, and the creator of all mobile and immobile things."

Bharadwaja said, "If Brahma sprang from the lotus, then it is the lotus that should be regarded as the first-born and not Brahma. Why, however, is Brahma said to be the first? Remove this doubt of mine."

Bhrigu said, "The earth it is that is called the lotus. It was created to give a seat unto that form of Manasa, which became Brahma. Reaching up to heaven itself, Sumeru became the pericarp of the lotus. Remaining within it, the puissant lord of the universe created all the worlds."

Bharadwaja said, "Tell me, O best of Brahmanas, how the puissant Brahma, dwelling within Meru, created these diverse kinds of objects, great and small."

Bhrigu said, "The great Manasa, in his form of Brahma, created the diverse kinds of objects by fiat of will. For the protection then of all creatures, he first created water. Water is the life of all creatures, and it is water which enables their growth. If there were no water, all creatures would perish. The whole universe is pervaded by water. Earth, mountains, clouds and all things which have form, should all be known as transformations of water. They have all been made by that element solidifying in various degrees."

Bharadwaja said, "How did water first appear? How did fire and wind come into being? How was the earth created? I have great doubts on these matters."

Bhrigu said, "O Dvija, in very ancient times called the Brahma-kalpa, the Maharishis assembled together and felt this same doubt about the creation of the universe. Restraining speech, they remained unmoving, engaged in profound dhyana. Having renounced all food, they subsisted on air alone, and remained thus for a thousand celestial years. At the end of that time, certain words as sacred as those of the Vedas simultaneously reached the ears of them all.

Indeed, an asariri was heard in the firmament to say, “Formerly, there was only infinite space, perfectly motionless and immovable. With the sun, moon, stars and wind, it seemed to be asleep. Soon water sprang into existence like something darker within darkness. Next from the pressure of water arose the wind. As an empty vessel appears at first to be without any sound, but when filled with water, air appears and makes a great noise, even so, when infinite space was filled with water, the wind arose with a great noise, reverberating through the water. That wind, thus generated by the pressure of the ocean of water, still moves. Coming into space, its motion never ceases. Then, from the friction of wind and water, fire possessed of great might and blazing energy sprang into existence, with flames directed upwards. This fire dispelled the darkness that had covered space. Helped by the wind, fire drew space and water together. Indeed, combining with the wind, fire had form. While falling from the sky, the liquid portion of fire had form again and became what is known as the earth. The earth, or land, in which everything is born, is the origin of all kinds of taste, of all kinds of scent, of all kinds of liquids, and of all kinds of animals.”

Bharadwaja said, “When the Mahatman Brahma has created millions of creatures, why is it that only these five elements that he created first, which pervade all the universe and which are great spirits, have come to have the name of elements applied to them exclusively?”

Bhrigu said, “All things that belong to the category of the infinite or the vast are called Mahat. Hence, these five elements are named Mahabhutas. Activity is wind. The sound that is heard is space. The heat that is within it is fire. The fluids occurring within it are water. Solidified matter, flesh and bones, are earth. The bodies of living creatures are thus made of the five primeval elements. All mobile and immobile objects are made of these five. The five senses also of living creatures partake of the five. The ear partakes of the properties of space; the nose of earth; the tongue of water; touch of wind; and the eyes of light, fire.”

Bharadwaja said, “If all mobile and immobile objects be composed of these five elements, why is it that in all immobile objects those elements are not visible? Trees do not appear to have any heat. They do not seem to have any motion. They are again made up of dense particles. The five elements are not noticeable in them. Trees do not hear; they do not see; they are not able to sense scent or taste. They have not also the perception of touch. How then can they be regarded as being composed of the five primeval elements? It seems to me that because of the absence of any liquid in them, of any heat, earth, wind and space, trees cannot be regarded as compounds of the five primeval elements."

Bhrigu said, "Indeed, although possessed of density, trees have space within them. The creation of flowers and fruits is always taking place in them. They have heat within them because of which the leaf, bark, fruit and flower are seen to droop. They sicken and dry up. This shows they have perception of touch. Through the sound of wind and fire and thunder, their fruits and flowers fall. Sound is perceived through the ear. Trees have ears and do hear. A creeper winds around a tree and goes about all its sides. A blind thing cannot find its way. For this reason, it is evident that trees have vision. Then again, trees recover vigour and produce flowers in consequence of odours, good and bad, of the sacred perfume of diverse kinds of dhupas. It is plain that trees have scent. They drink water with their roots. They catch diseases of diverse kinds. The diseases again are cured by different specifics. It is evident that trees have perceptions of taste.

As one can suck up water through a bent lotus-stalk, trees also, with the help of the wind, drink through their roots. They are susceptible to pleasure and pain, and grow when cut or trimmed. From all these, I see that trees have life. They are not inanimate. Fire and wind cause the water sucked up by trees to be digested. According, again, to the quantity of the water taken up, the tree advances in growth and becomes moist. In the bodies of all mobile things, the five elements occur. In each, the proportions are different. It is because of the five elements that mobile objects can move their bodies. Skin, flesh, bones, marrow, veins and arteries, which exist together in the body, are made of earth. Energy, wrath, eyes, internal heat and heat that digests food—these five constitute the fire that occurs in all embodied creatures.

The ears, nostrils, mouth, heart and stomach—these five constitute the element of space that occurs in the bodies of living creatures. Phlegm, bile, sweat, fat, blood are the five kinds of water that occur in mobile bodies. Through the breath, called prana, a living creature is enabled to move. Through that called vyana, they create strength for action. That called apana moves downwards. That called samana dwells within the heart. Through that called udana one eructates and is enabled to speak because of its rising through the lungs, the throat and the mouth. These are the five kinds of wind that cause an embodied creature to live and move.

An embodied creature knows the properties of scent through the earth in him. From the water element, he perceives taste. From the fire, he perceives forms, and from the wind he has the perception of touch. Scent, touch, taste, vision and sound are regarded as the common properties of every mobile and unmoving being. I will first speak of the several kinds of scent. They are agreeable, disagreeable, sweet, pungent, far-going, varied, dry and indifferent. All these kinds of scent are founded in earth. Light is seen by the eyes and touch through the wind. Sound, touch, vision and taste are the properties of water. I will speak in detail now of the perception of taste.

Maharishis have spoken of diverse kinds of taste. They are sweet, salty, bitter, astringent, sour and pungent. These are the six kinds of taste that pertain to water. Light contributes to the vision of form. Form is of diverse kinds. Short, tall, thick, four-cornered, round, white, black, red, blue, yellow, reddish, hard, bright, smooth, oily, soft and terrible: these are the seventeen different kinds of form which constitute the property of light or vision.

The property of wind is touch. Touch is of various kinds: warm, cold, agreeable, disagreeable, indifferent, burning, mild, soft, light and heavy. Both sound and touch are the two properties of the wind, the Vayu Mahabhuta. These are the ten properties that pertain to wind.

Space has only one property—sound. I will now tell you the different kinds of sound. They are the seven original notes called shadja, rishabha, gandhara, mahdhyama, panchama, dhaivata and nishada. These are the seven kinds of the property that pertains to space. Sound inheres like the Supreme Being in all space though attached especially to drums and other instruments. Whatever sound is heard from drums, small and large, conches, clouds, chariots and animate and inanimate creatures, are all included in these seven kinds of sound. Thus, sound, which is the property of space, is of various kinds. The learned have said sound is born of space. When raised by the different kinds of touch, it may be heard. It cannot, however, be heard, when the different kinds of touch are inceptive.

The elements, merged with their counterparts in the body, increase and grow. Water, fire, wind are always awake in the bodies of living creatures. They are the roots of the body. Pervading the five life-breaths, they dwell in the body."

Bharadwaja said, "How does bodily fire or heat dwell within the body? How also does the wind enter and cause the body to move and exert itself?"

Bhrigu said, "I will, O Dvija, speak to you of the course in which wind moves, and how, O sinless one, the mighty element causes the bodies of living creatures to move and exert themselves. Heat resides within the head and protects the body. The wind or breath called prana, dwelling within the head and the heat that is there, causes all kinds of exertion. Prana is the living creature, the universal Soul, the eternal being, and the mind, intellect and consciousness of all living creatures, as also all the objects of the senses. Thus, the living creature is, in every respect, caused by prana to move about and exert itself.

Due to the other breath called samana, every one of the senses is made to act as it does. The breath called apana, with recourse to the heat that is in the urethra and the abdominal intestines, moves and engages in excreting urine and faeces.

The single breath, which operates in these three, is called udana by those that know vigyana. The breath that operates, residing in all the joints of the body, is called vyana. There is heat in the bodies of living creatures, which is circulated all over the system by samana. Present thus in the body, that breath operates upon the different kinds of watery and other elementary substances and all bad humours. The heat, dwelling between apana and prana, in the region of the navel, operates with the help of these two breaths, and digests all the food consumed by a living creature. There is a duct beginning from the mouth down to the anal canal. Its extremity is the anus. From this main duct numerous subsidiary ones branch out in the bodies of all living creatures. Due to the rush and flow of the several breaths named above, through these ducts, the breaths mingle together.

The heat that dwells in prana is called ushman. It is this heat that causes digestion in all creatures possessed of bodies. Prana, the bearer of a current of heat, descends from the head downwards to the extremity of the anal canal and then is sent upwards once more. Coming back to its seat in the head, it once more sends down the heat it bears. Below the navel is the region of digested matter. Above it is that for the food which is eaten. In the navel are all the forces of life that sustain the body. Urged by the ten kinds of breaths having prana for their first, the ducts, branching out from the heart, convey the fluids that food yields, upwards, downwards and in transverse directions.

The main passage leading from the mouth to the anus is the path by which yogins, vanquishers of fatigue, of perfect equanimity in joy and sorrow, and possessed of great patience, succeed in attaining Brahman by holding the Soul within the thousand-petalled lotus in the brain. Even thus is heat breathed in prana, apana and the other breaths in all embodied creatures. That heat is always burning there like a fire placed in a vessel."

Bharadwaja said, "If it is the wind that keeps us alive, causes us to move and exert, to breathe and to speak, then it seems that life is worth little. If the animal heat, which digests all food, be of the nature of fire, and if it is fire which assists digestion by dissolving the food we eat, then life is worth little. When an animal dies, that which is called its life is never seen leaving it. Only the breath leaves it, and the internal heat becomes extinguished.

If life were nothing else than wind, or if life depended only on wind, then it could have been seen like the external sea of air, and when passing out it would have mingled with that air. If life depends upon air, and if it ended with the escape of that air from the body, it would then mingle with another portion of air that exists externally, like a portion of water escaping into the ocean and thereby only changing the place of its dwelling. If a portion of water were thrown into a well, or if the flame of a lamp be cast into a blazing fire, either of them, entering a homogeneous element, would lose its separate existence. If life were air it, also, when the animal died, would mingle with the great ocean of air outside.

How can we say that there is life in this animal body, which is made up of the five primal elements? If one of the elements disappear, the union of the other four becomes dissolved. The element of water dries up if food is not eaten. The element of air disappears if the breath is restrained. The element of space disappears if the excretions cease. So, too, the element of fire becomes extinguished if food is not ingested like fuel.

The element of earth breaks into pieces because of diseases, wounds and other sufferings. If only one of the five becomes afflicted, the union is dissolved, and all the five depart in five different directions. When the body, which is a union of the elements, becomes separated into five ingredients, where does life go? What does it then know? What does it then hear? What does it then say?

This cow that is given away to a holy Brahmana, it is said, will save me in the other world. The animal, however, that is given away, itself dies. Whom then will this cow deliver? The taker of the cow in dakshina and the giver are both equal in being both subject to death. Both of them meet with extinction in this world. How then will they meet again? How will the person that has been eaten by birds, or that has been broken by a fall from a mountain, or that has been consumed by fire, regain life? The root of a tree that has been cut down does not grow again. Only the seeds put forth sprouts. Where is the person who having died comes back to some sort of new existence? Only seeds were originally created. All this universe is the result of seeds appearing, and sprouting in succession. They that die, die to perish. Only seeds result from seeds."

Bhrigu said, “There is no destruction of the living creature, or of what is given, or of our other deeds. The creature that dies only goes into another form. The body alone dissolves away. The living creature, the jiva, although depending upon the body, does not meet with destruction when the body is destroyed. It is not seen after the destruction of the physical frame just as fire is not seen after the consumption of the fuel with which it was kindled.”

Bharadwaja said, “If there the living creature does not perish at death, I submit that fire itself is not seen after it consumes the fuel that ignited it. When the supply of fuel ends, the fire is extinguished, and, as far as I know, annihilated. That should surely be regarded to have met with destruction which no longer has any action, which furnishes no proof of its existence, and which no longer occupies any space.”

Bhrigu said, “It is true that upon its fuel being consumed, fire is no longer seen. It mingles with space because there is no longer any visible object in which to inhere, and hence it can no longer be perceived. Similarly, upon leaving the body, the jiva lives in ethereal space, and cannot be seen for it becomes extremely subtle, sukshma. It is fire or heat that sustains prana and the other breaths. Know that that heat is called life, the living agent. The heat which is the sustainer of the breaths is extinguished when suspiration ceases and the breaths no longer move in the body, enlivening it.

Upon the heat in the body being extinguished, the body itself loses animation. Falling, it is transformed into earth, for that is its ultimate destination. The breath that is in all mobile and immobile objects mingles with space, and the heat that is in them follows that breath. These three—space, air and fire—mingle. The other two elements, water and earth, exist together in the form of earth. There is wind where space is, and there is fire where wind is. They are formless, it should be known, and become endowed with form only in embodied creatures."

Bharadwaja said, "If in the physical bodies of all living creatures there exist heat, wind, earth, space and water, what, then, are the indications of a living agent? Tell me of these, O sinless one. I want to know the nature of the life that is in the bodies of living beings—bodies made up of the five primal elements, engaged in the five functions, endowed with the five senses and possessed of animation. Upon the dissolution of the body, that which is the living agent cannot be seen. If this body, composed of the five elements, were destitute of life, who or what then is that which suffers upon the appearance of either bodily or mental pain?

The living agent hears through the ears. Yet, O Maharishi, the same agent does not hear when its mind is preoccupied. It seems, therefore, that the living agent serves no purpose. Everything that the jiva sees acting in concert with the mind, the eye does not behold, even when it lies before it, if the mind were otherwise engaged. Then again, when it is under the influence of sleep, the living creature neither sees nor smells, hears nor speaks, nor experiences the perceptions of touch and taste. Who or what then is that which feels joy, becomes angry, gives way to sorrow and experiences tribulation? What is that which wishes, thinks, feels aversion and speaks?"

Bhrigu said, "The mind also is made of the five elements in common with the body. For this reason it is of no consequence with regard to the activities you speak of. Only the one internal Soul sustains the body. It is he that perceives smell, taste, sound, touch, form and other properties that exist in external nature. That Soul, pervading the body, is the witness of the actions of the mind imbued with five attributes and living within the body composed of the five elements. It is he who feels pleasure and pain and, when separated from him, the body no longer experiences them. In the absence of any perception of form or touch, when there is no heat in the fire that resides within the body—indeed, when the animal heat becomes extinguished—the body, bereft of the Soul, meets with death.

The whole universe is composed of water. Water is the form of all embodied creatures. Therein lies the Soul, which is displayed in the mind. That Soul is the creator Brahma who exists in all things. When the Soul becomes endowed with gross attributes, it is called kshetrajna. When freed from those attributes, it is known as Paramatman. Know that Supreme Soul. He is inspired with universal benevolence. He resides in the body like a drop of water in a lotus. Know well the kshetrajna that has universal benevolence. Darkness, passion, goodness—tamas, rajas and sattva—are the attributes of the living agent.

The learned say that the Soul has consciousness and exists with the attributes of life. The Soul exerts and causes everything to act, to experience. Those who have a knowledge of the Soul say that it is different from life. It is the Supreme Soul that has created the seven worlds and sets them in motion. There is no death of the jiva when the dissolution of the body takes place. Men of no intelligence say that it dies. That is untrue. All that the jiva does is to go from one to another body. That which is called death is only the dissolution of the body. It is thus that the Soul, wrapped in diverse forms, migrates from form to form, unseen, unnoticed.

Those possessed of true knowledge see the Soul with their keen and subtle vision. The man of wisdom, living on frugal fare, and with heart cleansed of all sins, devoted to yoga dhyana, succeeds every night, before and after sleep, in seeing his Atman with the help of his Atman. With a contented heart, and with all actions, good and bad, abandoned, one can obtain infinite happiness by depending upon one's own Soul. The king, of fiery effulgence, dwelling within the mind is called the Atman. It is from that lord of everything that this creation has sprung. This is the conclusion arrived at in the enquiry into the origin of creatures and the Soul."

Bhrigu said, "Brahma first created a few Brahmanas called Prajapatis, lords of creation. Possessed of splendour equal to that of the sun, they were created from the energy of the first-born Being. The puissant lord next created truth, duty, penance, purity, the eternal Vedas and all kinds of pious rituals, to enable creatures to attain heaven by practising them. After this, the Devas and the Danavas, the Gandharvas, the Daityas, the Asuras, the great Nagas, the Yakshas, the Rakshasas, the Sarpas, the Pisachas and Manavas with their four varnas—Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras—and all the other orders of beings that exist, were created.

The complexion of the Brahmanas was white; the Kshatriyas obtained red; the Vaisyas got yellow; and the Sudras were given black."

Bharadwaja said, "If the distinction between the four varnas of human beings be made by means only of colour, then it seems that all the four orders have been mingled. Lust, wrath, fear, cupidity, grief, anxiety, hunger and toil, possess and prevail over all men. How can men be distinguished by the possession of attributes? The bodies of all men emit sweat, urine, faeces, phlegm, bile and blood. How then can men be distributed into varnas? Of mobile objects the number is infinite; the species also of immobile objects are innumerable. How, then, can objects of such great diversity be distributed into different classes?"

Bhrigu said, "There is really no distinction between the different orders. The whole world initially consisted of Brahmanas. Created equal by Brahma, men have, due to their actions, become divided into different varnas. They that became fond of indulging desire and enjoying pleasures, possessed of the attributes of severity and anger gifted with courage, and unmindful of the duties of piety and worship, such Brahmanas endowed with the attribute of rajas, became Kshatriyas. Other Brahmanas, who disregarded the duties laid down for them, became possessed of both the attributes of sattva and rajas, and took to the professions of cattle-rearing and farming, became Vaisyas. Whereas the Brahmanas that became fond of untruth and violence, injuring other creatures, who were possessed by lust and greed, engaged in all kinds of sinful actions for a living, fell away from purity of conduct, and adhered to tamas, became Sudras. Separated by these occupations, Brahmanas, fallen from their own order, became members of the other three castes. All the four varnas, therefore, have always the right to the performance of all pious duties and sacrifices.

Even so were the four orders at first created equal by Brahma, who ordained for all of them the observances declared in the Vedas. Through greed alone, many fell away, and became possessed by ignorance. The Brahmanas are always devoted to the scriptures on the Brahman; and mindful of vows and restraints, are equal to grasping the concept of Brahman. Their penances, therefore, never go in vain. They amongst them are not Brahmanas that cannot understand that every created thing is the Supreme Brahman. These fallen ones, became members of diverse inferior varnas. Bereft of knowledge, and taking to an unrestrained and wayward course of conduct, they take birth as Pisachas, Rakshasas, Pretas and as individuals of diverse Mleccha tribes.

The Maharishis who at the beginning sprang into life through Brahma's will subsequently created, through their tapasya, men devoted to the svadharma ordained for them and attached to the rites laid down in the eternal Vedas. That other creation, however, which is eternal and undecaying, which is based upon Brahman and has sprung from the primeval being, and has its refuge in yoga, was a mental one."

Bharadwaja said, "Through what actions does one become a Brahmana? By what, a Kshatriya? O Dvijottama, with what karma again does one become a Vaisya or a Sudra? Tell me this, O most eloquent."

Bhrigu said, "He is called a Brahmana who has been sanctified by such rites as those called jaata and the others; who is pure in behaviour; who is engaged in studying the Vedas; who is devoted to the six well-known karmas of ablutions every morning and evening, silent recitation of mantras, pouring libations on the sacrificial fire, worshipping the Devas, offering humble hospitality to guests, and offering food to the Viswedevas; who is properly observant of all pious deeds; who never takes food without having offered it first to the gods and his guests; who is filled with reverence for his guru; and who is always devoted to vows and truth. He is called a Brahmana in whom are truth, charity, non-violence, compassion, shame, benevolence and penance: satya, dana, ahimsa, karuna, lajja, vinamrata and tapasya.

He who is engaged in the profession of battle, who studies the Vedas, who gives dakshina to Brahmanas and accepts wealth from those he protects is called a Kshatriya.

He who earns fame from keeping cattle, who is employed in farming and acquiring wealth, who is pure in behaviour and attends to the study of the Vedas, is called a Vaisya.

He who takes pleasure in eating every kind of food, who does any kind of work, however vile, who is impure in his behaviour, who does not study the Vedas, and whose conduct is unclean, is said to be a Sudra. If these characteristics are seen in a Brahmana, and if they are not found in a Sudra, then such a Brahmana is no Brahmana, and such a Sudra is no Sudra.

By every means should lust and wrath be restrained. This, as also self-restraint, are the highest results of knowledge. The two passions, anger and lust, should be resisted with one's whole heart. They exist to destroy one's highest good. One should always protect one's prosperity from one's wrath, one's penances from pride, one's knowledge from honour and disgrace, and one's Soul from every error.

The intelligent person, O Dvija, who performs all his duties without desire for their fruit, whose entire body of wealth exists for charity, and who performs the daily homa, is the real tyagi, a true renouncer.

One should conduct oneself as a friend to all creatures, and abstain from all acts of injury. Refusing all gifts, one should, with the help of one's own intelligence, be a complete master of one's passions. One should abide in one's Soul where there can be no grief. One would then have no fear here and attain a fearless realm hereafter. One should live always devoted to tapasya, and with all passions completely restrained observe the vow of taciturnity. With the Soul concentrated on itself, one should live desirous of conquering the senses, and remain unattached in the midst of attachments.

All things that can be perceived by the senses are called manifest. All, however, that is unmanifest, beyond the ken of the senses, that can be ascertained only by the subtle senses, should be sought to be known.

If there is no faith, one will never succeed in attaining that subtle, spiritual sense. Therefore, one should hold oneself in faith. The mind should be united with prana, and prana should then be held within Brahman. By dissociating oneself from all attachments, one will find absorption into Brahman. There is no need to attend to any other thing. A Brahmana can easily attain Brahman by the path of renunciation. The indications of a Brahmana are purity, good conduct and compassion for all creatures."

Bhrigu said, "Truth is Brahman; truth is japa; it is truth that creates all creatures. It is by truth that the whole universe is upheld; and it is with the help of satya that one ascends into swarga. Untruth is only another form of darkness. It is darkness that leads downwards. Those who are afflicted by tamas and covered by it, fail to behold the lustrous regions of heaven. It has been said that heaven is light and hell is darkness. The creatures that dwell in the universe may gain both heaven and hell. In this world also, truth and untruth lead to opposite courses of conduct and opposite indications, such as dharma and adharma, light and darkness, pleasure and pain. Amongst these, truth is dharma; dharma is light; and light is happiness. Similarly, asatya is adharma; adharma is tamas; and tamas is misery.

It is said that the wise notice how life is overwhelmed by sorrow, both physical and mental, and how happiness is sure to end in misery; this being so, they never let themselves be perplexed or stupefied. The wise man will strive to save himself from sorrow. The happiness of living creatures is unstable both here and hereafter. The joy of beings that are overwhelmed by darkness disappears like the splendour of the moon when afflicted by Rahu. For the sake of achieving happiness, both in this and the other world, the visible and the invisible fruits of action are specified in the Vedas. There is nothing more important than happiness among the rewards of the traiguna. Joy is desirable. It is an attribute of the Soul. Both dharma and artha are sought for its sake. Virtue is its root; This, indeed, is its origin. All actions have for their end the attainment of kama."

Bharadwaja said, "You have said that happiness is the highest object. I do not comprehend this. This attribute of the Soul that you say is so desirable is not sought by the Rishis engaged in practices promising a higher reward. It is heard that the creator of the three worlds, the puissant Brahma, lives alone, observing the brahmacharya vrata. He never devotes himself to the pleasure to be had from the gratification of desire. In addition, Shiva, the Divine Master of the universe, the lord of Uma, reduced Kama, the deity of desire, to ashes. For this reason, kama or pleasure is not acceptable to the Mahatman. Nor does it appear to be a high aspect of the Soul. I cannot believe in what you, divine one, have said: that there is nothing higher than happiness. That there are two kinds of outcomes to our actions—that happiness springs from good deeds and sorrow from sinful ones is only a saying that is current in the world."

Bhrigu said, "From untruth springs darkness. Those overwhelmed by darkness pursue only adharma and not dharma. Subjugated by anger, covetousness, malice, falsehood and other evils, they never find sukha either here or hereafter. On the other hand, they are afflicted by various kinds of disease, pain and troubles. They are also tortured by death, imprisonment, diverse other griefs, and by sorrows attending on hunger, thirst and toil. They are furthermore pained by the numerous bodily discomforts that arise from rain, wind, burning heat and extreme cold. They are also overwhelmed by numerous mental sufferings caused by loss of wealth, separation from friends, as also by anguish caused by decrepitude and death. Those who are untouched by these diverse kinds of physical and mental afflictions, know what happiness is.

These evils are never found in swarga. There, delicious breezes blow. In heaven, there is also perpetual fragrance. In heaven there is no hunger, no thirst, no decay, no sin. In this world there is both joy and sorrow. In hell there is only misery. Therefore, happiness is the highest object of acquisition. The earth is the progenitrix of all creatures. Females partake of her nature. The male animal is like Prajapati himself. The vital seed, you must know, is the creative energy. In this way did Brahma ordain in days of old that the creation should continue. Each being, affected by his own actions, gains joy or sorrow."

Bharadwaja said, "What is the effect of giving dakshina or dana? What of dharma? What of pravritti, conduct? What of penances? What of the study and recitation of the Vedas? And what of pouring libations on the fire?"

Bhrigu said, "By pouring libations on the sacred fire, sin is burnt. By study of the Vedas one finds blessed peace. By giving charity, one finds pleasure and the things of enjoyment. Through tapasya, one acquires blessed swarga. Dakshina is said to be of two kinds: gifts for the other world, and those for this. Whatever is given to the good attends the giver in the other world. Whatever is given to those that are not good yields fruit that are enjoyed here. The results of gifts are commensurate with the gifts themselves."

Bharadwaja said, "What dharma should be performed by whom? What are the characteristics of dharma? How many kinds of dharma are there? Tell me of these."

Bhrigu said, "Wise men engaged in the practice of their svadharma succeed in attaining heaven as their reward. By doing otherwise they become guilty of folly."

Bharadwaja said, "Tell me about the four asramas of life that were once ordained by Brahma, and the practices prescribed for each of them."

Bhrigu said, "In days of yore, to benefit the world, and for the protection of dharma, the divine Brahma indicated four asramas of life.

Amongst them, brahmacharya, living in the home of the guru is the first. He who is in this stage of life has his Soul cleansed by purity of conduct, Vedic rites, restraints, vows and humility. He should worship the morning and evening twilights, the sun, his own sacred fire, and the Devas. He should shun procrastination and idleness. He should purify his Soul by saluting his preceptor, by studying the Vedas, and by paying heed to his guru's instructions. He should perform his ablutions thrice: in the morning, noon and evening, during the three sandhyas. He should lead a life of celibacy, attend to his sacred fire, dutifully serve his guru, daily go out on a round of mendicancy to support himself; and give ungrudgingly to his guru the whole of what he receives as alms.

Willingly accomplishing everything that his master commands, he should be ready to receive such Vedic instruction as his preceptor may give him, as a favour to him. On this subject, a hymn that tells us that the Brahmana, who obtains his Veda by attending with reverence upon his preceptor, succeeds in attaining swarga and obtains the fruition of all his desires.

Grihastasrama, the domestic life, is the second. I will tell you about that asrama. Those who complete their tutelage in the guru's abode and return home, who are of pious conduct, who desire the fruits of a virtuous course of behaviour with their wives, have this asrama ordained for them. In it dharma, artha and kama are all gained since domesticity is suited for their cultivation. With wealth acquired by irreproachable actions, or with high efficacy gained in reciting the Vedas, or living upon such means as Rishis do, the householder should live this stage of his life.

With the produce of mountains and mines, or with wealth from the offerings made in sacrifices and on termination of vows and other observances, and those made unto Devas, should the grihastha lead his life. Grihastasrama is regarded as the root of all the others. They who live with their gurus, who lead lives of mendicancy, and others who live in the observance of vows and restraints, derive from this life of the householder the means they live upon, the offerings they make to the Pitris and the Devas, and, indeed, their entire support.

The third stage of life is called vanaprastha, the forest life. For those that lead it, there is no storing of wealth and possessions. Generally, these pious men subsist upon good food, and engaged in studying the Vedas, roam ceaselessly over the earth, journeying to tirthas and visiting diverse lands. Standing up, advancing forward, sweet speeches uttered in sincerity, gifts given according to the measure of the giver's means, the offering of excellent food, seats and beds of the best kind, are some of the ways to show them respect. On this subject, there is a saying: If a guest turns away from a house with his expectations unfulfilled, he takes away the merits of the householder and leaves behind all his sins.

Then again in grihastasrama, the Devas are gratified with sacrifices and other religious rites; the Pitris by the performance of obsequial rites; the Rishis by the cultivation of Vedic knowledge, by listening to the instructions of preceptors, and by committing to memory the scriptures, and lastly, Brahma himself by begetting children.

On this subject, there are two hymns: One in the observance of this stage of life should speak to all creatures words of affection that are always agreeable to the ears. To give pain, to inflict mortifications and harsh words are all censurable. Insults, arrogance and deceit should also be avoided. Non-violence, truth and the absence of wrath yield the merit of tapasya in all the four stages of life.

In grihastasrama, these are allowed: the use and enjoyment of flower garlands, ornaments, robes, perfumed oils and liniments; the enjoyment of pleasures derived from music, dance and all sights and scenes that please the eyes; the enjoyment of various kinds of viands and drinks; the enjoyment of pleasures derived from sports and every kind of amusement, and the gratification of sexual desires. He, who, in the observance of the householder's life, seeks the acquisition of dharma, artha and kama, with the three attributes of sattva, rajas and tamas, enjoys great happiness here and at last attains the end that is kept for those who are virtuous and good.

Even the householder who observes the duties of his mode of life by following the practice of picking up fallen grains of corn from the cracks in fields and who abandons sensual pleasure and attachment to action, does not find it difficult to attain swarga."

Bhrigu said, "Forest recluses seeking the acquisition of virtue go to sacred waters, rivers, springs, and undergo penances in secluded forests abounding in deer, bison, boars, tigers and wild elephants. They forsake all kinds of clothes, food and enjoyments for which people living in society have a taste. They subsist abstemiously upon wild herbs, fruits, roots and leaves of diverse kinds. The bare ground is their seat. They lie down on the plain earth, rocks, pebbles, gravel, sand or ashes. They cover their limbs with grass, animal skins and the bark of trees. They never shave their heads and beards or clip their nails. They perform their ablutions at regular intervals. They pour libations onto the ground, as also into the sacred fire at the proper time and without fail.

They never enjoy any rest until completing their daily gathering of the fuel for their homa fires and sacred grass, flowers for sacrifice and worship, and until they have swept, washed and rubbed clean their sacrificial altars. They bear, without the least regard, cold and heat, rain and wind, so that the their skin is rough, cracked all over; and from observing various kinds of rites and vows, their bodies become emaciated, skin and bones. Endowed with great patience and fortitude, they live, always in the sattva guna. He who, with a restrained Soul, observes such a course of life, originally ordained by enlightened Rishis, burns all his sins as in a fire and obtains regions of felicity that are most difficult to attain.

I will now describe the lives of the Parivrajakas. Liberated from attachment to the sacred fire, wealth, wife, children, fine clothes, seats, beds, and other such objects of enjoyment, and unshackled from the bonds of affection, they roam the world, regarding with an equal eye a clod of earth, a rock and a nugget of gold. They never set their hearts on the acquisition or enjoyment of dharma, artha and kama. They cast an equal eye on foes, friends and strangers. They never injure, in thought, word or deed, any creature, mobile or immobile. They have no homes. They range over hills and mountains, upon shores of rivers or seas, lie in the shade of trees, and among temples. They may go into towns or villages. However, they should not live for more than five nights in a town, while in a village their stay should never exceed one night. Entering a town or a village, they should, for sustenance, go only to the homes of Brahmanas of liberal deeds. They should never ask for any alms except what is given into the wooden bowls they carry. They should free themselves from lust, wrath, pride, greed, delusion, miserliness, deceit, slander, vanity and violence to living creatures.

On this subject, too, there are some hymns: One who observes the vow of mowna, and roves without giving any creature cause for fear is never given any fear himself by any creature. The learned one who performs the agnihotra not by kindling an external fire but with the fire that is his own body, indeed, who pours libations into his own mouth and on the fire that burns in his own body, succeeds in attaining numerous regions of grace because he feeds the fire with such libations obtained by a life of mendicancy. The Brahmana who observes this mode of life with moksha for its end, with a pure heart and with an intellect freed from resolution, attains Brahman like a tranquil ray of light that is not fed by any blazing fuel."

Bharadwaja said, "Beyond this world that we inhabit there is a world that we have heard of but never seen. I wish to know all about it. Tell me about that realm."

Bhrigu said, "Towards the north, on the other side of Himavat, which is sacred and has every merit, there is a realm that is sacred, blessed and most desirable. It is called Paraloka, the other world. Men who inhabit this world are virtuous, pious, of pure hearts, freed from greed and errors of judgement, and not subject to afflictions of any kind. That realm is, indeed, equal to swarga, for its exalted attributes. Death comes there at the proper season. Diseases never touch its inhabitants. Nobody harbours any desire for the wives of other men; everyone is devoted to his own wife. These people do not afflict or kill one another, or covet one another's possessions. No sin occurs there, and no doubt arises.

The fruits of all good deeds are plainly manifest there. There some enjoy seats, drinks and food of the best kind, and live in palaces and mansions. Some, adorned with ornaments of gold, surround themselves with every object of enjoyment. Again, some eat very abstemiously, only to keep body and Soul together, while others, with great toil, seek to control their life-breaths.

Here, in this world that we inhabit, some men are devoted to dharma and some to adharma. Some are happy and some miserable; some are poor and some rich. Here toil, fear, delusion and painful hunger make their appearance. Here lust for wealth is also seen, a passion that deludes even the wise. Here diverse opinions prevail, broached by those that live in both punya and paapa. The learned one who knows all the opinions that may be divided into two kinds is never stained by sin. Deceit, with fraud, theft, slander, malice, oppression, violence, treachery, untruth and vices decreases the merit of the tapasya of those who perform penance. The wise person, on the other hand, avoids these sins, and finds the punya of his tapasya increased. Here there is much reflection about actions that are of dharma and ones that are of adharma. This realm that we inhabit is the field of actions, the karma-kshetra. Having done good and evil here, one finds rewards for one's good deeds and evil for sins.

Here Brahma himself, in the days of yore, and all the Devas with the Rishis, performed tapasya, became purified and attained Brahman. The northern portion of the earth is the most auspicious and sacred. Those belonging to this world that do deeds of dharma or show regard for yoga are born in the northern realm.

Others, of a different disposition, take their births in the intermediate species. Some, again, when their allotted life spans run out, become lost on earth. Engaged in feeding upon one another and stained by greed, lust and delusion, these men return to this very world, without being able to go to the northern blessed region, after dying. Intelligent men who observe brahmacharya and keep vratas, who listen with veneration to the instructions of preceptors, succeed in knowing the ends reserved for all kinds of men.

I have now told you in brief the course of duties ordained by Brahma. He, indeed, is said to be possessed of intelligence who knows what dharma is and what its opposite, in this world."'

Bhishma continue, 'Thus, O Rajan, did Bhrigu speak to Bharadwaja. The virtuous Bharadwaja became filled with wonder and worshipped Maharishi Bhrigu with deep reverence. Thus, I have described the origin of the universe to you in detail. What do you wish to hear next?'

Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, I believe that you know all things, O you who know dharma. I want to hear you discourse, O Anagha, on the ordinances about pravritti, conduct.'

Bhishma says, 'They that are of bad conduct, of sinful deeds, of wicked understanding and excessive rashness, are called evil men. They, however, that are called good are distinguished by the purity of their conduct and practices. They are good men who never answer calls of nature on the high roads, in cow-pens or in fields of paddy. After the defecation, one should perform one's ablutions in river water and gratify the gods with oblations of water. This is said to be the duty of all men.

Surya should be always worshipped. One should not sleep after sunrise. Morning and evening prayers prescribed in the scriptures should be recited while sitting with one's face turned towards the east at dawn and towards the west at dusk. Washing the five limbs, one should eat silently with the face turned towards the east. One should never disparage the food that one eats. One should eat food that is pure, well-prepared and tasty. After eating one should wash one's hands and rise. One should never go to sleep at night with wet feet. The Devarishi Narada said that these are indications of good conduct.

Every day one should circumambulate a sacred spot, a bull, a holy image, a cow-pen, a place where four roads meet, a pious Brahmana and a sacred tree. One should not make distinctions between one's guests and servants and relatives in matters of food. Equality in this regard with servants is lauded. Eating twice a day, in the morning and evening, is an ordinance of the Devas. To eat again at any intermediate time is not allowed. He who eats like this acquires the punya of an upavasa, a fast.

At the hours appointed for homa, one should pour libations on the sacred fire. Without seeking the companionship of other men's wives, the wise man who seeks out his own wife in her season acquires the punya of brahmacharya. The leavings of a Brahmana's food are like amrita. They are like mother's milk. Men prize those leavings called vighasa. By eating them, virtuous men attain Brahman. He who pounds turf to clay to make sacrificial altars, he who cuts grass to make sacrificial fuel, he who uses only his fingers and nails, and not weapons of any kind to eat sanctified meat, he who always subsists on the remnants of a Brahmana's food, he who acts, induced by desire for the high reward, has not to live long in the world. One who has vowed to abstain from meat should not eat any meat even if it were sanctified with mantras from the Yajurveda. One should also avoid the flesh from the vertebral column of any animal and the flesh of animals not slain in sacrifices.

Whether at one's own home or in a strange land, one should never cause one's guest to go without food. One should offer alms received to one's elders. One should offer seats to one's elders and salute them with respect. By worshipping his elders, a man obtains a long life, fame and prosperity. One should never look at the sun at the moment of its rising, nor should one turn one's gaze towards a naked woman who is another man's wife. Congress with one's wife in her season is not sinful but it must always be done in privacy.

The heart of all sacred tirthas and shrines is the guru. The heart of all pure and cleansing things is fire. All deeds done by a pious person are laudable, including the touching of the hair of a cow's tail. Every time one meets with another, one should make polite enquiries after their health and well-being. The reverencing of Brahmanas every morning and evening is ordained. In the temples of gods, amidst cows, in performing the rites of dharma laid down for Brahmanas, in reading the Vedas, and in eating, the right hand should be raised. The worship of Brahmanas, morning and evening, with due rites, yields great punya. From such worship the stock-in-trade of the merchant becomes abundant as does the produce of the farmer.

Great also becomes the yield of all kinds of corn and the supply of all things that the senses can enjoy becomes copious.

When serving another person food, one should inquire, "Is it enough?" When pouring a drink, one should ask, "Will it satisfy you?", and when giving payasa, or the sugared gruel of barley, or milk with sesame or peas, one should ask, "Has it fallen?" After shaving, spitting, bathing and eating, people should worship Brahmanas with reverence. Such worship is sure to bestow longevity on sickly men. One should not pass urine with one's face turned towards the sun, nor should one look at one's own excreta. One should not lie on the same bed with a woman, or eat with her. In addressing elders, one should never use the familiar pronoun or take their names. This is not the case with those equal to or younger than one is in age.

The hearts of sinful men betray the sins committed by them. Those sinners that conceal their conscious sins from good men meet with destruction. Only fools seek to hide the sins that they commit knowingly. It is true that human beings do not see those sins but the gods always witness them. A sin concealed by another sin leads to fresh sins. An action of merit, again, if hidden by another deed of merit, increases the punya. The actions of a virtuous man always follow in the wake of virtue. A man devoid of intellect never thinks of the sins committed by him. Such sins, however, overtake the doer who has fallen away from the scriptures. As Rahu comes to Chandra at his proper time, these sins come to the foolish man.

Objects stored with expectation are scarcely enjoyed. Such hoarding is never lauded by the wise, for death waits for no one but snatches away his prey whether he is prepared or not. The wise have said that the dharma of all creatures is an attribute of the mind. For this reason, one should, in one's mind, think well of and wish good to all. One should practice virtue singly. In the practice of virtue, one has no need for the help of others. If one has the ordinances of the scriptures, what can an associate do? Dharma is the origin of humankind. Dharma is the ambrosia of the gods. After death, through their dharma, men enjoy eternal happiness.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, what and of what nature is that which is called Adhyatma and which is ordained for every person. O you who know Brahman, whence has this universe of mobile and unmoving things, been created? When universal destruction, the Pralaya, sets in, to whom does it go? Tell me of all this.'

Bhishma says 'Yudhishtira, I will speak of this Adhyatma that you ask about. It is most agreeable and yields great felicity. Great teachers have always revealed the truths about the creation and destruction of the universe. Knowing these truths, a man may find, even in this world, great satisfaction and prosperity. Such knowledge may also lead to the acquisition of great rewards and is highly beneficial to all creatures. Earth, air, space, water and light numbered as the fifth, are regarded as great spirits, Mahabhutas. These constitute both the origin and the destruction of all created things. Unto him from whom these great primal elements take their origin, they return repeatedly, severing themselves from all creatures into whose compositions they enter, even as the waves of the ocean subside into that from which they seem to rise. As the tortoise stretches its limbs and withdraws them again, so does the Supreme Soul create the universe and again withdraws it into Himself.

The creator imbues all created being with the five primal elements in different proportions. The living creature, however, does not see this through ignorance. Sound, the organs of hearing and all apertures—these three spring from space, with Akasa as their progenitor. Touch, action, and skin are the triple attributes of Vayu, wind. Form, eye and digestion are the triad attributes of fire, Agni. Taste, all liquid secretions, and the tongue represent the three attributes of water, Apah. Scents, the nose and the body are the three properties of Bhumi, the earth. The great primal elements are five, the Panchamahabhutas. The mind, buddhi, is the sixth. The senses and the mind, O Bhaarata, are the sources of all the perceptions of a living creature. The seventh is called the manas, intellect; and the eighth is the Soul, the Atman.

The senses are for perceiving; the mind, unable to deal with perceptions, creates uncertainty. Awareness reduces all perceptions to certainty. The Soul exists as a witness, never acting itself. All that is above the two feet, all that is behind, and all that is above, are seen by the Soul. Know that the Soul pervades the entire being without any space being left untenanted. All men should know the senses, the mind and the intellect fully.

The three attributes called darkness, passion and goodness, or the gunas known as tamas, rajas and sattva exist, dependent on the senses, the mind and the intellect. Man, by apprehending with the help of his knowledge, the manner in which creatures come into and leave the world, is sure to gradually attain steadfast calm. The traigunas lead the awareness to worldly attachments. In this respect, the intellect is identical with the senses and the mind. Knowledge, therefore, is identical with the six: the five senses and the mind, and with the world perceived by them. When, however, the intellect is destroyed, the three gunas of tamas, rajas and sattva can no more lead to any action.

This universe, chala and achala, consists of that manas. It is from the mind that everything arises and it is into it that everything subsides. For this reason, the scriptures indicate that everything is a manifestation of manas. That by which one hears is the ear. That by which one smells is the nose and that through which one distinguishes the tastes is the tongue. Through the coat of skin that covers the body one has the perception of touch.

That which is called manas undergoes modifications. When the intellect desires anything, it comes to be called the mind. The foundations upon which the intellect rests are five, each serving a different purpose. These are the senses. The invisible principle, intelligence, rests upon them. The mind that exists in a living creature concerns itself with the three gunas —sattva, rajas and tamas. Sometimes it finds joy and at other times, grief. Sometimes it becomes divested of both joy and misery. Even thus, wisdom exists in the minds of all men. Sometimes the intelligence, which is made up of the traiguna, transcends those three through yoga, communion with Brahman, like the lord of rivers, the ocean, transgressing the continents with tides of vast waves.

The intellect, which transcends the traigunas, exists in the mind in a pure state of unmodified existence: alone. The quality of darkness, however, which impels one to action, soon pursues it. At that time, the intellect sets all the senses to action. The properties of the three are even thus: joy dwells in goodness; sorrow in passion; delusion in darkness. All the states that exist of the mind are included in the three. I have now, O Bhaarata, told you about the course of the intellect. An intelligent man should subdue all his senses.

The three gunas are always attached to living creatures. Three kinds of intelligence also are seen in every creature—that which depends upon sattva, that upon rajas and that upon tamas. The sattva guna brings happiness; rajas produces sorrow; and if these two combine with the quality of tamas then neither happiness nor sorrow ensues but only delusion and error. Every state of happiness that appears in the body or the mind is said to be due to the sattva guna. A state of sorrow, disagreeable to oneself, is due to nothing but rajoguna. One should never think of it with fear. That state, again, which is allied to delusion and dark sin, from which one knows not what to do, which is unascertainable and unknown, belongs to the tamoguna.

Gladness, satisfaction, delight, happiness, peace of mind are the properties of sattva. Man sometimes obtains a measure of them. Discontent, heartache, grief, greed, anger, lust and vindictiveness are all indications of rajas. They are seen with or without adequate cause to make them spring up. Disgrace, delusion, sin, error, torpor, sleep and stupefaction, which overtake one through a surfeit of misfortune, are the various properties of tamas.

The one whose mind is far-reaching, able to extend in all directions, mistrustful of winning the objects it desires, and well restrained, is happy both here and hereafter. Mark the distinction between these two subtle things, the intellect and the Soul—manas and Atman. One of these, the intellect, puts forth qualities. The other, the Soul, does nothing of the kind.

Although a gnat and a fig may be seen together, each is distinct from the other. Similarly, intelligence and the Soul, though separate from each other, by their very natures, may always be seen to exist in a state of union. A fish and water exist in a state of union. Each is entirely different from the other. So it is with the intellect and the Soul.

The gunas do not know the Atman, but the Atman knows them all. The Soul is the spectator of the qualities and regards them all as proceeding from itself. The Soul, acting through the senses, the mind and intellect being the seventh, all of which are inactive and have no self-consciousness, discovers the objects amidst which it exists like a covered lamp revealing everything around it by shedding its rays through an opening in the covering. The mind creates all the qualities. The Soul only beholds them as a witness. Even such is the connection between the mind and Soul.

There is no refuge on which either the intellect or the Soul depends. The intellect creates the mind, but never the qualities. When through the mind the Soul sufficiently restrains the rays that emanate from the senses, it becomes manifest to the mind like a lamp burning within a vessel that envelops it.

He who renounces all mundane activities, practices tapasya, devotes himself to study the Atman, takes delight therein, and regards himself as the Soul of all creatures, acquires a high end. As a water bird, while moving over the water, is never drenched, even so does a person of wisdom move in the world among other creatures. Using one's intelligence, one should live and behave in the world after this fashion, without grief, without joy, with an equal eye for all, and without malice and envy. One living in this way succeeds in creating the qualities, rather than being affected by them, like a spider spins its web. The gunas should, indeed, be regarded as the threads of the spider's web.

Some say that for such men the gunas are not lost; some say that they are all lost. Those who say that they are not lost rely upon the revealed scriptures, the srutis, which do not contain any declaration to the contrary. They, on the other hand, who say that the gunas are all lost, rely on the smritis. Reflecting upon both these opinions, one should judge which of them is right. One should thus go beyond this hard and knotty question that can disturb the intellect with doubt, and thereby win happiness. When doubt is removed, one will no longer have to experience sorrow of any kind.

Men of vile hearts may through knowledge gain spiritual success even like men who plunge into a clear well-filled swift river to purify themselves of all dirt. He who has to cross a wide river does not feel happy at merely seeing the other shore. If by just looking at the other shore he could reach it in a boat, then he might become happy. The matter is otherwise with one who knows the truth. The mere knowledge of truth will bring him happiness. As soon as such knowledge begins to bear fruit, it may be regarded that he has reached the other shore. They, who know the Soul as free from all worldly objects and being but the One, find high and liberating knowledge.

By knowing the origin and the end of all creatures, and by reflecting upon this, a man gradually gains infinite happiness. He who has understood and reflects upon the idea that the traiguna are mortal and not eternal, casts them aside, and succeeds through yoga to behold the truth and obtain perfect felicity. The Soul cannot be seen unless the senses, which are absorbed by diverse objects and are difficult to control, are restrained. He who knows this is wise. What other indication is there of a wise man? With this knowledge, men of intelligence consider themselves to be crowned with final success. That which inspires the ignorant with fear can never inspire fear in men of knowledge. There is no higher end for anyone than mukti.

However, because of the excess or otherwise of good qualities, the sages say that differences exist with the degree of moksha. By acting without expecting any fruit for his deeds, a man succeeds by those very actions in annihilating his sins of a former lifetime. To the wise, the karma of a past life having been thus washed away and the karma of this life also regarding actions performed without expectation of reward, do not fetch any disagreeable consequence, such as immurement in hell. But how can action, if one continues to be engaged in karma, bring about mukti?

The sages censure a man who is ruled by lust, envy and other evil passions. Such vices hurl the jiva in his next life into diverse inferior orders of being. Mark closely the vicious people in this world who grieve so much over the loss of their possessions, sons, wives and others. Look also at those who are gifted with judgement and never grieve when cast into similar circumstances. Men conversant with both—gradual moksha and instant moksha—deserve to be called truly wise.’

Bhishma says, 'I will now, O son of Pritha, tell you about the four kinds of yoga-dhyana. Gaining knowledge of these, the Maharishis attain eternal moksha even here, in this world. Maharishis gratified with knowledge, with hearts set upon mukti, and conversant with yoga, perform karma in such a manner that their dhyana might progress effectively. Liberated from the faults of the world, Yudhishtira, these never return to rebirth. Free from birth and death, they live in their original state, absorbed in the Brahman. Freed from the influence of all the pairs of opposites such as heat and cold, joy and sorrow, and the rest, ever dwelling in their own pristine Soul, liberated from attachments, never accepting anything as gifts, they live in places free from the companionship of wives and children, without others with whom disputes may arise, places favourable to perfect peace of mind.

There, such a one, with speech restrained, sits like a block of wood, all his senses subdued, with his mind undividedly united through dhyana with the Paramatman. He has no perception of sound, none of touch; no perception of form, none of scent, and none of taste. Immersed in yoga, he abandons all things, and is rapt just in dhyana. Possessed of great energy of mind, he has no desire for anything that excites or stirs the five senses.

The wise man, withdrawing his five senses into the mind, should then fix the unstable mind with the five senses in the intellect. Possessed of patience, the yogin stills his constantly wandering mind, so that the five portals to his body are sealed from all distracting worldly objects. In the firmament of the heart, he focuses his mind in meditation, making it independent of the body or any other refuge. I have spoken of the path of meditation as the first path, since the yogin has first to quell his senses and his mind and direct them singly to that path.

When thus restrained, the mind, which is the sixth sense, seeks to flash out like capricious lightning frolicking among the clouds. As a drop of water on a lotus leaf is unstable and moves about in all directions, even so is the yogin's mind when first turned to the path of dhyana. When focused for a while, the mind stays on that path. When it strays again onto the path of the wind, it becomes as flighty as the wind. The one adept with the ways of yoga-dhyana, is not discouraged by this. He ignores the loss of his effort and, with idleness and malice cast aside, he returns to direct his mind again to meditation.

When one yokes one's mind in yoga, in silence, one gains discrimination, knowledge and the power to avoid evil. Though annoyed by the flightiness of his mind, the seeker should constantly draw it back and fix it repeatedly in dhyana. The yogin should never despair, but seek his own good. As a heap of dust, ashes or burnt cowdung, when only partially wetted with water is not fully drenched, and, indeed, continues to dry again and must be incessantly watered before it gradually becomes soaked through, even so should the yogin strive to control his senses. He should withdraw them gradually. Then he succeeds in controlling them.

O Bhaarata, by directing one's mind and senses to the path of meditation, one succeeds in bringing them under perfect control through steadfast yoga. The bliss felt by a person who has succeeded in controlling his mind and senses is such that its like can never be found through exertion or destiny. United with such felicity, he continues to find deep bliss in meditation. Even in this way yogins attain nirvana.'

Yudhishtira says, 'You have spoken on the four stages of life and their duties. You have also spoken of the dharma of kings. You have recounted many ancient tales of diverse kinds and dealing with diverse subjects. I have also heard from you, O you of great intelligence, many discourses about dharma. I have, however, one lingering question. I wish, O Bhaarata, to hear about the fruits that silent chanters of sacred mantras, the japis, acquire through their practice of japa. What are the fruits that have been indicated for such men? Which is the world to which they go after death? Also, O sinless one, tell me all the laws that have been laid down for japa. When the word japi is uttered, what shall I understand by it? Is such a man to be regarded as following the ordinances of samkhya, yoga or karma? Or does he observe the laws of yagna? What is the path of the japis called? You have, as I believe, universal knowledge. Tell me all this.'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to the old itihasa of what transpired between Yama, Kaala and a certain Brahmana. Sages conversant with the means of attaining moksha have spoken of two paths: samkhya and yoga. Amongst these, in the first, otherwise called the Vedanta, renunciation has been preached with regard to silent japa. The declarations of the Vedas preach that abstention from rites is fraught with tranquillity, and is concerned directly with Brahman. Indeed, the two paths spoken of by sages bent on achieving their weal are such that both concern, as well as do not concern, japa. I will explain the manner in which silent chanting is connected with each of the two paths and its cause.

In both samkhya and yoga, as in the case of japa, the senses must be subdued and the mind fixed in dhyana after withdrawing it from the outer world. Truth is also prescribed, keeping the sacred fire lit, living in solitude, penance, self-restraint, forgiveness, benevolence, abstemiousness in food, withdrawal from worldly attachments, silence and serenity. These constitute a yagna in deeds, in karma.

Listen now to the course that consists of abstention from karma. The manner in which the karma of the japi observing the vow of brahmacharya may cease, I will speak of presently. Such a man should conduct himself in every way according to what I have already said. Setting himself on the path of abstention, he should seek to extinguish his dependence on both the outer and the inner attachments. Sitting on kusa grass, with kusa in his hand, and binding his hair with kusa, he should surround himself with kusa and wear kusa as his raiment.

Bowing to all earthly concerns, he should take leave of them and never then think of them. Assuming equability with the help of his mind, he should fix his mind on the mind itself. Reciting the most sacred mother of all mantras, the Gayatri, he meditates with his intellect on Brahman alone. Afterwards, he leaves off even that, then becoming absorbed in the highest dhyana. This highest dhyana will come of itself because of the power of the Gayatri that he recites. Through tapasya, he attains purity of the Soul, self-restraint and the cessation of aversion and desire. Freed from attachment and delusion, above the influence of all the pairs of opposites—heat and cold, joy and sorrow and all the others—he never grieves and never suffers himself to be drawn towards worldly objects. He does not regard himself as the doer, or the enjoyer or sufferer of the results of his actions. He never, through selfishness, sets his mind on any object of desire.

Without being employed in the acquisition of wealth, he abstains also from disregarding or insulting others, but not from work. The work in which he is engrossed is that of meditation; he is devoted to meditation, and seeks meditation unalterably. Through meditation, he succeeds in bringing about concentrated dhyana, and then gradually leaves off meditation itself. In that state, he enjoys the felicity that attaches to the abandonment of all things. With complete control over desire, he casts off his life-breaths and enters into the Brahmic body. Alternatively, if he does not wish to enter into the Brahmic body, he ascends into Brahmaloka and is never reborn. Having become tranquillity's self, and freed from every kind of trouble, depending upon his own intelligence, such a one succeeds in attaining that Soul which is pure, immortal and without any stain.'

Yudhishtira says, 'You have said that japis find this very high end. Is this their only end or there is any other to which they aspire?'

Bhishma says, 'Listen, O mighty king, to the end that silent japis attain, and to the diverse kinds of hell into which they sink. The japi who does not at first conduct himself according to the prescribed method, and who cannot complete the ritual or course of discipline laid down, must sink into hell. The chanter who is without faith, who is not content with his work, and who takes no pleasure in it, finds hell for himself. They who follow the ritual with pride in their hearts, all go to hell. The reciter who insults and disregards others will find naraka. The man who betakes himself to silent chanting under the influence of tamas and from a desire for fruit, gains all the things upon which his heart becomes set.

The japi, whose heart is intent upon the attributes that go by the name of sattva, has to incur hell. The chanter who takes to recitation under the influence of attachments to earthly objects such as wealth, wives and others, obtains the objects upon which his heart is set. The reciter of evil intellect and uncleansed Soul, who sets himself to his work with an unstable mind, finds an unstable end or falls into naraka. The chanter who is unwise, foolish, stupefied or deluded falls into hell where he suffers fierce regrets. If a man of even firm heart, and resolved to complete the discipline, takes to japa, but fails to attain its culmination because he has freed himself from attachments by a violent wrench without genuine conviction of their uselessness or harmful character, he too finds naraka.'

Yudhishtira says, 'After the japi acquires the essence of that which is Supreme, indescribable, inconceivable, which dwells in Pranava, the syllable AUM that is the subject of both japa and dhyana, indeed, when japis attain the state of Brahman, why is it that they still have to be born again in embodied forms?'

Bhishma says, 'As a result of the absence of true knowledge and wisdom, chanters fall into diverse hells. The discipline followed by japis is certainly a superior one. These, however, are its faults.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Describe the hells to which a japi goes. I feel, O Pitamaha, a curiosity to know about them.'

Bhishma says, 'You have sprung from an amsa of Dharma Deva. You are by nature observant of dharma. Listen, O Anagha, with undivided attention, to these words that rest on dharma.

The realms that belong to the high-Souled Devas are of diverse aspects, colours, descriptions, which yield myriad fruits, and are of great excellence. The chariots again that move at the will of their riders, the beautiful mansions and halls, the various pleasure-gardens embellished with golden lotuses, the realms that belong to the four Lokapalas, Sukra, Brihaspati, the Maruts, Viswedevas, Sadhyas, Aswins, Rudras, Adityas, Vasus and other lords of swarga are spoken of as hells, when compared with the region of the Paramatman.

The realm of the Brahman is free from any fear, uncreated, the first and the last, without pain of any kind, without ignorance and delusion, without any agreeable or disagreeable element, beyond the reach of sattva, rajas and tamas. It is free from the five primal elements, the senses, mind and intellect. It is without the three distinctions between the knower, the known and knowing; free also from the four actions of seeing, hearing, thinking and knowing, without the four-fold causes of relative knowledge, without joy, sorrow and disease.

Time in his forms of past, present and future arises there for use at will. Kaala is not the ruler there. The supreme world is the ruler of time as also of heaven. The japi who becomes identified with his Soul by withdrawing everything into it goes there, he never has to feel any sorrow. This world is called Supreme. All the other realms of which I first spoke are hells. I have not told you of all the worlds that are called hells. Indeed, in comparison with the best of worlds, all the others are called hell.’

Yudhishtira says, 'You referred to the dispute between Kaala, Mrityu, Yama, Ikshvaku and a Brahmana. Relate that story to me in full.'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to the Purana of what transpired between Surya's son Ikshvaku, a certain Brahmana, and Kaala and Mrityu. Listen to what happened, the conversation that took place between them, and the place where it transpired.

There was a certain Brahmana of great fame and pious conduct. He was a japi. Possessed of deep wisdom, he was well conversant with the six Angas of the Vedas. He was of the Kusika vamsa and the son of Pippalada. Through his tapasya, he acquired spiritual insight into the Angas. He lived at the foot of Himavat, and was devoted to the Vedas. Silently reciting the Gayatri mantra, he practiced severe austerities to attain Brahman. A thousand years passed while he was engaged in the observance of vows and fasts. The goddess of the Gayatri, she who is called Savitri, showed herself to him and said, "I am gratified with you."

Continuing to recite the sacred mantra, the Brahmana remained silent and spoke not a word to the Devi. The goddess felt compassion for him and became most gratified. The mother of the Vedas lauded the japa in which the Brahmana had been engaged. After finishing his chanting for the day, the Brahmana stood up and, with head bowed, prostrated himself before Devi Savitri's feet.

The exalted japi said, “Through great fortune, O Devi, you have become pleased with me and have shown yourself to me. If, indeed, you are gratified with me, the boon I ask is that my heart may take pleasure in being engrossed in japa.”

Savitri said, “What do you ask for, O Rishi? What wish of yours shall I accomplish? Tell me, O best of japis, and everything will be as you wish.”

The Brahmana replied, “Let my desire to continue my japa increase with each passing moment. Let also, O auspicious Devi, the absorption of my mind into samadhi be more complete.”

The goddess sweetly said, “Let it be as you wish.” Wanting to bless the Brahmana, the Devi said again to him, “You will not have to go to the hell where other great Brahmanas go. You will go into the realm of Brahman, which is uncreated and free from every fault. I will leave you now, but that which you have asked me shall come to pass. Continue chanting with a restrained Soul and rapt attention. The god Dharma will come to you in person. Kaala, Mrityu and Yama also will all approach you. There will be a dispute here, between them and you, on a question of dharma.”

With these words, the Devi Savitri returned to her own abode and the Brahmana continued his japa for a thousand celestial years. With anger restrained, bereft of malice, in control of himself, he passed his time firmly devoted to truth. Upon the completion of his observance, Dharma Deva, gratified with him, showed his person to the enlightened one.

Dharma said, “O Dvija, behold me, I am Dharma. I have come here to see you. You have won the reward of your long japa. I will tell you what the reward is. You have won all the realms of felicity that belong to either the gods or men. O virtuous Soul, you will ascend above all the realms of the Devas. O sannyasi, cast off your prana and go to whatever realm you please. By discarding your body you will win many worlds of bliss.”

The Brahmana said, “What have I to do with the worlds of bliss of which you speak? O Dharma, go wherever you please. I will not, O puissant lord, shed this body that is subject to great happiness and pain.”

Dharma said, “Dvijottama, your body must be cast aside. Ascend to swarga, O Brahmana! Or tell us what else would please you, sinless one.”

The Brahmana said, “I do not wish to dwell in heaven itself without this body of mine. Leave me, O Dharma. I have no desire to go to swarga without my own body.”

Dharma said, “Do not set your heart so on your body; discard it and be happy. Go into regions that are free from the Rajoguna and where you will never have to feel any pain or grief.”

The Brahmana said, “O highly blessed one, I find great bliss in japa. What need have I for the immortal lokas of which you speak? Indeed, O mighty Lord, I do not wish to go to swarga even with this body of mine.”

Dharma said, “If you do not wish to cast off your body, behold, O Dvija, here is Kaala, there is Mrityu, and Yama, who are all approaching you!”

After Dharma had said this, Vivaswat’s son Yama, Kaala and Mrityu, the three who snatch away all creatures from the earth, approached the Brahmana and addressed him thus.

Yama said, “I am Yama. I say unto you that a high reward awaits you for this excellent tapasya of yours, and for this pious conduct that you have observed.”

Kaala said, “You have won a high reward which is in proportion to the japa that you have completed. The time is come for you to ascend into swarga. I am Kaala and I have come to you.”

Mrityu said, “O you that are a knower of dharma, know me for Mrityu herself in her true form. I have come to you in person, urged by Kaala, to bear you away from here, O Brahmana.”

The Brahmana said, “Welcome to Surya’s son, to Kaala, to Mrityu and to Dharma! What can I do for you all?”

The Brahmana gave them padya, water to wash their feet, and the usual offerings of the arghya. He then said, “What can I do for you all? Everything I possess is at your disposal.”

Just at that time, King Ikshvaku, who had set out on a yatra to the holy tirthas and shrines, came to the place where the Devas were. The Rajarishi Ikshvaku bowed his head and paid homage to them; he enquired after the welfare of each one. The Brahmana gave the king a seat, as also padya to wash his feet, and arghya. He made the customary enquiries of courtesy, and said, “Welcome, O great sovereign. How may I serve you? For your wishes are my command.”

The king replied, “I am a king. You are a Brahmana under the vows of the six renowned dharmas. It is not my place to ask you for anything, but on the other hand, only proper I should be the one to give you whatever you may need. Tell me how I may be of service to you, be it in kind or in wealth."

The Brahmana said, "There are two kinds of Brahmanas, O Rajan. Dharma is also of two kinds; he who is addicted to work, and the one that stays away from work do both live by their own dharmas. As regards myself, I do not accept gifts. Give gifts to them, O monarch, that are drawn to the way of karma and its fruits. I will not take anything from you. On the other hand, I ask you: what, indeed, shall I give you? Tell me, O outstanding king, and I will accomplish it with the help of my tapasya."

The king said, "I am a Kshatriya, a warrior. I do not know how to say the word 'give'. The only thing, O best among the reborn, that we can say by way of asking is: Give us battle!"

The Brahmana said, "You are content with the observance of the duties of your order, your svadharma. Similarly, I am content with the duties of mine, O regent. There is little difference between us. Do as you please!"

The king said, "Earlier you declared: 'I will give you all that is within my power.' I, therefore, ask you, O bestower of new life—give me the fruits of the japa that you have performed."

The Brahmana said, "You boast that your asking is always only for battle. Why then do you not seek battle with me?"

Ikshvaku said, "It is said that Brahmanas are armed with the thunder of speech, and Kshatriyas have the might of arms. Hence, learned Brahmana, we are now engaged in this battle of words."

The Brahmana said, "Let me once again impress upon you that all that is within my power along with all of my wealth is for your asking. Come, rid yourself of this hesitation."

The king said, "And I, too, repeat on my part: if, indeed, you wish to give me anything, then give me the fruits of your japa of the past thousand years."

The Brahmana said, "Take the highest fruit of my japa. Feel free to take half of the fruit. Indeed, why just half, O king? If you wish, do not hesitate to take all the fruits of my japa."

The king said, "I am grateful for your generosity and may a shower of blessings be upon you, but I have no need for the fruits of your japa, even though I asked for them. But before I leave, tell me more about these fruits."

The Brahmana said, “I am not aware of what fruits I may have won through my japa. With Dharma, Kaala, Yama and Mrityu as my witnesses, all I know is that I have now given those fruits to you.”

The king said, “What could I do with fruits that you have no knowledge of? If you do not tell me what the fruits are, let them be yours, for I have no wish for them. Undoubtedly, I would rather not accept such rewards, than possess them and remain ignorant of their worth.”

The Brahmana said, “Enough! Speak no more. I have given you the fruits of my japa. Let us now honour our words, O Rajarishi. As for my japa, I never undertook it in order to fulfil any specific desires. How then, O tiger among kings, should I have any knowledge of what the fruits are of the japa? You said, ‘Give!’ And I said, ‘I give!’ I will not betray my word. Keep the truth. Be calm. If you refuse to keep your word, O king, great sin will fall on you. Speaking falsely, O Parantapa, is not becoming of you.

Similarly, I dare not render false what I have said. I readily said, ‘I give!’ So, if you are firm in truth then accept my gift. After all, Maharajan, you did come here and ask me for the fruits of my japa. So take what I have offered, if you are honest. He who is addicted to deceit has no place in this world nor the next. Such a one fails to redeem his ancestors. How can he even succeed in doing any good to his unborn progeny?

The rewards of sacrifices and gifts, as also of fasts and religious observances, are not so effective in saving a man from evil and hell as the truth is, O bull among men, in both this and the next world. All the penances that you have undergone and all those that you will undergo in the future for hundreds and thousands of years do not possess an efficacy greater than that of truth.

Truth is the one undecaying Brahman. Truth is the one unfailing tapasya. Truth is the one undiminishing yagna. Truth is the one undeteriorating Veda. Truth is awake in the Vedas. The fruits attached to truth are said to be the highest. From Satya arise dharma and niyama. Everything rests on truth. Satya is the Vedas and their Angas. Truth is knowledge. Truth is the law. Truth is the observance of vows and fasts. Satya is the primeval AUM. Truth is the origin of creatures. Truth is their progeny. It is by truth that the wind moves. It is by truth that the sun gives heat. It is by truth that fire burns. It is on truth that heaven rests. Satya is parityaga, tapasya, the chanting of Samans. Satya is the Vedas and Saraswati.

It is said that once truth and all religious observances were placed on a pair of scales. When both were weighed, truth was seen to be heavier.

Satya and dharma stand side by side. Everything is enhanced through truth. Why, O king, would you wish to do something that is stained with untruth? Be rooted in satya. Do not act falsely, O monarch. Why would you go back on your word of 'Give me'?

If you refuse, O Rajan, to accept the fruits of my japa, you will wander in the world, fallen from dharma. He who does not give what he promised, as also the one who does not accept what he sought, are both guilty of deceit. Therefore, it is vital for you not to break your word."

The king said, "To fight and protect are the duties of Kshatriyas. It is said that Kshatriyas are givers of gifts. How then can I take anything from you as a gift?"

The Brahmana said, "I never insisted that you, O king, accept anything from me in the first place. I did not come to your house. In fact, you came to me asking for the fruits of my japa. Why do you not take them now?"

Lord Dharma said, "Be aware, both of you, that I am Dharma. Let there be no dispute between you. Let the Brahmana receive the reward for his gift, and let the king, too, obtain the merit of satya."

Now Swarga said, "Know, O great king, that I am heaven manifest in person. Let this dispute between you cease. You are both equal in merit or rewards earned."

The king said, "I have no use for heaven. Return, O Swarga, to where you have come from. If this learned Brahmana desires a remedy through you, then let him take the rewards that I have won by my deeds in life."

The Brahmana said, "In my youth, through ignorance, I did stretch out my hand for alms. Now, however, I recite the Gayatri, while observing vairagya. Why do you, O king, tempt me like this, I who have for a long time been in tapasya? I will myself do what my dharma is. I do not wish to have any share of the rewards won by you, O Kshatriya. I am devoted to tapasya and the study of the Vedas, and I have abstained from acceptance."

The king said, "If, O Brahmana, you really want to give me the rewards of your japa, then let half those rewards be mine. And you must take half the reward that I have won by my deeds. Brahmanas are engaged in the dharma of acceptance. Men born into the Kshatriya varna engage in the duty of giving. If you are not aware of the dharma laid down for both the varnas, let our fruits be equal. Or, if you do not wish to be my equal in our rewards, take all the rewards that I may have won. Ah, take the punya I have won, if you wish to show me charity."

At this juncture, two ungraceful individuals came there. Each had his arm upon the other's shoulder; both were badly dressed. They said these words, "You owe me nothing. In fact, I really owe you. If we quarrel in this way, here is the king who rules over men. I say truly, you owe me nothing!"

"You speak falsely. I do owe you a debt!"

Both of them, waxing hot in debate, then addressed the king, saying, "See, O monarch, that neither of us may become stained with sin."

The one called Virupa said, "I owe my companion Vikrita, O king, the merits of the gift of a cow. I am willing to repay the debt. This Vikrita, however, refuses to take repayment."

Vikrita said, "This Virupa, O king, owes me nothing. He tells lies dressed in the garb of truth."

The king said, "Tell me, O Virupa, what is it that you owe your friend here? I am determined to hear you and then do what is proper."

Virupa said, "Listen carefully about the circumstances in detail, of how I owe my companion Vikrita, O ruler of men. Vikrita, in the past, for the sake of winning punya, O Anagha, gave away an auspicious cow to a Brahmana devoted to tapasya as also the study of the Vedas. Going to him, O king, I begged of him the reward of his devotions. With a pure heart, Vikrita made a gift to me of the reward.

Later on, to purify myself, I did some good deeds. I also bought two Kapila cows with calves, both of which yielded goodly quantities of milk. Next, according to the due rites and with proper devotion, I made a gift of the two cows to a poor Brahmana living by the unchha vrata. Since I accepted the gift from my companion, I now wish to give him twice the reward he gave me. O tiger among men, who between the two of us is innocent and who guilty in your eyes? Who performs due rites and with proper devotion? At odds about this, we have come to you, O great king. Whether you judge right or wrong, establish peace between both of us. If my companion does not wish to accept in return from me a gift equal to what he gave me, then you will have to judge patiently and set us both on the right path."

The king said, "Why do you not accept the payment that is owed to you? Do not delay, but accept what you know is your due."

Vikrita said, “This one says that he owes me. I say to him that what I gave him I gave away. He does not, therefore, owe me anything. Let him go wherever he wishes.”

The king said, “He is ready to give you; you, however, are unwilling to accept it. This does not seem proper to me. I think that you deserve punishment for this. There is little doubt in this.”

Vikrita said, “I made a gift to him, O Rajarishi! How can I take it back? If I am guilty in this, you pronounce the punishment, O puissant one.”

Virupa said, “If you refuse to accept when I am ready to give, this king will certainly punish you, for he is an upholder of nyaya.”

Vikrita said, “Upon his request I gave him what was mine. How will I now take that back? You may go away; please leave.”

The Brahmana said, “You have heard, O king, the words of these two. Do you accept without doubt what I have pledged to give you?”

The king said, “This matter is, indeed, as deep in importance as an abyss. How will this debate end? If I do not accept what has been given by this Brahmana, how do I avoid being stained with a great sin?”

The Rajarishi then said to the two supplicants, “Go away both of you; you have won your respective objects. I should see that the Rajadharma vested in me does not become futile. It is settled that kings should observe the dharma laid down for them. To my misfortune, however, the course of dharma prescribed for Brahmanas has possessed my wretched self.”

The Brahmana said, “Accept, O king! I owe you. You did ask, and I pledged to give you. If, however, you refuse to accept, I will undoubtedly curse you.”

The king said, “Fie on Rajadharma, for such a thankless resolution. I will, however, take what you give, only in order to render the two courses of dharmas as exact equals. Here is my hand, which was never before stretched out for the acceptance of gifts; it is now stretched out to receive as also to give. Give me what you owe me.”

The Brahmana said, “If I have won any fruits by chanting the Gayatri, accept them all.”

The king said, “These drops of water, behold, O best of Brahmanas, have fallen upon my hand. I also desire to give to you. Accept my gift. Let there be equality between us.”

Virupa said, "Know, O king, that we two are Kama and Krodha. Because of us, you have been provoked to act in this way. You have made a gift in return to the Brahmana. Let there be equality between you and this Dvija in respect of regions of grace in the next world. Vikrita really does not owe me anything. We appealed to you for your own sake. Kaala, Dharma, Mrityu and we two have examined everything about you in your very presence by creating this friction between you and the Brahmana. Go now, as you please, to the worlds of bliss which you have won through your deeds."' Bhishma continues, 'I have now told you how japis obtain the fruits of their chanting and what, indeed, is their end—what is the place, and what are the worlds that a japi may attain. A japi of the Gayatri mantra goes to Brahma, to Agni, or enters Suryaloka. If he dallies there in his new energetic form, then stupefied by such attachment, he acquires the attributes of those particular realms. The same becomes the case with him if he goes to Soma, Vayu, Bhumi or Akasa. The fact is, he dwells in all these, with attachment, and displays the traits peculiar to those worlds.

If, however, he goes to these regions without any attachment, and is wary of the felicity he enjoys and wishes for that which is Supreme and Immutable, he then enters even that. As such, he attains the ambrosia of ambrosias, to a state free from desire and devoid of a separate consciousness. He becomes Brahman's very self, freed from the influence of opposites, happy, peaceful and without pain. Indeed, he attains that condition which is free from suffering, which is serenity's self, which is Brahman, the One from where there is no return.

He is freed from the four causes of apprehension, the six conditions, and the other sixteen attributes. Transcending the creator Brahma, he attains absorption into the One Supreme Soul. Or, if under the influence of attachments, he does not wish for such absorption, but desires to have a separate existence dependent on the supreme cause of everything, he then obtains everything for which he cherishes a wish. Alternatively, if he looks with distaste upon all realms of felicity, which have been previously called hells, then, bereft of desire and free from everything, he enjoys supreme grace and bliss even in those very worlds.

Thus, O monarch, I have told you about the goal attained by japis. I have told you everything. What else do you wish to hear?'

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, O Bhishma, what reply was given by either the Brahmana or the king to Virupa after the conclusion of what he said. How did it end between those described by you? What was the dialogue between them, and what did they do there?'

Bhishma says, 'The Brahmana affirmed, "Let it be as you have said," and began his worship of Dharma, Yama, Kaala, Mrityu and Swarga, all of whom were worthy of adoration. He also worshipped all the eminent Brahmanas that had come there by bowing his head to them. Addressing the king next, he said, "Bestowed with the reward of my japa, O Rajarishi, attain a position of eminence. With your leave, I will set myself to my japa again. O mighty one, the Devi Savitri gave me a boon, saying, 'Let your devotion to japa be eternal.'

The king said, "If your success in japa has become fruitless because you have given away those fruits to me, and if your heart is set upon sadhana again, then, O learned Brahmana, let half your japa accrue to me and half remain with you, and let the reward of your japa be yours."

The Brahmana said, "You have made great efforts before all these persons to make me a partner in the rewards in store for you as the result of your own deeds. Let us then become equal in our rewards in the next life, and let us go to receive the end which is ours."

Knowing the determination with which they came there, Indra, the king of the Devas, appeared there, accompanied by the other Devas, Lokapalas, and other regents of the world. The Sadhyas, Viswas, Mantras, diverse kinds of loud and sweet music, rivers, mountains, seas, sacred waters, penances, ordinances of yoga, Vedas, the sounds that accompany the singing of the Samans, Saraswati, Narada, Parvata, Viswavasu, the Hahas, the Huhus, the Gandharva Chitrasena with all the members of his family, the Nagas, Sadhyas, Munis, Prajapati, Devadeva, and the inconceivable thousand-headed Vishnu himself, arrived there. Drums and trumpets were beaten and blown in the heavens. Celestial flowers were showered down upon the high-Souled beings. Bands of apsaras danced all around. Swarga, in his embodied form, came there.

Addressing the Brahmana, he said, “You have achieved success. You are blessed.” Next he addressed the king, and said, “You also, O emperor, have achieved success.”

Later, with good done to each other, the Brahmana and the king withdrew their senses from the objects of the world. With the vital breaths prana, apana, samana, udana and vyana fixed in their hearts, they concentrated their minds in prana and apana united as one. They set the two united breaths in the abdomen, and directed their gazes to the tip of the nose and then immediately below the eyebrows. They next held the two breaths, with the help of the mind, in the point between the two eyebrows, bringing them there very gradually. With bodies perfectly still, they remained absorbed with fixed gaze. In control of their Souls, they raised it within the brain. Then piercing the crown of the divine Brahmana, a fiery flame of great splendour ascended into the sky. Loud exclamations of awe, uttered by all creatures, rent the air on all sides.

Its praises sung by all, that flame then entered Brahma’s Self. The Pitamaha stepped forward, and addressed the radiance that had assumed a form of tremendous height, with the words, “Welcome!” Furthermore, he said, “Verily, japis attain the same goal as do the yogins. The achievement by the yogin of his goal is an object directly visible to everyone here. As for japis, there is this distinction that they have the honour of Brahma coming forward to receive them after their departure from earth. Come merge yourself in me.”

Thus spoke Brahma and once more imparted consciousness into that towering lustre. The Brahmana, freed from all anxieties, entered the mouth of the creator. King Ikshvaku similarly entered the divine Pitamaha like the best of Brahmanas. The gathered Devas saluted the Self-born and said, “A very superior goal is indeed ordained for japis. What we have seen you do is for japis. As for ourselves, we came here to witness it. You have made these two equal, given them equal honour, and bestowed upon them an equal goal. We have seen today the high goal reserved for both yogins and japis. Transcending all the worlds of bliss, these two can go wherever they wish."

Brahma said, "Even he who reads the great smriti like the Veda, as also he who reads the other auspicious smritis, Manu's and the rest, would, in this way, attain the same world with me. Also, the one who is devoted to yoga, will, undoubtedly acquire in this manner, after death, the lokas that are mine. I take my leave. All of you return to your homes in order to achieve your goals."'

Bhishma continues, 'With these words, Brahma disappeared. The assembled Devas returned to their respective abodes. All the Divine Beings honoured Dharma, and went happily, walking behind the great Deva.

These are the rewards of japis and this their attainment. I have described them to you as I myself heard them. What else, O king, do you wish to hear?'

Yudhishtira says, 'What are the fruits of the yoga represented by knowledge of all the Vedas, and of the various observances and vows? How also may the Soul be known? Tell us this, O Bhishma.'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to the ancient narrative of the discourse between the lord of creatures, Manu, and Maharishi Brihaspati.

In days of old, the best of celestial Rishis, Brihaspati, who was a disciple of Manu, bowed to his preceptor and said, "What is the cause of the universe? From where have the laws about yagnas and other pious observances come? What are the fruits that the learned say are attached to knowledge? Tell me also truly, O illustrious one, what is that which the very Vedas have not been able to reveal? What are the fruits adored by eminent men well versed with the science of artha, the Vedas and mantras, through yagnas and plentiful gifts of kine? From where do those fruits arise? Where are they to be found?

Tell me also the itihasa of from where the earth, all earthly objects, wind, sky, aquatic creatures, water, heaven and the denizens of heaven, have come. Man tends to incline towards the object of which he seeks knowledge. I have no knowledge of the Ancient and Supreme One. How will I rescue myself from a false display of inclinations towards Him?

I have studied the Riks, all the Samanas, the Yajuses, Chhandas, Jyotisha-shastra, Nirukta, Vyakarana, Sankalpa and Siksha. However, I have no knowledge of the nature of the great creatures, the Panchamahabhutas, which enter into the composition of everything. Tell me about all this in simple terms. Tell me what the fruits are of knowledge and those of sacrifices and other religious rites. Explain to me also how an embodied being departs from his body and how he acquires another body."

Manu said, "That which is agreeable to one is said to constitute one's happiness. Similarly, that which is disagreeable is said to constitute one's sorrow. 'By this I will obtain happiness and keep sorrow away'—from this sentiment flow all religious actions. The efforts to acquire knowledge, however, arise from a desire to avoid both happiness and sorrow. The laws about sacrifices and other observances, which occur in the Vedas, are all connected with desire. He, however, who liberates himself from desire, succeeds in attaining Brahman. One, who, out of a desire of winning happiness, seeks it in myriad ways and with diverse actions, falls into hell."

Brihaspati said, "Man's aspirations are concerned with the means to acquire happiness, and to avoid pain and sorrow. Such acquisition and avoidance again are accomplished through karma."

Manu said, "It is by liberating oneself from karma that one succeeds in attaining Brahman. The laws of karma are meant for that very end. These laws bind only those who are not free from desire. By liberating oneself from karma, one acquires the highest state. The desire for mukti leads one to religious rites and actions aimed at freedom from attachments and the purification of the Soul. By freeing oneself from karma, one achieves the highest goal, Brahman, which is far beyond the reward that karma bestows.

Creatures have all been created by manas and karma. These again are the two best paths adored by all. Outward actions yield fruits that are temporary as also eternal. To acquire the everlasting there is no other means than the relinquishment of fruits, by the mind. Just as the eye distinguishes light from darkness, so does awareness recognise and evade evil. Men avoid snakes, sharp kusa blades and dangerous pits, which cross their path. If some tread upon or fall into them, they do so through ignorance. Such is the superiority of knowledge over ignorance.

Mantras chanted duly, yagnas, dakshina, bhiksha and dhyana are the five karmas that are solely said to yield fruits. Karmas have the three attributes of sattva, rajas and tamas for their Soul. The Vedas say this. The Vedas consist of mantras. The mantras, therefore, have the same three attributes, since it is with mantras that karma is to be accomplished. The ritual also must be liable to the same three gunas.

The fruits of action depend upon the mind. The embodied creature enjoys the fruits. All excellent kinds of sound, form, taste, touch and scent, are the fruits of actions, attained in swarga. However, man, right here, acquires the fruits of knowledge before death.

The fruits of all actions are achieved through the body, and enjoyed in a state of physical existence. The body is, indeed, the framework to which both happiness as well as suffering inhere. Rewards of actions accomplished by means of words, are enjoyed in a state of spoken words. Similarly, the fruits of deeds accomplished by the mind are enjoyed in a state within the realms of the mind. Devoted to the fruits of karma, whether sattvika, rajasika or tamasika, a person receives rewards, good or bad, and accordingly shares their nature. Like fish swimming against a current of water, the karma of a past life comes to the doer. The embodied creature experiences happiness for his good karma, and suffering for his evil doings.

He from whom this universe has sprung; He by knowing whom persons of cleansed Souls transcend this world; He who has not been expressed by Vedic mantras and words—Him I will now indicate. Listen to me as I speak of the highest of the high.

Himself free from the several kinds of taste, scent, sound, touch and form, He is incapable of being grasped by the senses. Unmanifest, without colour, the One, He has created the five kinds of objects for His creatures. He is neither female nor male, nor of the neuter sex. He is neither existent, nor non-existent, nor both existent and non-existent. Only those acquainted with Brahman behold Him. He knows no direction.”

Manu said, “From the eternal and unfailing one, first sprang space; from space came wind; from wind came light; from light came water; from water came the universe; and from the universe, all things that occur in it. The bodies of all earthly beings, after their demise, first enter into water, then into light or fire, then into the wind, and then into space.

Those who seek mukti need not return from ethereal space. They attain Brahman. Brahman is neither hot nor cold, neither mild nor harsh, neither sour nor astringent, neither sweet nor bitter. He is not attributed with sound, scent or form. He transcends all these and everything, and is without dimensions.

The skin perceives touch; the tongue, taste; the nose, scent; the ears, sounds; and the eyes, forms. Men unfamiliar with Adhyatma do not succeed in seeing what is above these. With the tongue withdrawn from tastes, the nose from scents, the ears from touch and the eyes from forms, one succeeds in beholding one’s own self as independent of the senses and the mind and, therefore, of the three gunas.

It is said, that which is the cause of the doer, the deed, that which is used for the deed, the place and the time of the deed, and the tendencies towards happiness and sorrow, is called the self or the Soul. That which pervades everything, which does everything in the form of living creatures, that which exists in the universe as the mantras declare, that which is the cause of all, that which is the highest of the high, and that which is one without a second and does all things, is the cause. Everything else is effect.

It is seen that, in keeping with his actions, a man obtains results both good and evil, which though apparently incompatible with each other, still dwell together in harmony. Indeed, as the good and evil fruit born of their own actions abide in the bodies of creatures, so does knowledge reside in the body. As a burning lamp reveals objects before it, so do the five senses, like lamps set high on trees, discover their respective objects with the light of knowledge.

As the various ministers of a king gather to give him counsel, even so the five senses in the body willingly obey knowledge. Gyana is superior to all of them.

Like the flames of a fire, currents of the wind, rays of the sun and waters of the rivers, wax and wane repeatedly, even so the bodies of embodied creatures appear and disappear perennially.

As a man who cleaves a piece of wood with an axe does not find either smoke or fire in it, even so one cannot cut open the arms, feet and stomach of a person to behold the principle of knowledge, which, indeed, has nothing in common with the stomach and the limbs.

Just as one sees smoke and fire by rubbing together two pieces of wood, so does a person of well-directed intelligence, who unites the senses and the Soul through yoga, view the Supreme Soul, which, verily, exists in its own nature.

In a dream, one sees one's body lying on the ground as something apart from one's own self; likewise does a person, possessed of the five senses, the mind and the intellect, see his own body after death, and goes from one body into another.

The Soul is not subject to birth, growth, decay and death. By the laws of karma, the jiva, upon the demise of one body passes into another, unseen by others. None can see the form of the individual Soul, nor can it be felt by touch. With the senses, the Atman accomplishes no deeds. The senses do not approach the Soul. The Atman, however, controls them all. As anything placed in a blazing fire assumes a certain colour based on the light and heat that works upon it, without taking any other hue or attribute, even so the Soul's form is seen to take its appearance from the body it inhabits.

Likewise, man discards one body and enters another, unseen by all. Indeed, with his body cast to the Panchamahabhutas, he assumes a form that is made of the same five elements. Upon his demise, the embodied creature enters space, wind, fire, water and earth in such a way that each particular element in his body mingles in tune with its correlate outside his body.

The senses, too, already engaged in diverse occupations and dependent on the five elements for their functions, enter the Panchamahabhutas. The ear derives its capacity from space; and the sense of scent from the earth. Form, which is the property of the eye, is the result of light or fire. Fire or heat is said to be the dependent cause of water. The tongue with taste for its attribute merges into water. The skin, which has touch for its quality, becomes lost in the wind whose nature it shares. The fivefold attributes, sound and the rest, dwell in the Panchamahabhutas. The fivefold objects of the senses, space and the others, dwell in the five senses. All these in turn, the fivefold attributes, the fivefold elements and the five senses follow the lead of the mind. The mind follows the lead of the intellect, which is guided by that which exists in its true and undefiled nature—the Paramatman.

The karmi in his new body receives the fruits of all the good and bad deeds done by him as also of all actions done by him in his past lives. All deeds done in this life and ones to come follow the mind like aquatic creatures that ride a friendly current. As a moving, restless thing draws attention to itself, as a minute object appears enlarged when seen through a magnifying glass, as a mirror shows a person his own face, even so the Soul though subtle and invisible becomes an object of the intellect's apprehension."

Manu said, "Over time, manas united with the indriyas retains impressions received in the past. When the senses are all suspended from their functions, the Paramatman in the form of buddhi exists in its own true nature. When the jivatma completely disregards all the sense objects with regard to their simultaneity or contrarily gathers them from all directions and clings to them, he inevitably wanders around aimlessly. He is, therefore, the silent witness. Hence the embodied Soul has a distinct and independent existence.

Along with rajas, tamas and sattva there are also three states of awareness—jagrata awastha, swapna awastha and sushrupta awastha. The Soul has knowledge of the pleasures and pains, which are all opposites of these states, and share the nature of the traigunas. The Atman enters the senses like the wind that blows into a piece of burning wood. One cannot see the form of the Soul, nor can it be known by the sense of touch, or by the ear. It may, however, be seen with the help of the srutis and the instructions of the sages.

As regards the senses, the particular sense that grasps it, in turn, loses its existence as a sense. The senses cannot themselves apprehend their own forms by themselves. The Soul is omniscient inasmuch as it knows both the knower and the known. It witnesses all things. The omniscient Atman knows the senses without, but the senses are unable to know it. Nobody has seen the other side of the Himavat mountains, or of the moon. Yet it cannot be said that these do not exist. Similarly, though never known by the senses, it cannot be said that the subtle Soul that dwells in all creatures, does not exist. We see the earth reflected on the moon's surface in the form of shadows, when the moon waxes and wanes. Yet they do not know that it is the earth that is so reflected there. Likewise is the knowledge of the Atman. That knowledge must come of itself.

The Soul depends upon itself. Sages and seers, who reflect on the formlessness of visible objects before birth and after death, behold with the help of intelligence, the formlessness of objects that have apparent forms. Likewise, although the sun's movement cannot be seen, yet, by watching it rise and set, men conclude that the sun has motion. Similarly, though the Atman is at a great distance from them, the wise behold the Soul with the help of the lamp of intelligence, and seek to merge the Panchamahabhutas in Brahman.

Verily, an end cannot be accomplished without the application of means. Fishermen cast nets to catch fish. Animals are captured with the help of other animals. Birds of prey are engaged to snare other birds. Elephants are taken by those who use elephants. In this way, the Soul may be apprehended by knowledge. We have heard that only a snake can see a snake's legs. Similarly, through knowledge one sees the subtle Soul abide within the gross body. Men cannot, through their senses, know the senses. Likewise, mere intellect at its highest cannot behold the Soul that is Supreme.

On the fifteenth day of the dark fortnight, when the moon becomes invisible, still, it cannot be averred that the moon is destroyed. Similar is the case with the Soul within the body—when liberated from the body, the Atman cannot be seen or known. As the moon shines anew when it ascends to another position in the sky—so does the Soul manifest itself once more when it acquires a new body. The eye can directly view all the birth, growth and disappearance of the moon. These phenomena, however, relate to the gross form of that luminary. The like are not the qualities of the Soul. The lunar disc, which reappears after the dark fortnight, is regarded as the same moon that had become invisible. Likewise, irrespective of the changes represented by birth, growth and age, a person is regarded as the same individual without any doubt of his identity.

It cannot be distinctly seen how Rahu approaches and leaves the moon. Similarly, it cannot be discerned how the Soul leaves one body and enters another. Rahu is visible only when it exists with the sun or the moon. Likewise, the Atman becomes an object of perception only when it exists with the body. Separated from the sun or the moon, Rahu can no longer be seen. Similarly, liberated from the body, the Soul can no longer be seen. Although the moon disappears during the dark fortnight, it is not deserted by the constellations and the stars; the Atman also, though separated from the body, is not deserted by the fruits of its actions in that body."

Manu said, "As in a dream where this gross body lies inactive and the subtle life-giving spirit detaches itself from the body, and enters into the state of deep slumber of death, the sukshma sarira with all the senses becomes inactive and the detached intellect remains awake. The same is the case with existence and non-existence.

As when water is clear, images reflected in it can be seen by the eye, likewise, if the senses be still and calm, the Soul can be seen by the intellect. If, however, the water is stirred, the person standing by it can no longer see the images. Similarly, if the senses are disturbed, the Soul can no longer be seen by the intellect. Ignorance creates delusion. Delusion affects the mind. When the mind becomes deluded, the five senses housed within it are compromised as well.

Surcharged with avidya, sunk in the swamp of worldly objects, one cannot enjoy the sweetness of contentment or peace. In such a state, undetached from its good and evil actions, the jiva returns repeatedly to the objects of the world. Because of sin, its thirst is never quenched. This thirst is satisfied only when its sin is destroyed. Because of the attachment to worldly things, which has a tendency to proliferate, one wishes for things other than the necessary, and hence fails to attain the Supreme Brahman.

From the destruction of all sinful deeds, knowledge arises in men. Upon the appearance of gyana, one's Soul can be witnessed in the intellect, like a reflection in a polished mirror. Misery is the outcome of unrestrained senses, whereas restrained senses lead to happiness. Therefore, one should restrain one's mind with effort from objects sought by the senses.

From the unmanifest has sprung the Soul; from the Soul has sprung the intellect; from the intellect has sprung the mind. When the mind becomes associated with the senses, it recognises sound and other objects of the senses. He who renounces such objects, and liberates himself from all things that arise from primordial matter, eventually enjoys immortality.

As when the sun rises, he spreads his rays and draws them into himself when he sets, so too, when the Atman enters the body, it obtains the fivefold sense-objects by energising them with the senses. When, however, he leaves the body, he is said to set by withdrawing the senses into himself. Repeatedly led along the path that is created by karma, he finds the fruits of his deeds in keeping with their nature. Desire itself for the objects of the senses is kept at bay from a person who does not seek them. The very principle of desire leaves him who has seen his Atman.

When the intellect, unencumbered from all attachments is fixed in the mind, it succeeds in attaining Brahman; for it is there that the mind with the intellect withdrawn can be extinguished. Brahman is not an object of touch, hearing, taste, sight, smell or any deductive inference from the known. Only the intellect in its purity can attain it. All objects that the mind apprehends through the senses can be withdrawn into the mind; the mind into the intellect; the intellect into the Soul, and the Atman into the Supreme Brahman. The senses cannot contribute to the success of the mind. The mind cannot apprehend the intellect. The intellect cannot seize the manifested Soul. The subtle Soul, however, sees them all."

Manu said, "Upon the appearance of physical and mental sorrow, one is not able to practice yoga. As a remedy, it is advisable not to brood over such sorrow, for it becomes aggressive and increases in violence. One should relieve mental sorrow with wisdom, while physical sorrow should be cured with medicaments. Wisdom teaches this. In sadness, one should not behave like a child.

The wise should never cherish a desire for youth, beauty, longevity, health, accumulation of wealth and the companionship of those that are dear: all of which are transitory. One should not grieve alone for a sorrow that affects a whole community. Without grieving, one should, if one sees an opportunity, seek to apply a remedy. Undoubtedly, in life the measure of sorrow is much greater than that of happiness. To one who is content in life, death that is disagreeable comes due to his bewilderment. He who avoids both sorrow and happiness succeeds in attaining Brahman. The wise need never grieve. Worldly possessions bring about sorrow. There is no happiness in protecting them. They are, again, earned with toil and heartbreak. One should, therefore, ignore their loss.

Pure knowledge or Brahman is regarded by ignorance as existing in the diverse forms that are objects of knowledge. Know that the mind is only an attribute of knowledge. When the mind becomes united with the faculties of knowledge, then the intellect sets in. When intellect is unencumbered by actions and, withdrawn from outward objects, is focused on the mind through dhyana or yoga, it attains Brahman, or samadhi. The intellect that flows from ignorance possessed of the senses and attributes runs towards external objects, like a river from a mountaintop flowing towards other lands.

When the intellect, withdrawn into the mind, succeeds in absorbing itself into contemplation that is free from attributes, it attains knowledge of Brahman like the touch of gold on a touchstone. The mind is the apprehender of the objects of the senses. It must first be extinguished before Brahman can be attained. Dependent upon the attributes of objects that are before it, the mind can never show that which is without attributes. With all the doors availed by the senses shut, the intellect should be drawn into the mind. In this state, when absorbed in meditation, it attains the knowledge of Brahman.

As the Panchamahabhutas become withdrawn into their subtle form called tanmatras on the destruction of the gunas they are known by, similarly buddhi may dwell in manas alone, with all senses withdrawn from their objects. Even when the intellect, though possessed of the quality of certainty, deliberates inwardly, it is nothing but the mind without anything superior to it. When consciousness, which attains excellence through contemplation, successfully identifies attributes with what are considered as their possessors, then can it cast off all aspects and attain the Brahman that is nirguna, without attributes.

There is no suitable indication to provide knowledge of the Avyakta Brahman, the unmanifest. What cannot be described, cannot be acquired by anyone. With a purified Soul, through penances, inferences, self-restraint, practices and observances prescribed for one’s varna, and through the Vedas, should one seek to approach the Supreme Brahman. Persons of clear vision besides seeing the Supreme within themselves, seek Him in even external forms by freeing themselves from the gunas.

From the absence of all attributes or because of its own nature, the Supreme, known as the Gneya, that which should be known, can never be apprehended by debate. When the intellect is rid of qualities, only then can it attain Brahman. Attached to attributes, it regresses from the Supreme. Indeed, such is the nature of the intellect that it rushes towards the gunas and moves among them like fire among fuel. In the state called sushupti, the five senses exist freed from their respective functions, just as the Supreme Brahman exists high above prakriti, freed from all its attributes. Embodied creatures thus perform karma because of the gunas. When they abstain from doing so, they attain moksha. Yet others, through karma, go to swargaloka.

The living creature, primordial nature, intellect, objects of the senses, the senses, consciousness, conviction of personal identity, are all called creatures for they are subject to death. The original creation of all these flowed from the Supreme Brahman. Their second or succeeding creation is due to the action of pairs of opposite sexes and is confined to all things save the primal five, and is restrained by laws because of which the same species replicate themselves. With dharma living creatures find a high end, and from adharma, they earn a lowly and vile end. He who is not free from attachments encounters rebirth; while he who is liberated, attains knowledge or Brahman."

Manu said, "When the fivefold attributes are united with the five senses and the mind, then Brahman is seen by the individual like a thread passing through a gem. Just as a thread may lie within gold, pearl, coral or any earthly thing, even so one's Soul, through one's own deeds, may live within a cow, a horse, a man, an elephant, a worm, an insect or any other creature. The good deeds an individual performs in a particular body bring rewards that he enjoys in that particular body. Soil, drenched with a specific liquid, supplies each different herb or plant that grows on it, with the specific nourishment needed for its growth. The intellect, whose course is witnessed by the Soul, is obliged to follow the path defined by the deeds of previous lives.

From knowledge springs desire. From desire springs resolution. From resolution flows action. From action proceed fruits, good and bad. Fruits, therefore, depend on karma as their cause. Actions have the intellect for their cause. The intellect has knowledge for its cause; and gyana has the Atman for its cause. The excellent result of the destruction of knowledge, fruits, intellect and actions, is called Brahmagyana. Magnificent and exalted is the self-existent essence, which yogis behold. Those devoid of wisdom, whose intellect is devoted to worldly possessions, never perceive that which exists in the Soul itself.

Water is superior to earth in extension; light is superior to water; wind is superior to light; space is superior to wind; the mind is superior to space;

the intellect is superior to the mind; time is superior to the intellect. The divine Vishnu, lord of this universe, is superior to Kaala. He is without beginning, middle and end. He is unchangeable. He transcends all sorrow. Vishnu has been called the Supreme Brahman. He is the refuge of the highest order. Rishis liberated from the power of Kaala, know Him and attain moksha. All that we perceive are displayed in the gunas. Nirguna, bereft of attributes, Brahman is superior to these.

Selfless action is the highest dharma, which is sure to lead to mukti. The Riks, Yajuses and Samans have the body for their refuge. They flow from the tip of the tongue. They cannot be acquired without effort and are subject to destruction. The knowledge of Brahman, however, cannot be acquired in this way, for without depending upon the body it depends upon the Knower, the Atman, which has the body for its refuge. Without beginning, middle or end, Brahman, unlike the Vedas, cannot be acquired through effort. The Riks, Yajuses and Samans, each have a beginning. Those that have a beginning have also an end. But Brahman is said to be without beginning. And because Brahman has neither beginning nor end, it is said to be infinite and unchangeable. Thus, Brahman transcends sorrow as also dvesha-advesha, and all the pairs of opposites.

Through unfavourable destiny, an inability to discover the proper means, and due to impediments of karma, mortals are unable to find the path by which Brahman may be reached. Because of attachment to worldly possessions, a vision of the joys of the highest heaven, and a desire for something other than Brahman, men fail to reach the Parabrahman. Others beholding worldly objects desire their possession and, as such, do not long for Brahman. How will one, attached to inferior qualities, gain knowledge of Him who is possessed of attributes that are superior? It is by inference that one can arrive at a knowledge of Him who transcends all this in aspects and form. By subtle intelligence alone can we know Him. We cannot describe Him in words. The mind is seized by the mind, the eye by the eye. By knowledge, the intellect is purified. Intellect may be employed to purify the mind. By the mind should the senses be controlled. When one achieves all this, one may attain the unchangeable Brahman. One who, through dhyana, becomes free from attachments, and is enriched by the possession of a discerning mind, successfully reaches Brahman, which is without desire and above all the gunas.

As the wind keeps away from the fire embedded within a piece of wood, even so persons agitated by desire for worldly possessions keep away from the Supreme. Upon renunciation of all earthly objects, the mind attains that which is higher than the intellect; while upon their separation, the mind acquires that which is below the intellect. He who engages in the destruction of earthly desires attains absorption into the body of Brahman.

Though the Soul is unmanifest, yet when adorned with gunas, its actions become manifest. Upon the dissolution of the body, it once more manifests in the form of a fresh body. The Soul is inactive. It exists, united with the senses that create either happiness or sorrow. Unified with all the senses and endowed with a body, it takes refuge in the Panchamahabhutas. Through want of power, however, it fails to function when deprived of force by the Supreme and changeless Brahman.

No one sees the end of the earth but knows that the end is imminent. Man, agitated by attachments, is surely led to his last refuge; as a ship tossed about at sea is finally blown by the wind to a safe harbour. The sun, with rays spread at dawn, attains a quality: Illuminator of the world. At dusk, however, with rays withdrawn, the sun once again becomes an object divested of attributes. Similarly, with all distinctions and attachments withdrawn, one who practices tapasya ultimately enters the indestructible Brahman, which is without gunas.

When one discerns him who is without birth, who is the highest refuge of dharma, who is self-born, from whom everything originates and to whom all things return, who is unchangeable, who is without beginning, middle and end, and who is certainty's self, the Supreme Brahman, then one attains moksha."

Yudhishtira says, ‘Pitamaha, I wish to hear of the lotus-eyed indestructible one, who is the creator of everything, yet created by none. Who is called Vishnu, O lord of the Bharatas, since he pervades everything. Wisest, tell me in detail about him who is the origin of all creatures and unto whom all beings return, who cannot be vanquished by anyone, and is known as Narayana, Hrishikesa, Govinda and Kesava.’

Bhishma says, ‘I have heard of this from Jamadagni’s son Rama, from the Devarishi Narada, and from Krishna-Dwaipayana. Asita-Devala, O putra, Valmiki of austere tapasya, and Markandeya speak of Govinda as the most wonderful and Supreme Being. Kesava, O king of Bharata’s vamsa, is the divine and puissant lord of all. He is called Purusha, and pervades everything in multiple forms.

Listen now, Yudhishtira, to the attributes, which great Brahmanas say, are to be found in the exalted wielder of the saranga. Prince of men, I will also recount the deeds ascribed to Govinda, by men conversant with old itihasas. He is said to be the Soul of all creatures, the high-Souled one, and the best of all beings. He created by his will the five-fold elements, wind, light, water, space and earth.

The mighty lord of all things, the Divine One, the Supreme Being, created the earth, and lay down on the surface of the waters. While he floated upon the waters, the Supreme Being, refuge of every kind of energy and splendour, created Chitta, the first-born of beings in the universe. We have heard that he created consciousness along with the mind. Consciousness, which is the refuge of all creation, upholds all creatures along with the past and the future. After the emergence of consciousness, an exceedingly beautiful lotus, with effulgence like the sun's, grew out of the navel of the Supreme Being floating on the waters. The illustrious and divine Brahma, the ancestor of all creatures, materialised within the lotus, illuminating all the cardinal points of the horizon with his lustre.

O Mahabaho, after the high-Souled Pitamaha materialized from the primeval lotus, a great Asura named Madhu appeared from the tamoguna, the attribute of darkness. In order to help Brahma, the lord of all beings, the Supreme Divinity, slew the fierce Asura who sought to kill Brahma. From this slaying of the Asura Madhu, O Putra, all the Devas, Danavas and Manavas came to call the king of all persons faithful to dharma, by the name Madhusudana.

Next, by his will, Brahma created seven sons with Daksha being the first. They were Marichi, Atri, Angiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu and Daksha. The eldest born, Marichi, by a command of his will, fathered a son named Kasyapa, master of all realisers of Brahman. From his toe, even before the birth of Marichi, Brahma created another son, Daksha, who, O king of Bharata's vamsa, was the ancestor of creatures.

Unto Daksha were first born thirteen daughters, the eldest of whom was called Diti. Marichi's renowned son, the noble Kasyapa, married these thirteen daughters. The blessed Daksha next fathered ten more daughters. The progenitor of creatures, Prajapati Daksha, bestowed these upon Dharma, who became father of the Vasus, Rudras, Viswedevas, Sadhyas and the Maruts. Daksha next fathered twenty-seven other younger daughters. The luminous Soma became the husband of them all.

The other wives of Kasyapa gave birth to Gandharvas, Kimpurushas, horses, birds, kine, fish, trees and plants. Danu gave birth to the Danavas with Viprachitti for their first. Diti gave birth to all the Asuras of immense strength. Aditi gave birth to the Adityas. Amongst them Vishnu took birth as a dwarf. Also called Govinda, he became the first of them all. Through his prowess, the Danavas were vanquished, and the prosperity of the Devas increased.

Madhusudana created the day and the night, the morning and the evening, and the seasons in their order. After reflection, he also created the clouds, and other immobile and moving beings. Possessed of boundless energy, he also created the Viswas and Bhumi with all that is upon her.

Later the divine and mighty Krishna, O Yudhishtira, created from his mouth a hundred outstanding Brahmanas. From his two arms, he created a hundred Kshatriyas, and from his thighs a hundred Vaisyas. Next, O bull of Bharata's race, Kesava created from his two feet a hundred Sudras.

Possessed of great ascetic merit, Madhusudana created the four varnas of men, and made Dhatri Brahma the lord and ruler of all creation. Of immeasurable radiance, Brahma also became an exponent of the knowledge of the Vedas. Additionally, Kesava made Virupaksha the ruler of the bhutas, pretas and of the goddesses called the Matrikas, the mothers. And he made Yama the ruler of the Pitris and of all sinful men. The Paramatman also made Kubera the lord of all treasures. He then created Varuna, the lord of waters and ruler of all aquatic creatures. The mighty Vishnu made Vasava king of all the Devas.

In those times, men lived as long as they chose to live, without any fear of Yama. Sexual congress, O lord of the Bharatas, was not necessary for perpetuating the species—offspring were begotten through will, from the mind. In the age that followed, Treta yuga, children were begotten by touch alone. Even in this age, humans were above the necessity of sexual congress. It was only in the next, Dwapara yuga, O king, that the practice of sexual congress came to prevail among men. In the Kali yuga, O regent, men have come to marry and live in couples.

I have now told you of the Supreme Lord of all creatures. He is also called the ruler of all and of everything. Listen to me now, O son of Kunti, as I speak to you about the sinful creatures of the earth.

Such men are born in the southern region and are called Andrakas, Guhas, Pulindas, Sabaras, Chuchukas and Madrakas. Those born in the northern realms are Yamas, Kambojas, Gandharas, Kiratas and Barbaras. All of them are sinful, and roam this earth, defined by practices similar to those of Chandalas, ravens and vultures. They did not exist on earth in the Krita yuga. They took root, O lord of Bharata's vamsa, and began to multiply from the Treta yuga onwards. Once the terrible yugasandhi conjoining the Treta and the Dwapara yugas dawned, the Kshatriyas confronted each other in battle.

Thus, O lord of Kuru's race, did the divine Krishna manifest this universe. The celestial observer of all the worlds, Rishi Narada, says that Krishna is the Supreme God. Mahabaho of Bharata's vamsa, even Narada admits the supremacy and eternity of Krishna. Thus, O monarch, is Kesava of unconquerable valour. The lotus-eyed one is not a mere man. He is inconceivable.'

CANTO 208

Yudhishtira asks, 'Who were the first Prajapatis, O Bharatarishabha? What exalted Rishis are there in existence and where does each of them dwell?'

Bhishma says, 'Hear me, and I will tell you who the Prajapatis were and where these Rishis are said to abide on earth.

At first, there was one eternal, divine, Svayambhuva Brahma. The self-born Brahma fathered seven illustrious sons. They were Marichi, Atri, Angiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu and the eminent Vasishta who was equal to Brahma himself. These seven sons have been mentioned in the Puranas as seven Brahmanas, the Saptarishis. I will enumerate all the Prajapatis who came after these.

In Atri's race was born the eternal and divine Barhi, the ancient, who had tapasya for his origin. From Barhi, were born the ten Prachetasas. The ten Prachetasas had one son between them, Prajapati Daksha, known in the world as both Daksha and Kasyapa. Marichi also had one son called Kasyapa, also known by two names. Some call him Arishtanemi, and some, Kasyapa. Atri had another son, the handsome and princely Soma of tremendous tejas. He performed tapasya for a thousand celestial yugas. The divine Aryaman, and his sons, O Raja, have been described as ordainers of divine laws, and creators of all creatures.

Sasabindu had ten thousand wives. On each of them their lord fathered a thousand sons, and so they were ten hundred thousand. These sons refused to regard anyone save themselves as Prajapatis. The ancient Brahmanas bestowed a title on the descendants of Sasabindu. In time, the extensive vamsa of Prajapati Sasabindu established the Vrishni vamsa. These that I have mentioned are noted as the illustrious Prajapatis.

I will now name the Devas that are the lords of the three worlds. Bhaga, Ansa, Aryaman, Mitra, Varna, Savitri, Dhatri, Vivaswat, Tvashtri, Pushan, Indra and Vishnu are the twelve Adityas, all born from Kasyapa. Nasatya and Dasra are the two Aswins. These two are the sons of the illustrious Martanda, the eighth in the lineage. These were called first the Devas and the two classes of Pitris.

Tvashtri had many sons. Amongst them were the handsome and famous Viswarupa, Ajaikapat, Ahi, Vardhana, Virupaksha and Raivata. Then there were Hara and Bahurupa, Tryambaka, Savitrya, Jayanta and Pinaki. The eight divine Vasus I have already named. These were seen as Devas at the time of Prajapati Manu. Amongst the Siddhas and Sadhyas, there were two classes based on conduct and youth. Of yore, Devas were considered to be of two classes, the Ribhus and the Maruts. Thus, I have specified the Viswas, the Devas and the Aswins. Amongst them, the Adityas are Kshatriyas, and the Maruts are Vaisyas. The two Aswins are said to be Sudras. The Devas born from Angirasa's line are Brahmanas. This is certain. So have I told you about the fourfold varnas among the Devas. One who rises before dawn and recites the names of these lords, is cleansed of all his sins whether committed intentionally, unwittingly, or born from his association with others.

Yavakrita, Raivya, Arvavasu, Paravasu, Aushija, Kashivat and Bala are the sons of Angiras. These, and Kanwa son of Rishi Medhatithi, Barhishada, and the renowned Saptarishis, all reside in the east. Unmucha, Vimucha, Svastyatreya, Pramucha, Idhmavaha, Dridhavrata and Mitravaruna's son Agastya, these twice-born Rishis all dwell in the south. Upangu, Karusha, Dhaumya, Parivyadha, the Maharishis Ekata, Dwita and Trita, Atri's son, the illustrious Saraswata, these divinities dwell in the west. Atreya, Vasishta, Maharishi Kasyapa, Gautama, Bharadwaja, Viswamitra, the son of Kusika, and Jamadagni, the son of Richika, these seven live in the north.

Thus have I told you about the Maharishis of fiery tejas who live in the different directions of the world. These blessed Souls are the witnesses of the universe, and creators of all the worlds. In this manner do they live in their respective quarters. By reciting their names, one is cleansed of all one's sins. One who visits these places becomes purified of all his sins and succeeds in returning home in safety.'

Yudhishtira says, 'O Bhishma of great wisdom and invincible valour in battle, I wish to hear in detail of Krishna who is immutable and omnipotent. Tell me truly everything about his tejas and the awesome feats he achieved in days of old. Why and to what end did the mighty one assume the form of an animal? I wish to know, O magnificent Kshatriya!'

Bhishma says, 'Once, while out hunting, I arrived at the hermitage of Markandeya. There I saw diverse classes of ascetics seated in their thousands. The Rishis honoured me by the offer of arghya, made from honey and curds. I accepted their worship, and reverentially saluted them in return. Maharishi Kasyapa narrated what I am about to recount there. Listen attentively to the excellent and charming tale.

In earlier days, innumerable invincible Danavas, filled with wrath and avarice, and hundreds of mighty Asuras drunk with might, became exceedingly jealous of the unrivalled prosperity of the Devas. Eventually, attacked and oppressed by the Danavas, the Devas and Devarishis, unable to find peace, fled in all directions. The denizens of heaven saw the earth sunk in sore distress. Overspread with mighty Danavas of terrible aspect, Bhumi seemed to be burdened with an insupportable weight. Cheerless and grief-stricken, she appeared to plunge down into the Patalas. Struck with fear, the Devas went to Brahma and said, "How will we continue to bear these depredations of the Danavas?"

The creator answered, “I have already ordained what is to be done in this matter. Endowed with boons, possessed of might and swollen with pride, these senseless wretches do not know that Vishnu of invisible form, the Devadeva who cannot be vanquished even by all the Devas together, has assumed the form of a boar. The Supreme Lord will plunge down to the place below the earth, where the wretches among Danavas dwell in their thousands, and he will kill them all.”

These words of Brahma brought immense joy to the magnificent Devas.

Very soon, the puissant Vishnu, manifested as Varaha, plunged into the patalas and charged the offspring of Danu and Diti. The very sight of the extraordinary creature confounded the Daityas and they stood transfixed. Then they rushed forward as one and surrounded the boar. Together they seized the beast. Full of rage, they tried to dismember the animal from every side. The mighty, horrible Danavas failed, O Rajan, to bring any harm to Varaha. They were filled with wonder and fear. All the thousands of enormous demons saw their last hour had come. And so, rapt in yoga with his Soul as his companion, the Devadeva began to emit tremendous roars, terrifying the Daityas and Danavas. All the worlds and the ten cardinal directions resounded with the roars and filled the living with abject fright. The very Devas, with Indra at their head, were petrified as the whole universe was stilled by that sound. It was a dreadful moment.

All mobile and immobile beings were benumbed by the awful sound. Terrified by the thunder, paralysed by the power of Vishnu, lifeless, the Danavas crumpled to the ground. With its hooves, the boar began to trample and rend asunder the flesh, fat and bones of the enemies of the Devas. Because of the tremendous roars, Vishnu came to be called Sanatana. He is also known as Padmanabha, the lotus-navelled; guru of yogins; preceptor and Supreme Lord of all creatures.

Soon, all the tribes of the Devas approached Brahma, the lord of the universe, and said, “What sort of noise is this, O mighty one? We do not understand it. By whose sound is the universe so petrified? Behold, the Devas and Danavas have all been rendered senseless by the terrible urjas of this sound.”

Meanwhile, O Mahabaho, the assembled Devas saw Vishnu in his Varaha rupa, and the Maharishis sang his praises.

Brahma said, “That is the Supreme Lord, creator of all beings, Soul of all creatures, guru of all yogins. Of immense body and infinite strength, he has slain all the Danavas, and arrived here. He is the Almighty, of immeasurable splendour, the great refuge of all blessings. He has achieved a most difficult feat, impossible of being accomplished by any other, and returned to his own sattvic nature. He is the lord and Soul of all beings, master of yoga, great ascetic. Listen, all of you. He is Krishna, the destroyer of all obstacles and impediments.

It is He from whose navel the primeval lotus emerged. He is the Paramatman, the Mahayogi; He is Brahma. Excellent Devas, there is no need for sorrow, fear or grief. He is the Ordainer. He is Brahman. He is all-devouring Kaala. He upholds the world. The roars that alarm you are of that divine one. Mahabaho, He is the object of universal worship. Immortal, lotus-eyed, He is the lord and origin of all beings.’

Yudhishtira says, 'O Bhaarata, tell me about the lofty yoga through which I may obtain moksha. O eloquent one, I truly wish to know everything about this yoga.'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to an old story of a guru and his sishya on the subject of moksha. There was a twice-born guru, a Maharishi. He was splendid in appearance. A Mahatman, he was firm in truth and a complete yogi.

Once, an outstanding sishya approached the guru with a desire to obtain what was for his highest good. With folded hands he stood before his master, then touched his guru's feet, and said, "If, O illustrious one, you are pleased with my worship, it befits you to answer some questions and doubts that I have. Who am I and who are you? Tell me this fully. Tell me also what Paramartha is. And when the material cause in all beings is identical, why do their births and death happen in such dissimilar ways? It is also appropriate for you, with your vast knowledge, to explain the purpose of the declarations in the Vedas about the difference of rites for different classes of men, the meaning of the injunctions of the smritis and the rulings which apply to all classes of men."

The guru said, "Listen, O my wise sishya. Answers to your question are not revealed in the very Vedas and this is the highest subject for thought or discourse. It is called Adhyatma and is the most valuable of all branches of learning and of all sacred institutes. Vasudeva is the supreme cause of the universe. He is the origin of the Vedas, AUM. He is truth, knowledge, sacrifice, renunciation, self-restraint and dharma. Those who know the Vedas know him as all-pervading, immutable, eternal, omnipresent, creator and destroyer, the unmanifest Brahman."

Hear now the story of him who was born in Vrishni's vamsa. A Brahmana should hear of the greatness of Devadeva Vishnu of immeasurable tejas, from the lips of Brahmanas. A Kshatriya should hear it from other Kshatriyas. A Vaisya should hear it from Vaisyas, and a high-Souled Sudra should hear it from Sudras. You deserve to hear it. Listen now to the auspicious tale of Krishna, the most excellent of all legends.

Vasudeva is the wheel of Kaala, without beginning and without end. Existence and non-existence are the attributes by which his real nature is known. The universe revolves like a wheel depending upon the lord of all beings. O best of men, the Supreme Being Kesava, is said to be the indestructible, unmanifest, immortal, immutable Brahman. The highest of the high, without change or deterioration himself, he created the Pitris, Devas, Rishis, Yakshas, Rakshasas, Nagas, Asuras and Manavas. He also created the Vedas, the eternal duties and the customs of men.

After he reduces everything into non-existence, again, at the beginning of a new yuga, he creates Prakriti. As diverse phenomena of several seasons appear sequentially, similarly, beings come into existence at the beginning of every celestial yuga. With the beings that are born comes the knowledge of laws and duties, neeti and dharma, in order to regulate the world's course.

At the end of every celestial yuga when the Pralaya sets in, the Vedas and all other scriptures disappear along with the rest. By the grace of the self-born, the Maharishis by their tapasyas, first regain the lost Vedas and other shastras. Brahma first acquired the Vedas. The Devaguru Brihaspati initially received their branches, the Vedangas. Bhrigu's son Sukra was the first to acquire the science of neeti, which is so beneficial for the universe. The art of sangita, music, was acquired by Narada; that of the astra-shastra, by Bharadwaja; the history of the Devarishis by Gargya; that of Aushadha, by the dark-complexioned son of Atri. Diverse other Rishis, proclaimed sciences such as Nyaya, Vaiseshika, Samkhya, Patanjala and the rest.

Let that Brahman which the Rishis have indicated by arguments drawn from reason, by means of the Vedas, and by inferences drawn from the direct evidence of the senses, be adored. Neither the Devas nor the Rishis were at first able to comprehend Brahman who is without beginning and who is the highest of the high. Only the divine creator of all things, the mighty Narayana, had knowledge of Brahman. The Rishis, the best among the Devas and the Asuras, and the ancient Rajarishis had the knowledge of the highest remedy for sorrow from Narayana. When primordial matter creates life through the action of the primal energy, the universe with all its potencies begins to flow from it. Just as one lamp can kindle thousands of other lamps, similarly, primordial matter creates thousands of living beings. And because of its infinity, primordial matter is never exhausted.

From the Unmanifest flows the awareness determined by deeds. Awareness creates consciousness. From consciousness ensues space. From space arises wind. From wind transpires heat. From heat results water, and water creates earth. These eight constitute the primordial Prakriti. The universe rests on them.

From these eight have originated the five organs of knowledge, the five organs of action, the five objects of the initial five organs, and the one, mind, forming the sixteenth. The ears, the skin, the two eyes, the tongue and the nose are the five organs of knowledge. The two feet, the lower duct, the organ of generation, the two arms and speech, are the five organs of action. Sound, touch, form, taste and smell are the five objects of the senses, covering all the things.

The mind dwells upon all the senses and their objects. In the perception of taste, it is the mind that becomes the tongue, and in speech, it is the mind that becomes words. Provided with the different senses, it is the mind that becomes all the objects that exist within its preserve. These sixteen, existing in their respective forms, are known as Adityas. These worship him who creates all knowledge and dwells within the body.

Taste is the attribute of water; scent is the attribute of earth; hearing is the attribute of space; vision is the attribute of fire or light; and touch, the attribute of the wind. This is the case with all creatures at all times. The mind is said to be the attribute of existence.

Existence springs from Avyakta Prakriti, which rests in that which is the Soul of all existent beings. These existences, founded in the Supreme Divinity that is above Prakriti and is without any inclination for action, uphold the entire universe of the living and non-living. This sacred edifice of nine doors, the body, is endowed with all these existences. That which is high above them—the Soul—dwells within it, pervading it. For this reason, it is called Purusha.

The Atman is without decay and not subject to death. It has knowledge of what is manifest and what is unmanifest. It is forever all-pervading, saguna—possessed of attributes—subtle, and the refuge of all existences and qualities. As a lamp discovers all objects great or small irrespective of its own size, likewise the Atman dwells in all creatures as the principle of knowledge regardless of the qualities or flaws of those beings. Urging the ear to hear what it hears, it is the Soul that hears. Similarly, employing the eye, the Atman sees. This body furnishes the means by which the Soul derives knowledge. The bodily organs are not the doers; the Atman is the doer of all deeds.

There is fire in wood, but it can never be seen by cutting open a log of wood. Similarly, the Soul dwells within the body, but it can never be seen by dissecting the body. The fire that dwells in wood may be seen by rubbing the wood with another piece of wood. In like manner, the Atman that dwells within the body may be seen by engaging proper means, of yoga. Water must exist in rivers. Rays of light are always attached to the sun. Likewise, the Soul has a body. This connection does not cease because of the constant succession of bodies that the Atman has to enter.

In a dream, the Soul, possessed with the fivefold senses, leaves the body and roams far and wide. Likewise, when death comes, the jiva with the senses in their subtle forms passes out of one body to enter another. The Jivatman is bound by its own previous deeds. Hence, compelled by its own karma of one state of existence, it attains another state. Indeed, it is led from one into another body by its own actions, which are inexorable in their results.

I will now tell you about the evolution of how the possessor of a human body, the jiva, leaves his body, enters another and then yet another; how, indeed, the entire range of beings exists as the result of their respective karmas of past and present lives.'

Bhishma says, ‘All inert and mobile beings, distributed into four classes, are to be of unmanifest birth and unmanifest death. Since it exists only in the unmanifest Soul, the mind is said to possess the attributes of the Unmanifest.

As a vast tree is ensconced within a small seed of the aswattha flower and becomes visible only when it takes root, even so birth takes place from what is unmanifest. A lifeless piece of iron flies towards a magnet. Similarly, inclinations and propensities caused by natural instincts, all fly towards the Soul in a new life. Indeed, even as the propensities and possessions born of ignorance and delusion, and inanimate in nature, are united with the Soul when reborn, the other tendencies and ambitions of the Soul that have their gaze directed towards Brahman become united with the jiva, and at last with Brahman himself.

Once, neither earth nor sky, not heaven or matter, or the vital breaths, or virtue and vice, or anything else, existed, save the Atman. Nor have they any connection with even the Soul defiled by ignorance. The Soul is eternal. It is indestructible. It exists in every creature. It is the cause of the mind. It is nirguna, without attributes. The universe that we perceive has been declared in the Vedas to be due to ignorance or delusion. The Soul’s apprehensions of form are because of past desires. The Jivatman, bestowed with those causes, desires, is led to its being engaged in karma. These in turn create more desires to end in further actions, and so on. Thus this vast wheel of existence revolves, without beginning and without end.

The unmanifest, awareness, along with the desires, is the hub of this wheel. The manifest, the body with the senses, constitutes its spokes; the perceptions and actions form its circumference. Propelled by the quality of rajas, the Soul presides over it—a witness to its revolutions. Like oilmen pressing oilseeds in their machine, the fruit born of ignorance affect the universe of creatures moistened by rajas, and grind it in the wheel. In the succession of existences, the living creature, seized by the idea of selfhood out of desire, engages itself in deeds. In the union of cause and effect, these actions again become new causes. Effects do not enter into causes. Nor do causes enter into effects. In the creation of effects, Kaala is the cause. The eight primordial essences, and their sixteen variations, exist in a state of union, as they are always presided over by the Soul.

As dust follows the wind that moves it, the Soul, divested of the body, yet bestowed with inclinations born of rajas, tamas and principles of causes constituted by the karmas of the past life, moves on following the direction that the Supreme Soul gives it. The Atman, however, is never touched by the inclinations and propensities. Nor are these touched by the Soul that is superior to them. The dust it bears never stains the wind, which is naturally pure. As the wind is separate from the dust, even so, the wise should know, is the connection between existence and the Soul. No one should take it that the Atman, due to its apparent union with the body, the senses, other propensities, beliefs and disbeliefs, is really bestowed with all these as its necessary and absolute gunas. On the other hand, the Soul should be taken as existing in its own nature."

Thus did the divine Rishi solve the doubt that vexed his sishya's mind. Despite all this, people depend upon means consisting of actions and scriptural rites to dispel grief and win happiness. Seeds scorched by fire do not sprout. Similarly, if everything that contributes to suffering be consumed by the fire of true knowledge, the Soul escapes the obligation of rebirth into the world.'

Bhishma says, 'Persons engaged in activity regard the practice of karma highly. Similarly, those devoted to knowledge do not value anything other than gyana. Individuals fully conversant with the Vedas and depending upon their declarations are rare. Men of greater wisdom desire the path of abstention from actions as the better of the two. Such conduct, therefore, is laudable. The intelligence, which urges abstention from actions, is that by which one attains moksha.

Possessed of a body, a person, through folly, along with wrath, yearning and all the vasanas born of rajas and tamas, becomes attached to earthly objects. One, therefore, who desires to destroy one's connection with the body, should never indulge in any impure deed. On the other hand, one should create by one's actions a path to attain liberation, without wishing for welfare in the next world. As gold, when tainted with iron, loses its purity and fails to shine, even so knowledge existing with attachment to earthly objects and such other faults, fails to put forth its brilliance.

He who, influenced by greed, follows the dictates of desire and anger, and transgresses the path of dharma to turn to adharma, meets with complete destruction. One who is desirous of gaining the Atman should never follow, with excess of attachment, earthly possessions that are the objects of the senses. If one does so; anger, joy and sorrow arise from each other and make one miserable. When everyone's body is made up of the five original elements as also of the three gunas of sattva, rajas and tamas, whom will one adore and whom will one blame, and with what words? Only fools become attached to the objects of the senses. Because of folly, they do not know that their bodies are only transitory. As a house made of earth is plastered over with earth, even so this body, which is made of earth, is kept from death by food, which is only a produce of earth. Honey, oil, milk, butter, meat, salt, treacle, grains, fruits and roots are all variations of earth and water.

Recluses living in the wilderness, abandon all desire for rich, savoury food, and eat simple fare, only for sustenance. Similarly, a person who dwells in the wilderness of the material world should be ready for exertion and should eat for sustenance, like a patient taking medicine. A noble man who wishes to find peace, should restrain his senses and examine all earthly objects that he encounters, with the help of truth, purity, candour, renunciation, enlightenment, courage, forgiveness, fortitude, intelligence, reflection and austerities.

All creatures, dazzled, because of ignorance, by the gunas, sattva, rajas and tamas, continually revolve as on a wheel. All faults, therefore, that are born of ignorance, should be closely examined and the idea of ahamkara that creates sorrow, with its origin in ignorance, should be avoided. The fivefold elements, the senses, the attributes of sattva, rajas and tamas, the three worlds with the Supreme Being himself, and karma, all rest on Chitta, consciousness.

As Kaala, under its own laws, always displays the phenomena of the seasons one after another, even so one should know that consciousness in all creatures is the inducer to action. Tamas from which proceeds Chitta creates delusions. It is darkness and is born of ignorance. To the three gunas of sattva, rajas and tamas are attached all the joys and sorrows of creatures. Listen now to the effects that spring from the attributes of sattva, rajas and tamas.

Contentment, satisfaction derived from joy, certainty, intelligence and memory, are the results of the attributes of sattva. Desire, anger, error, greed, confusion, fear and fatigue, belong to the quality of rajas. Despair, grief, discontent, vanity, pride and wickedness, all belong to tamas. Examining the gravity or lightness of these and other faults that dwell in the jiva, one should reflect upon each of them to ascertain which of them exist, which have become strong or weak, which have been driven off, and which remain.'

Yudhishtira says, 'What faults are discarded by persons who seek moksha? Who are they that are weakened by them? What are the faults that come repeatedly and cannot be got rid of? What, again, are regarded as weak, caused by perplexity and, therefore, permissible? What are the faults upon whose strength and weakness a wise man should reflect with the help of intelligence and reason? I am confused about these. Speak to me of them, O Pitamaha.'

Bhishma says, 'He who has a pure Soul, and extracts all his faults by their roots, succeeds in finding moksha. As an axe made of steel cuts a steel chain and in the process breaks itself, likewise, the one with a purified soul, who destroys all the faults that spring from tamas and those that are born with the jiva upon rebirth, succeeds in dissolving his connection with the body and attains moksha.

The qualities that have their origin in rajas, those that spring from tamas, and ones defined by purity under sattva, constitute the seed from which all embodied creatures have grown. Among these, the sattva guna alone is the path by which those of cleansed souls succeed in attaining moksha. He who has a purified soul should, therefore, abandon all the qualities born of rajas and tamas. For, when the sattva guna becomes free of rajas and tamas, it becomes even more resplendent.

Some say that sacrifices and other rituals performed with the help of mantras, although they certainly contribute to the purification of the soul, are evil and cruel. This view is incorrect. On the contrary, such karmas and kriyas are the principle means to dissociate the Atman from all worldly attachments, and to find dispassion. All unrighteous actions, all deeds encumbered with earthly gains and all activities fuelled by desire are accomplished through the influence of the qualities of rajas.

Through qualities born of tamas, one performs all deeds charged with avarice and wrath. Because of the guna of tamas, one embraces sleep and idleness, and becomes addicted to all kinds of cruelty and carnal pleasures. He, however, who, possessed of faith and scriptural knowledge, is mindful of the sattva guna, attends only to all things good, and becomes gifted with moral beauty and is flawless.'

Bhishma says, 'From rajas arises delusion or loss of judgement. Tamas, O Bharatarishabha, gives birth to wrath, lust, fear and pride. When all these are destroyed, one becomes pure. Invested with purity, one successfully gains knowledge of the Paramatman, which is changeless, resplendent, undecaying and all pervasive, has the Unmanifest for his refuge, and is the foremost of all the Devas.

Trapped in maya, men stray from knowledge, become foolhardy and yield to wrath. From wrath, they become subject to desire, which in turn creates lust, delusion, vanity, pride and selfishness. From such selfishness come forth various kinds of frenzied activity. From these actions arise diverse bonds of affection that lead only to sorrow, and from karma fertile with joy and sorrow accrues the accountability to birth and death.

Because of the onus of birth, the liability is incurred by a jiva within the womb, from conception. The jiva is defiled with excreta, urine, phlegm and blood generated there. Overwhelmed by desire, the jiva becomes bound by wrath, greed, lust and all the rest. It seeks, however, to escape those evils. In view of this, women are regarded as instrumental in setting the stream of creation flowing. By their nature, women are kshetra, and men are kshetrajna, with regard to the gunas. For this reason, wise men should not pursue women exclusively among other objects of the world. Indeed, women are like fearful mantra-shaktis. They bewilder the unwise. They are steeped in the gunas of rajas. They are the eternal embodiment of the senses.

Because of the keen desire that men have for women, children are born from them. As one discards from one's body germs that are born there but are not part of oneself, likewise should one attend to one's children, who, though regarded as one's own, are not so in reality. From the vital seed as from sweat and other impurities, creatures are born from the body, influenced by the karma of previous lives or by the course of nature. Therefore, the wise should feel no concern for them.

The attribute of rajas rests on that of tamas. The trait of sattva rests on that of rajas. Ignorance that is unmanifest envelopes knowledge, and causes the phenomena of intelligence and consciousness. The knowledge that possesses qualities of Chitta and buddhi is said to be the seed of embodied souls. That, again, which is the seed of such knowledge is called the jiva. Because of karma and the principle of time, the soul goes through birth and repeated cycles of rebirth. As in a dream, the soul exhibits a body influenced by the mind, correspondingly, it attains in the mother's womb a body based upon attributes and dispositions of its past karmas. All the senses while it is still in the womb, are awakened by past deeds as the operative cause, and develop in consciousness because of the mind co-existing with attachments.

Because of the past awareness of sound that are awakened in it, the jiva, subjected to these influences, receives the organs of hearing. Similarly, from attachment to forms, its eyes are created, and from its longing after scent, its organ of smell. From impressions of touch, it acquires skin. Likewise the five breaths—prana, apana, vyana, udana and samana—which contribute to keep the body alive. Encased in a body with all organs fully developed according to past actions, the jiva is born with inherent physical and mental distress. Know that grief emerges from the moment of acceptance of the body into the womb. It swells with the idea of selfhood. From renunciation of these attachments, which are the cause of birth, grief meets with an end. He that is conversant with sorrow's end attains moksha.

Both the origin and the destruction of the senses rest in the rajoguna. The wise should act with proper inquiry and concentration empowered by the shastras. The senses of knowledge, even if they succeed in acquiring all their goals, never succeed in overwhelming the man who is without desire.

The embodied soul that overcomes its senses, escapes the obligation of rebirth.’

Bhishma says, 'I will now tell you the means to conquer the senses as seen in the scriptures. O king, a man will attain the highest end with the help of such knowledge and by framing his conduct accordingly. Amongst all living creatures, man is said to be the foremost. Among men, those that are twice-born are pre-eminent, and conversant with the Vedas. These ones blessed are regarded as the souls of all living creatures. Indeed, the Brahmanas who know the Vedas are regarded as being divine and omniscient. They have become knowers of the Brahman. As a blind man, without a guide, encounters many difficulties on a road, so does one without knowledge encounter many obstacles in the world. For this reason, those that possess knowledge are regarded as superior to the rest. Individuals keen on gaining virtue practice diverse kinds of rites according to the dictates of the scriptures. They do not, however, succeed in attaining moksha; all that they gain are merits of which I will now tell you.

Purity of speech, body and mind; forgiveness, truth, steadiness and intelligence: those that observe both kinds of dharma display these sattvik qualities. That which is called brahmacharya is regarded as the means to acquire Brahman. It is the best of all dharmas. It is through the practice of brahmacharya that one obtains the highest end, mukti.

Brahmacharya is without any connection to the five vital breaths, mind, intellect, the five senses of perception and the five senses of action. Hence, it is free from all the perceptions of the senses. It is heard only as a word, and its form, without being seen, can only be conceived. It is a state of existence that depends only on the mind. That sinless state should be attained through the intellect alone. He who practices it duly attains Brahman; he who practices it half-heartedly, attains the condition of the Devas; while he who practices it moderately is born among Brahmanas and, possessed of knowledge, attains greatness.

Brahmacharya is exceedingly difficult to practice. Let me tell you the means by which one may do so. The awakened person who is drawn to it should subdue the rajoguna of passion as soon as it begins to manifest itself or as soon as it becomes dominant. He that has taken a vow of celibacy should not speak with women. He should never cast his eyes on an undressed woman. The sight of women, under even indifferent circumstances, fills irresolute men with passion. If a celibate feels a desire for a woman rising in his heart, he should as an atonement observe the vow called krichara and also spend three days immersed in water. If desire comes during a dream, one should, diving into water, mentally repeat three times the three Riks in that immersion aghamarshana. The wise man who has taken this vow should, with a broad and enlightened mind, burn the sins in his mind which are all due to the guna of passion.

Just as the duct that bears away the refuse of the body is an intimate part of the body, so is the embodied Soul intimately connected with the body that confines it. The different kinds of fluids, coursing through the network of arteries, nourish the body's wind, bile, phlegm, blood, skin, flesh, intestines, bones, marrow—and the organism as a whole. There are ten principal ducts that assist the functions of the five senses. From the ten, branch out thousands of others that are microscopic. Like rivers filling the ocean in the proper season, all these passages replete with fluids nourish the body. Leading to the heart is the artery called manovaha; it draws from every part of the human body the sperm that is born of desire. Numerous other passages, which branch out from that principal one, extend into every part of the body and, bearing the element of heat, cause the sense of vision and the rest.

As butter is churned from milk, so do desires generated in the mind by the sight or thought of women, draw together the sperm that lies within the body. In the midst of even our dreams passion generated by imagination works on the mind, with the result that the manovaha ejects the sperm born of desire.

The great Devarishi Atri is well-versed in the subject of the generation of the sperm. The fluids that are yielded by food, the manovaha and the desire born of imagination: these three are the causes that create the sperm, which has Indra as its presiding deity. The passion that helps in the emission of this fluid is, therefore, called indriya.

Those who know that the path of vital seed is the cause of the sinful state of affairs called varnasamkarshana, the mixture of castes, are men of restrained passions. Their sins have been burnt, and they are never subjected to rebirth. He that performs karma only to sustain his body, who reduces with the help of the mind the three attributes of sattva, rajas and tamas into a state of uniformity, and brings his last dying breaths to the manovaha, escapes the obligation of rebirth.

The mind is sure to gain knowledge. The mind takes the form of all things. The minds of all Mahatmans, who attain success through meditation, become desireless, luminous and eternal. Therefore, to destroy the mind as mind, one should do only sinless deeds and disentangle oneself from the attributes of passion and darkness. Doing this, one is sure to attain a most desirable end. Knowledge ordinarily acquired in youth weakens with age. One, of ripe intellect, however, succeeds through the auspicious effects of past karmas in destroying his desires. Such a person, who transcends the bonds of the body and the senses like a traveller traversing a path full of obstacles, and destroys all faults that he sees, succeeds in tasting the nectar of moksha.'

Bhishma says, 'Living creatures that grow attached to objects of the senses, which are always fraught with evil, become helpless. The Mahatmans, however, who are detached from sensual things, attain the highest. The man of intelligence, who sees the world overwhelmed with the evils of birth, death, decay, sorrow, disease and anxiety, should strive for the attainment of moksha. He should be pure in speech, thought and deed; he should be free from pride. Of peaceful soul and possessed of knowledge, he should lead a life of mendicancy, and pursue happiness without being attached to any worldly object. Yet, if attachment were seen to possess the mind because of compassion towards living creatures, he should, keeping in mind that the universe is the result of karma, show indifference to compassion itself.

Whatever good deeds are done, or whatever sin is committed, the doer reaps the consequences. Hence, one should, in speech, thought and deed, do only deeds that are pure and good. He succeeds in obtaining happiness who practices non-violence, truthfulness of speech, honesty towards all creatures, forgiveness and, always, heedfulness. Hence, exercising one's intelligence, one should dispose one's mind, by focusing on peace and goodwill towards all creatures. The man who regards the practice of such virtues as the highest dharma, conducive to the happiness of all creatures, and destroying all kinds of sorrow, possesses the highest knowledge, and succeeds in finding mukti.

One should never think of doing evil to others. One should not covet what is far beyond one's power to attain. One should not turn one's thoughts towards objects that are non-existent. One should, on the other hand, train one's mind towards knowledge with such persistent efforts that are sure to succeed. With the help of the affirmations of the srutis and with determined efforts calculated to bring success, knowledge is sure to flow. He who wants to speak amiable, kindly words or observe a law that is refined of all impurity, should utter only such truth as is not fraught with any malice or reprimand. He who is possessed of a sound heart should utter words that are not dishonest, not harsh, not cruel, not evil and not long-winded. The universe is bound in speech.

If inclined to renunciation then should one admit, with humility and a pure intellect, one's own evil actions. He who acts influenced by rajas of passion, finds much misery in this world and at last sinks into hell. One should, therefore, practice self-restraint in body, speech and mind. Ignorant persons bearing the burdens of the world are like robbers laden with their loot of scrambling sheep. The robbers are always wary of roads unfavourable to them due to the presence of the king's guard. Just as thieves have to discard their spoils if they wish for safety, so should one shed all actions dictated by passion and darkness in order to obtain bliss. Undoubtedly, a man who is without desire, free from the bonds of the world, content to live in solitude, moderate in diet, devoted to penances with the senses under control, who has burnt all his sorrows with his knowledge, who enjoys the practice of yoga, and has a purified soul, succeeds, as a result of his mind withdrawn into itself, in attaining Brahman or moksha.

One gifted with patience and a pure heart, should assuredly control his intellect. With the intellect disciplined, he should next control his mind, and then with the mind, overpower the objects of the senses. With the mind under control and the senses subdued, the senses will become luminous and gladly enter into Brahman. When one's senses are withdrawn into the mind, Brahman becomes manifested in it. Indeed, when the senses are destroyed, and the Soul returns to pure being, it is merged into Brahman. Remember, one should never make a display of one's mastery over yoga. Yet, one should always strive to restrain one's senses by practising the laws of yoga. Indeed, one engaged in the practice of yoga should live in a manner by which his conduct and demeanour may become pure.

Excluding one's yoga powers as a means to one's subsistence, one should rather live upon broken grains of corn, ripe beans, dry cakes of seeds, pot herbs, half-ripe barley, and the flour of fried pulses, fruits and roots, obtained as alms. Based upon time and place, one should according to one's inclinations observe, after proper examination, vows and rules about fasts. One should not suspend a course once begun. Like one slowly creating a fire, one should gradually extend a way of life that is prompted by knowledge. By doing so, Brahman gradually shines in one like the sun.

Ignorance, which has knowledge for its burial ground, extends its influence over all the three states of waking, dreaming and dreamless slumber. Knowledge, borne by intellect, is repeatedly invaded by ignorance. The corrupt person fails to understand the Soul, thinking of it as being one with the three states while in reality it transcends them all. When, however, he succeeds in recognising the limits under which the two, union with the three states and separation from them, are manifested, it is then that he becomes divested of attachment and attains moksha. When such a realisation occurs, one transcends the effects of age, rises above the consequences of infirmity and death, and obtains Brahman which is eternal, deathless, immutable and undiminishing.'

Bhishma says, 'The yogi who wishes to practice pure brahmacharya and who is affected by dreams of lust should whole-heartedly seek to renounce sleep. In dreams, the embodied soul, affected by the rajas and tamas, seems to possess another body and functions influenced by kama. Out of the earnestness for the acquisition of knowledge and focused meditation and communion, the yogi remains ever awake. Indeed, the yogi can keep himself always awake by devoting himself to gyana.

On this subject, it has been asked what this state is in which the jiva thinks itself surrounded with and engaged in sensual objects and actions.

It is true that the embodied being, with its senses in truth suspended, still thinks itself to be possessed of a body with all the senses of knowledge and action. In reply to the question, it is said that the master of yoga, Hari, comprehends truly how this transpires. The Maharishis say that the explanation offered by Hari is correct and consistent with reason. The learned say that it is due to the senses being worn out with fatigue that all creatures experience dreams. Though the senses are suspended, the mind never disappears or becomes inactive, and the mind gives rise to dreams. This is said by all to be the noted cause of dreams.

As the imagination of a man who is awake and engaged in actions, is confined to the creative power of the mind, likewise the impressions in a dream relate only to the mind. A person with desire and attachment has dreams based upon the impressions of countless forgotten lives of the past.

Nothing that impresses the mind once is ever lost, and the Soul, being aware of all those impressions, causes them to surface from obscurity.

Whichever among the three attributes of goodness, passion and darkness is fetched out by the influence of past actions and by whichever amongst them the mind is affected temporarily, its elements are subtly exhibited as images. After such images are projected, the particular aspect of goodness, passion or darkness that may have been brought by past actions rises in the mind and leads to its result of happiness or misery. Such images, with wind, bile and phlegm for their origins, and which men perceive through ignorance and from inclinations infused with passion and darkness, cannot be easily discarded. Whatever objects a person perceives in the waking state through the senses in a state of lucidity are seized by the mind in dreams while the senses are dimmed.

The mind exists unhindered in all things. This is due to the nature of the soul. The soul should be understood. All the elements and the phenomena they create exist in the soul. In the state called dreamless slumber, sushupti, the manifest human body that is the gateway of dreams, disappears in the mind. Occupying the body, the mind enters the manifest Soul upon which all existent and non-existent things depend, and is transformed into a wakeful witness with the certainty of realisation. Thus inherent in pure consciousness, the Soul of all things is regarded by the learned as transcending both consciousness and all things in the universe. The yogi who desires any of the divine attributes of knowledge, renunciation and the rest, should regard a pure mind to be identical with the object of his desire. All things rest in a pure mind or the Atman. This is the result attained by one who is engaged in tapasya. The yogi, however, who has crossed darkness or ignorance, becomes possessed of transcendent radiance. When ignorance has been transcended, the embodied Atman becomes Supreme Brahman, the cause of the universe.

The Adityas have penances and Vedic rites. Darkness or pride, which destroys the Devas, is the way of the Asuras. This, Brahman, which is said to have knowledge as its attribute, is difficult to attain by either the Adityas or the Asuras. It should be noted that the gunas, sattva, rajas and tamas, belong to the Adityas and the Asuras. Sattva is the attribute of the Adityas, while the two others belong to the Asuras.

Brahman transcends all the gunas. It is pure knowledge. It is deathless. It is pure splendour. It is everlasting. Persons of cleansed souls who realise Brahman attain the highest end. With knowledge one can indeed say this much with the help of reason and inference: Brahman which is indestructible can be comprehended only by withdrawing the senses and the mind from external objects into the Atman.'

CANTO 217

Bhishma says, 'He cannot be said to know Brahman who does not know the four states of dreams, dreamless slumber, Brahman as saguna, indicated by attributes, and Brahman as nirguna, transcending all attributes, as also what is Vyakta, manifest, and what is Avyakta, unmanifest, which Maharishi Narayana has described as tattvam. That which is manifest should be known as liable to death. That which is unmanifest transcends death.

Rishi Narayana has described the principle of pravritti, action. Upon it rests the whole universe with its mobile and immobile creatures.

The principle of nivritti, actlessness, again leads to the unmanifest and eternal Brahman. The creator Brahma has described the doctrine of pravritti. Pravritti implies rebirth or return. Nivritti, on the other hand, implies the highest end, liberation. The ascetic who wants to discriminate with accuracy between good and evil, who is always bent on understanding the nature of the Soul, and who devotes himself to nivritti, attains that highest end. He, who wishes to accomplish this, should know both Prakriti and Purusha of which I will now tell you.

That which is different from both Prakriti and Purusha, which transcends them both, and is distinguished from all beings, should be particularly known by the wise. Both Prakriti and Purusha are without beginning and without end. Both are beyond the grasp of their ken. Eternal and indestructible, both are greater than the greatest of beings. In these, they are similar; there are points of dissimilarity between them.

Let me explain. Prakriti is filled with the traigunas. It is also engaged in creation. The true aspects of the kshetrajna Purusha is known to be different. Purusha is the apprehender of all the transformations of Prakriti but cannot himself be apprehended. He transcends all attributes. As regards Purusha and the Paramatman, both of them are unimaginable. And being without attributes by which they can be distinguished, both are prominent and apart from all else. Just as a man with his head circled by three folds of a cloth, a turban, is not identical with the turban he wears, the embodied Jivatman invested with the traigunas is not identical with those gunas.

Hence, these four subjects, which are covered by these fourfold studies, should be understood. One who understands this is never bewildered when drawing conclusions in his enquiry.

He that wants to attain high prosperity should become pure in mind, and taking to austere practices of the body and the senses, should devote himself to yoga without desire for their fruits. The universe is pervaded by yoga-shakti quietly circulating through every part of it and illumining it resplendently. The sun and the moon shine with splendour in the glory of the heart because of yoga-shakti.

The result of yoga is gyana, knowledge. Yoga is spoken of highly in the world. Whatever actions are destructive of passion and darkness establish yoga in its true character. Brahmacharya and ahimsa establish the yoga of the body, while restraining the mind and speech properly establish the yoga of the mind. The food obtained in alms from the twice-born is superior to all other food. By eating such food moderately, one's sins born of passion begin to fade. A yogi subsisting upon such food finds his senses gradually withdrawn from their objects. Hence, he should take only as much food as is strictly necessary for sustenance. It is also advisable that the knowledge that one gains gradually with one's mind devoted to yoga, should readily be garnered during one's last moments by a forcible stretch of power.

The embodied Jivatman divested of rajas does not immediately attain moksha but assumes a subtle form, a sukshma rupa with all the senses of perception, and moves about in space. When his mind becomes unaffected by actions, because of renunciation, he loses that subtle form and merges into Prakriti without, however, yet attaining Brahman. After the destruction of this gross material body, one who thoughtfully escapes from all the three bodies—the gross, the subtle and the causal, succeeds in attaining moksha.

The birth and death of creatures always depend upon the cause constituted by avidya. When knowledge of Brahman arises, one needs no longer to pursue the jiva. Those, however, who accept what is the reverse of truth by believing the ego to be the self are men whose beliefs are accounted for during the birth and death of all beings. Such men never even dream of mukti.

Yogins who patiently support their bodies, renounce all external objects with the help of their intellect, and withdraw themselves from the world of senses, come to admire the senses for their subtlety. Some amongst them, with the mind cleansed by yoga, who journey in accord with the scriptures and reach the highest, succeed in knowing it with their intellect and abide in that which is the highest.

Some worship Brahman in images. Some worship Him as existing with attributes. Some repeatedly realise the highest divinity, which has been described to be like a flash of lightning and indestructible. Others, who have burnt their sins with tapasya, attain Brahman in the end. All Mahatmans attain the highest end. Mindful of the scriptures, one should observe the subtle attributes of the several forms of Brahman that are worshipped by men. The yogi who has transcended the necessity of depending on the body, who has cast aside all attachments, and whose mind is absorbed in yoga, is known as another embodiment of infinity, as the Supreme Divinity, or as that which is unmanifest. Men whose hearts are devoted to the acquisition of knowledge first succeed in freeing themselves from the world of mortals. Subsequently, by casting off attachments they enter into the nature of Brahman, and at last attain moksha, the highest end.

So have persons conversant with the Vedas spoken of the teaching that leads to the attainment of Brahman. All those who follow the path according to their ability and acumen, successfully find mukti. They, who succeed in acquiring the knowledge that cannot be shaken by doubt and scepticism and which makes its possessors free from all attachments, attain various high realms after death and at last find emancipation.

The pure-hearted who have imbibed contentment from knowledge, and have cast off all desires and attachments, gradually approach Brahman, which has the unmanifest for its sole attribute, which is divine, and without birth and death. With the realisation that Brahman dwells in their own Souls, they become themselves eternal and have never again to be reborn. They reach the supreme state, which is indestructible and eternal, and so exist in bliss. The observation with regard to this world, samsara, is this: It exists in the case of the ignorant; it does not exist for the enlightened.

The whole universe, bound in desire, is spinning like a wheel. As the strands of a lotus-stalk spread into every part of the stalk, so do the strands of desire, which have neither beginning nor end, spread themselves over every part of the body. As a weaver drives his threads into a cloth with his shuttle, so does the shuttle of desire weave the threads that form the fabric of the universe. He who properly knows the characteristics of Prakriti, Shakti and Purusha, is freed from desire and attains moksha. The divine Rishi Narayana, the shelter of the universe, out of compassion for all creatures, clearly proclaimed these means to acquire immortality.'

Yudhishtira says, ‘By following pravritti, O you that are skilled in all courses of conduct, did Janaka, the ruler of Mithila, adept in the way of moksha, succeed in attaining mukti, after casting off all worldly pleasures?’

Bhishma says, ‘Listen to an ancient story of the manner in which a particular ruler, thoroughly conversant with all the asramas, succeeded in achieving the highest bliss. There was a king in Mithila named Janadeva of Janaka’s race. He was ever engaged in deliberation upon the paths that might lead to the attainment of Brahman. One hundred acharyas always lived in his palace, to instruct him upon the diverse dharmas followed by people from various walks of life. Masterful in the Vedas, he was not convinced by the speculations of his teachers on the nature of the Soul, nor on their views of death and rebirth.

One day the son of the devi Kapila, a great ascetic called Panchasikha, who ranged over the whole world, arrived in Mithila. Endowed with true conclusions about all speculations about the diverse duties connected with renunciation, he was above all conflict, and unequivocal. He was regarded as the best of Rishis. Through his travels, he wanted to place within reach of all men the eternal bliss that is so difficult to attain. It seems that he went everywhere amazing the world, during the avatara of none other than the Maharishi whom the followers of the Samkhya faith called Kapila.

He was the most excellent of all the disciples of Asuri and was called Amara, the deathless. He had performed a silent japa that lasted a thousand years. He was firm in mind, and had completed all the rites and sacrifices as required in the scriptures that lead to the attainment of Brahman. He was fully conversant with the five sheaths that cover the Soul. He was devoted to the five karmas with which Brahma is worshipped, and possessed the five qualities of peace, self-restraint, non-violence, compassion and charity. Thus known as Panchasikha, he once approached a large assembly of Rishis of the Samkhya faith and enquired about the highest goal of human acquisition: was it the unmanifest or that upon which the five Purushas or Koshas rest?

In order to obtain knowledge of the Atman, Asuri had questioned his guru and, because of the teacher's instructions and of his own tapasya, Asuri understood the distinction between body and soul, and acquired divine insight. In that assembly of ascetics, Asuri gave his account of the Immutable One, and Indestructible Brahman that is seen in diverse forms.

Panchasikha became a disciple of Asuri. He lived on human milk. There was a certain Brahmani named Kapila, who was the wife of Asuri. She adopted Panchasikha as a son and he would suckle at her breasts. Consequently, he came to be known as the son of Kapila and his mind became fixed on Brahman. The Devarishi Narada who also told me about the omniscience of Panchasikha brought particulars of his birth and how he became the son of Kapila, to my knowledge. Conversant with all the asramas, Panchasikha acquired great knowledge. Next, he approached Janaka and, fully aware that the king had equal reverence for all his teachers, began to amaze the hundred acharyas with a presentation of his own opinion charged with abundant logic. Janaka, who witnessed the gifts of Panchasikha Kapileya, grew exceedingly attached to him. He abandoned his hundred teachers, and began to follow Kapileya exclusively.

Kapileya addressed Janaka, who sat with his head traditionally bowed and who was fully able to understand the sage's instructions on the transcendent tenet of moksha as explained in Samkhya treatises. Beginning with the sorrows of birth, he spoke of the burdens of religious deeds. Then he explained the hardships of all states of life right up to Brahmaloka, the sacred domain of the creator. He also spoke on maya for whose sake dharma and rituals are followed, and of their fruits, which are untrustworthy, destructible, fleeting, unsteady and uncertain.

Kapileya said, “Sceptics say that when death is evidently witnessed by all, those who maintain, out of their faith in the scriptures, that something distinct from the body, called the Atman, exists, are eventually defeated in argument. They also urge that one’s death means the extinction of one’s Atman, and that sorrow, age and disease imply the partial death of the Soul. Furthermore, he who maintains, in ignorance, that the Atman is distinct from the body and exists after the loss of the body, entertains an opinion that is illogical. If the non-existent were regarded as existing, then it may be said that the king, being regarded so, is in truth never liable to age or death. However, is he, on that account, to really be believed to be above age and death?

When the question is whether an object exists or does not exist, and when that whose existence is asserted reveals all the indications of non-existence, what is that upon which ordinary people rely in settling the affairs of life? Direct evidence is the root of both belief and the scriptures, bhakti and the shastras. The scriptures can be contradicted by direct evidence. As to faith, its evidences do not amount to much. Whatever be the subject, cease to reason basing your logic on belief alone. There is no jiva other than this body.

In a banyan seed inheres the capacity to yield leaves, flowers, fruits, roots and bark. From the grass and water that a cow consumes come milk and butter, substances whose nature is different from that of the creative causes. Elements of different kinds when allowed to decompose in water produce intoxicating liquors whose nature is quite different from that of the materials that produce them. Likewise, from the sperm is produced the body and its attributes, with the intellect, consciousness, mind and other possessions. Two pieces of wood, rubbed together, produce fire. The stone called suryakantam, meeting the rays of the sun, produces fire. Any metallic object, heated in fire, vapourises water when immersed in it. Similarly, the material body creates the mind and its attributes of perception, memory, imagination and the rest. As the magnet moves iron, similarly, the senses are controlled by the mind. So reason the sceptics.

The sceptics, however, are mistaken. For, the disappearance of only the vitalising force, when the body becomes lifeless, and not the simultaneous disappearance of the body on death, is evidence that the body is not the Soul but that the Soul is separate from the body, and outlives it. If, indeed, body and Soul had been one and the same, both would disappear at the same time. Instead, the dead body may be seen for some time after the occurrence of death. Death, therefore, means the flight from the body of something that is other than the body. The entreaty of the divinities by the very men who deny the separate existence of the Soul is another good argument for the premise that the Soul is separate from the body and has an existence that is independent of a material state. The divinities to whom these men pray cannot be seen or touched. They are believed to exist in subtle forms. Truly, if a belief in divinities divested of material forms does not violate their logic, why should the existence of an immaterial Soul alone do their logic such harm?

Another argument against the sceptic is that his hypothesis implies a destruction of karma; for if body and Soul die together, the actions of this life would also perish: a conclusion to which no man can possibly come if he is to explain the inequalities witnessed in the universe. These examples, and material forms, cannot be the causes of the Jivatman, its sensory accompaniments of perception, memory and the like. The identity of immaterial existences with objects that are material cannot be comprehended. Hence, objects that are themselves material cannot by any means be causes for the creation of things immaterial.

There are individuals of the opinion that there is rebirth and that it is caused by ignorance, the desire for actions, greed, disdain and attachment to other vices. They say that avidya is the Atman. Actions constitute the seed that is sown in the soil. Desire is the water that causes the seed to sprout and grow—in this way they explain rebirth. They maintain that ignorance is ingrained in a subtle manner, and when one mortal body is destroyed, another body immediately generates the ego from it. Furthermore, that when this ego is consumed with the help of knowledge, the destruction of existence itself follows, and the person attains nirvana. This opinion also is erroneous. This is the doctrine of the Bouddhas, Buddhists.[1]

It may be asked that when the being that is thus reborn is a different one in its nature, birth and purposes connected with virtue and vice why should the ahamkara then be regarded to have any identity with the being that was? Indeed, the only inference that can be drawn is that the entire chain of existences of a particular being is not really a chain of connected links but separate existences in succession that are unconnected with one another. On the other hand, if the being that is the result of rebirth is really different from what it was in a previous birth, what satisfaction can come to a person from the exercise of the virtue of charity or from the acquisition of knowledge or of asceticism, since the deeds performed by one are to accrue to another person in another birth without the performer himself being present to enjoy them?

Another result of this false doctrine would be that one in this life may be rendered miserable by the actions of another in a previous life, or having become miserable may again be rendered happy. However, by looking at what actually takes place in the world, a proper conclusion may be drawn with respect to the unseen. The separate consciousness that is the result of rebirth is, from what may be inferred from the Bouddha theory of life, different from the consciousness that had preceded it in a previous life. The manner, yet, in which the rise of a separate consciousness is explained by this theory, does not seem to be either consistent or reasonable.

The Chitta as it existed in the previous life was the very opposite of eternal; being only transitory, it extended as it did till death of the body. That which has an end cannot be taken as the cause for the creation of a second consciousness appearing after the occurrence of the end. If, again, the very loss of the previous Chitta were regarded as the cause of the creation of the second consciousness, then upon the death of a body, a second form would arise from the inert corpse. Once more, their doctrine of extinction of life, nirvana or sattva-samkshaya is exposed to the criticism that such extinction will become a recurring phenomenon like that of the seasons, the year, the yuga, heat, cold or objects that are agreeable or disagreeable.

If to avoid these criticisms, the followers of this doctrine assert the existence of a soul that is permanent and to which each new consciousness attaches; they expose themselves to the new charge that the permanent substance, overcome with age, and with death that brings about destruction, may in time be itself weakened and destroyed. If the supports of a mansion are weakened by time, the mansion itself is sure to finally fall down. The senses, mind, wind, blood, flesh, bones, successively meet with destruction and enter each into its own original cause. If again the existence of an eternal Soul is asserted to be changeless, the refuge of the intellect, consciousness and other attributes, and yet is dissociated from all these, such an assertion would be exposed to a serious protest, for then all that is usually done in the world would be meaningless, especially with reference to the attainment of the fruits of charity and other religious acts.

All the declarations in the srutis encouraging all the actions connected with the conduct of men in the world, would be equally unmeaning, for the Soul being dissociated from the intellect and the mind, there is no one to enjoy the fruits of good deeds and Vedic rites.

So, diverse kinds of speculations arise. Whether this opinion is right or the other is true, there is no conclusion to be reached from these disputes. Engaged in reflection on such opinions, careful persons follow meticulous lines of thought. The intellect of these, directed to specific theories, becomes absorbed with them until at last, it is entirely lost in them. Thus, all men are rendered miserable by all pursuits, good or bad. The Vedas lead them back to the right path, guide them along it, like mahouts their elephants. Many men, with weakened minds, desire objects that are filled with great happiness. These, however, have soon to meet with a much larger measure of sorrow, and then, forcibly torn from their heart's desires, they have to accept the might of death.

What use has one, who is destined to die and whose life is unstable, for relatives, friends, wives and other possessions? He who encounters death after he abandons all these, passes easily out of the world and has never to return. Earth, space, water, heat and wind always support and nourish the body. After such deliberation, how can one feel any affection for one's body? Indeed, the body, which is subject to death, has no joy in it."

After King Janadeva heard the faultless words of Panchasikha, unconnected with delusions arising from daunting sacrifices and other Vedic rituals, highly salutary, and regarding only the Atman, the king was filled with wonder, and prepared himself to address the Rishi once more.'

Bhishma says, 'Janadeva of the race of Janaka, thus instructed by the great Rishi Panchasikha, once more questioned him on the subject of existence or non-existence after death.'

Janadeva said, "O illustrious one, if no one retains any knowledge after departing from this state of being, and if, indeed, this is true, where then is the difference between ignorance and knowledge? What do we gain then by knowledge and what do we lose by ignorance? Consider, O Dvijottama, that if moksha be such, then all religious actions and vows end only in annihilation. Of what avail would then the distinction be between heedfulness and heedlessness? If mukti means dissociation from all objects of pleasure or an association with objects that are not eternal, why then would men cherish a desire for action, or, resolved to action, continue to find ways for the accomplishment of desired ends? What is the truth of this?"

Bhishma continues, 'Seeing the king helplessly enveloped in thick darkness, and stupefied by failure, Panchasikha consoled him thus, "In moksha the achievement is not extinction. Nor is it any kind of existence that one can easily conceive. This that we see is a union of body, senses and mind. They exist independently and control one another. In this manner, they continue to function. The elements that constitute the body are water, space, wind, heat and earth. These come together forming the body according to their own nature. They separate again in accordance with their own nature. The body is not one element.

Intellect, fire and breath, are all wind; these three are said to be organs of action. The senses, the objects of the senses, sound, form and the rest, the energy that dwells in those objects due to which they can be seen, the faculties lodged in the senses through which they succeed in perceiving them, the mind, prana, apana and the rest, the various fluids and impulses that are the results of the digestive organs, flow from the three.

Hearing, touch, taste, vision and scent, are the five senses. They derive their attributes from the mind, which, indeed, is their cause. The mind that exists as an aspect of Chitta has three states: pleasure, pain and the absence of both pleasure and pain. Sound, touch, form, taste, scent, and the objects to which they belong, until the moment of one's death are causes for the attainment of knowledge. Upon the senses, rest all actions that lead to nirvana, as also renunciation, which ushers one to the attainment of Brahman, along with the discovery of truth with regard to all subjects of enquiry.

The learned say that discovery of truth is the highest objective of existence, and that it is the root of moksha; and of intelligence, they say that it leads to moksha and Brahman. The person, who regards this union of perishable attributes called the body and the objects of the senses as the Soul, feels, because of such flawed knowledge, great misery that proves to be unending. Those, on the other hand, who regard all worldly objects as Anatman, not-Soul, and who on that account cease to have any affection or attachment for them, have never to suffer any sorrow, for sorrow, in their case stands in need of some foundation upon which to rest.

In this connection, there exists the unrivalled branch of knowledge that speaks of renunciation. It is called samyagradha. I will speak to you about it. Listen to it for the sake of your mukti.

Renunciation of actions is expressed for all persons who strive earnestly for moksha. Those who have not been taught correctly and subsequently think that serenity may be attained without renunciation have to bear a heavy burden of sorrow. Vedic sacrifices and other rites exist for the relinquishment of wealth and other possessions. For disavowal of all enjoyments, exist vows and fasts of diverse kinds. For renunciation of pleasure and happiness, exist tapasya and yoga. The renunciation, however, of everything or vairagya is the highest kind of abstinence. What I am about to tell you is the one path pointed out by the learned in order to renounce everything. Those who tread the path succeed in driving off all sorrow, while those who deviate from it reap distress and suffering.

Before speaking of the five organs of knowledge, with the mind for the sixth, and all of which occupy the intellect, I will tell you of the five organs of action, which have strength for their sixth. The two hands define two organs of action. The two legs are the two limbs for movement. The sexual organ exists for both pleasure and the continuation of the species. The anal canal, leading down from the stomach, is the organ for the expulsion of waste. The organs of speech exist for the expression of sounds. Know that these five organs of action relate to the mind. These are the eleven organs of knowledge and of action, including the mind. One should quickly reject the mind with the intellect. For hearing, three causes must exist together, the ears, sound and the mind. The same is the case with the senses of touch, form, taste and smell. These fifteen are needed for the several kinds of perception.

Everyone, because of these, becomes aware of three separate aspects of those perceptions: a material organ, its particular function, and the mind from which that function works. Again, with regard to all perceptions of the mind, three qualities relate to goodness, passion and darkness. In them, function three kinds of consciousness, including all feelings and emotions. Rapture, satisfaction, joy, happiness and peace, which arise in the mind from any perceptible cause or without any apparent cause, belong to the sattva guna. Discontent, regret, grief, desire and spite, causeless or occasioned by a perceivable cause, are the signs of rajas. Misjudgement, confusion, distraction, dreams and lethargy, however caused, belong to the tamoguna.

Whatever state of consciousness exists, of either the body or the mind, united with joy or satisfaction, is from the sattva guna. Whatever state of consciousness exists united with any feeling of discontent or cheerlessness is from the rajoguna in the mind. Whatever state, either of the body or the mind, exists with error or distraction indicates tamas, which is incomprehensible and inexplicable.

The organ of hearing relies on space; it is to an extent space itself. Sound has that organ for its port. Sound, therefore, is a modification of space. On hearing sound, one may not immediately acquire knowledge of the ear and space. However, when sound is heard, the ear and space do not long remain unknown. By destroying the ear, sound and space may be destroyed. In addition, by destroying the mind, all may be destroyed. The same is the case with the skin, the eyes, the tongue and the nose. They exist in touch, form, taste and smell. They constitute the faculty of perception and they are the mind. With each employed in its own function, all the five organs of action and five of knowledge exist together, and upon the union of the ten dwells the mind as the eleventh, and upon the mind, the intellect as the twelfth. If it were said that these twelve do not exist together, then the outcome would be death in dreamless slumber. However, as there is no death in dreamless slumber, it must be conceded that these twelve exist together as regards themselves but separately from the Soul.

The co-existence of these twelve with the Atman, which is referred to in conversation, is only a common form of speech for the ordinary purposes of the world. The dreamer, from the appearance of past sensual impressions, becomes conscious of his senses in their subtle forms, and equipped as he already is with the three attributes of goodness, passion and darkness he regards his senses as existing along with their respective objects and, so, acts and moves about with an imaginary body just as he does while awake. The dissociation of the soul from the intellect, and the mind from the senses, which quickly disappear without stability, and which the mind causes to arise only when influenced by darkness, is happiness that feeds off the tamoguna and is experienced only in this material body.

The bliss of moksha certainly differs from it. The same subtle, truth-concealing darkness seems to envelop the bliss of mukti, and the ecstasy awakened by the inspired teaching of the Vedas. In reality, moksha is unstained by darkness. Similar to what occurs in dreamless sleep, in moksha also, subjective and objective existences, from consciousness to objects of the senses, which have their origin in one's actions, are all eliminated. In some individuals overwhelmed by ignorance these exist, firmly grafted. To others who have transcended avidya, they never come at any time.

They who are enlightened about the aspects of Atman and anatman say that this sum of the senses, and the rest, is the kshetra, the field of karma. That prevailing element which remains, transcending the mind, is called kshetrajna, the knower of the field. When all creatures exist because of the known causes of ignorance, desire and actions, in addition to their primary nature of union between the Soul and body, which of these two is destructible, and how can the Atman, which is said to be eternal, suffer destruction?

As when small rivers that merge into larger ones lose their forms and names, and the larger ones that flow into the ocean also lose their forms and names, likewise occurs the state of moksha. This being the case, when the Jivatman merges into the Paramatman, and all its attributes disappear, how can it be an object of distinctness?

One who is acquainted with the awareness directed towards the accomplishment of mukti and who heedfully seeks to know the evil fruits of his actions, never soils the Atman, even as a lotus leaf though dipped in water is never soaked by it.

When one becomes free from the myriad vigorous bonds, occasioned by affection for children and spouses, and love for sacrifices and other rituals; when one discards both joy and sorrow and transcends all attachments, one then attains the highest end and entering into Brahman loses one's individuality.

When one has understood the edicts of the srutis that lead to correct inferences about Brahman and has practiced the auspicious virtues which these and other scriptures impart, one may rest at ease, setting aside the fears of age and death.

When both punya and paapa disappear, and their fruits in the form of joy and sorrow are destroyed, men, unattached to everything, take refuge, at first, in the saguna Brahman invested with personality, and then, behold the nirguna, impersonal Brahma.

In the course of its descent under the influence of avidya, jiva lives within its body formed by karma just like the silkworm within its cocoon made of threads woven by itself. And like the silk-worm that abandons its cocoon, the jiva too abandons its body generated by its karma. Finally, its sorrows are destroyed like a clod of earth falling violently upon a rock. As the ruru discards its old horns or the snake sheds its skin and lives on, a detached person sheds all his sorrows. As a bird deserts a tree that is about to fall and flies to a new nest, the man freed from attachments casts off both joy and sorrow, and dissociates even from his subtle and subtler forms, his sukshma and linga sariras, attains the end which is filled with the highest weal. Your own ancestor Janaka, king of Mithila, who watched his city burn in a blaze, himself proclaimed, 'In this inferno nothing of mine is afire.'"

After King Janadeva listened to Panchasikha speak these words that could yield immortality, on careful reflection, he arrived at the truth, shed his sorrows, and lived on in the enjoyment of great bliss. He who reads this discourse, O king, and always reflects on it, is never pained by any calamity, and freed from sorrow attains moksha like Janadeva, the ruler of Mithila.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘With what deeds does one acquire happiness, and what are the actions that bring woe? What also is that, O Bhaarata, by doing which one becomes free from fear and progresses here, in this world, crowned with success in the purusharthas?’

Bhishma says, ‘The ancients, who had their awareness directed to the srutis, highly approved the duty of samyama, restraint, for all the asramas generally, but especially so for the Brahmanas. Success in religious rites never occurs in the case of one that is not restrained. Religious rites, penance, truth, all these are founded in abstinence. Moderation enhances one’s energy. Abnegation is said to be sacred. The man of self-restraint becomes sinless and fearless and wins great rewards. A disciplined man sleeps happily and wakes happily. He lives happily in the world and his mind always remains cheerful. Every kind of excitement is quietly controlled through abstention. One who is not disciplined fails in a similar objective. The man of continence realises his innumerable enemies in the forms of lust, desire, wrath and the rest, as if these live in a separate body.

Like tigers and other predators, those lacking restraint always fill everyone with dread. To control these men, Brahma created the Kshatriyas and kings. In all the four asramas of life, the practice of abstinence is distinguished above all other virtues. The fruits of moderation are much greater than those obtainable in all the asramas of life together.

I will now tell you the traits of individuals who prize samyama highly. Their attributes are nobility, peace, contentment, faith, forgiveness, invariable simplicity, controlled speech, humility, reverence for elders and superiors, benevolence, compassion for all creatures, candour. They abstain from gossip, false and useless conversation, and from praising and insulting others. The self-restrained man becomes desirous of moksha. He quietly suffers current joys and grief, and is never exhilarated or depressed by anticipated ones. Without vindictiveness and all kinds of guile, he is unmoved by praise and blame, is well behaved, has good manners, is pure of heart, has firmness or fortitude and is a complete master of his passions.

Honoured in this world, such a man in the afterlife finds swarga. When with his help all creatures acquire what they cannot otherwise have, such a man rejoices and becomes happy. Devoted to universal benevolence, he never harbours animosity towards anyone. Peaceful like the ocean during low tide, wisdom fills his soul and he is ever cheerful. Possessed of intelligence, and worthy of universal reverence, the man of restraint never fears any creature and in return is feared by none. He, who never rejoices even at large attainments and never feels sorrow when overtaken by calamity, is possessed of contented wisdom. Such a man is said to be self-restrained. Indeed, such a man is said to be a being reborn, a true Dvija.

Versed with the scriptures and endowed with a pure soul, the man of abstinence, accomplishes all the actions done by the good, and enjoys their pure fruits. They, however, that have a wicked Soul never take to the path of benevolence, forgiveness, peace, contentment, sweetness of speech, truth, generosity and comfort. Their path consists of lust, wrath, greed, envy of others and boastfulness. The Brahmana should overcome lust and wrath, practice the vow of brahmacharya, achieve complete mastery of his senses, exert himself with endurance in the severest of penances, and observe the most rigid restraints. Thus he should live in this world, and calmly bide his time like one with a body but knowing fully that he is not subject to death.'

Yudhishtira says, 'The three higher castes, who undertake sacrifices and other rituals, sometimes eat the remnants, of meat and wine, of sacrifices in honour of the Devas, in order to beget children and heaven. What, O Pitamaha, is the character of what they do?'

Bhishma says, 'Those who eat forbidden food regardless of the sacrifices and vows ordained in the Vedas are considered wayward men. They are deemed fallen. Those, on the other hand, who eat such food in the observance of Vedic sacrifices and vows, and induced by the desire of fruits in the shape of heaven and children, ascend to heaven but fall again on the exhaustion of their punya.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Common people say that fasting is tapasya. Is it really so, or is penance something else?'

Bhishma says, 'People do regard upavasa, fasting, measured by months or fortnights or days, as penance. In the opinion, however, of the wise, this is not tapasya. On the contrary, fasting is an impediment to the acquisition of the knowledge of the Soul. The renunciation of being the doer and the humility contained in the worship, and compassion for all creatures, constitute the highest tapasya, distinguished above all tapasyas.

He who undertakes such penance is regarded as one that is always fasting and always leads a life of brahmacharya. Such a Brahmana will become a Muni always, a Deva evermore, watchful forever, and engaged purely in the pursuit of dharma, even if he lives amidst a family. He will remain a vegetarian always, and pure forever. He will always partake of amrita, and ever adore the gods and his guests. Indeed, he will be regarded as one who always subsists on vighasa, sacrificial remnants, forever devoted to the duty of hospitality, eternally full of faith, and one who invariably worships Devas and Athitis.'

Yudhishtira says, 'How is one engaged in such penance deemed as one that is daily fasting or as one that is ever devoted to the vow of brahmacharya, or as one that invariably subsists upon vighasa, or even as one that is always regardful of his guests?'

Bhishma says, 'He will be regarded as one that is always on a fast if he eats once in the day and once at night, at the fixed hours, without eating anything in the interval. With consistency of truth in his speech and a ceaseless adherence to wisdom, who approaches his wife only in her season and never at other times, such a Brahmana becomes a Brahmacharin. By never eating meat of animals not killed for sacrifice, he will be a strict vegetarian. Ever charitable he will be eternally pure, and by abstaining from sleep during the day, he will remain always alert. Know, O Yudhishtira, that the man who eats only after he has fed his servants and guests becomes an eater of ambrosia. The Brahmana who never eats until Devas and Athitis are fed wins heaven itself. He is said to subsist upon prasadam, who eats only what remains after the Devas, Pitris, Sevakas and Athitis have dined. Such men win numberless realms of heaven in the next life. To their homes come, with Brahma himself, the Devas and the apsaras. They who share their food with the Adityas and the Pitris pass their days in constant happiness with their sons and grandsons, and at last leaving off this body, attain a very high end.'

Yudhishtira says, 'In this world, O Bhaarata, deeds good and bad attach themselves to man to yield fruits for enjoyment or suffering. Is man to be regarded as their doer or is he not to be regarded so? Doubt fills my mind. I wish to hear about this in detail from you, O Pitamaha!'

Bhishma says, 'O Yudhishtira, listen to an old story of a dialogue between Prahlada and Indra. The king of the Daityas, Prahlada, was unattached to all worldly objects. His sins had been washed away. Of respectable parentage, he had great wisdom. Free from confusion and pride, ever observant of the sattva guna, and devoted to various vows, he accepted praise and blame equally. With self-restraint, he spent his time in a state of sunya. Conversant with the origin and the destruction of all created things, chala and achala, he was never angry at what displeased him and never rejoiced at the gains of what was agreeable. He knew what is supreme and what is not, among all things omniscient and omnipresent. He cast an equal eye upon gold and a clod of earth. Steadily engaged in the study of the Atman and the achievement of moksha, firm in knowledge, he arrived at fixed conclusions in respect of satya.

Once, as he sat withdrawn, with his senses subdued, Sakra approached him, and with a wish to awaken him, said these words, "O king, I see all those qualities permanently set in you by which a person wins the esteem of all. Your intellect seems to be like that of a child, free from attachment and aversion. You know the Soul. What, do you think, is the best means by which a knowledge of the Atman may be attained?

You are now bound in chains, fallen from your erstwhile position, restrained by the power of your foes, and divested of prosperity. Your present circumstances inspire grief. Yet how is it, O Prahlada, that you do not lament? Is this due, O son of Diti, to the acquisition of wisdom or is it because of your resolve? Look at your miseries, O Prahlada, and yet you seem to be happy and peaceful."

Thus urged by Indra, the lord of the Daityas replied in these sweet words of great wisdom.

Prahlada said, "He who is unacquainted with the origin and the destruction of all created things is stupefied by his ignorance. He who knows these two things is never bewildered. All kinds of entities and non-entities come into being or cease because of their own svabhava, their innate nature. No manner of individual will is required for the creation of such phenomena. In the absence, therefore, of individual will, it is evident that no achiever exists for the creation of all this that we perceive. Although in reality the Jivatman or the Chitta never does anything, yet out of ignorance, a consciousness of anger overspreads itself over it. He, who regards himself as the doer of deeds good or bad, possesses a wisdom that is corrupt. Such a one, in my judgement, is unacquainted with the truth.

If, O Sakra, the jiva were really the doer, then all actions undertaken for his own benefit would certainly be crowned with success. None of those deeds would be defeated. Among even men who strive their utmost, the suspension of the undesired and the occurrence of what is desired are not to be found. What becomes then of individual will? In the case of some, we see that without any exertion on their part, what is not desired is suspended and what is desired is accomplished. This then must be the result of svabhava. Others, again, are seen to present extraordinary aspects, for, although of superior intelligence, they have to plead for their livelihood from others who are vulgar in their ways and of little intelligence.

Indeed, when all qualities, good or bad, enter a person, fated by innate nature, what ground is there for one to boast of one's superior possessions? All these flow from svabhava. This is my undoubted conclusion. Even moksha and knowledge of self, I believe, flow from the same source. In this world all fruits, good or bad, that attach themselves to jivas, are regarded as the result of karma. I will now speak to you in depth on the subject of karma. Listen to me.

As a crow, while eating food, proclaims with its repeated cawing the presence of food to others of its species, likewise, all our actions only proclaim the indications of svabhava. He, who is acquainted with only the transformations of innate nature but not with the Atma-tattva that is supreme and exists by itself, feels bewilderment because of his ignorance. He, however, who understands the difference between Atma-tattva and her transformations, is never befuddled. All living things have their origin in Atma-tattva.

Having an assured conviction in this respect, one will never be affected by pride or arrogance. When I know what the origin is of all the laws of dharma, and when I am acquainted with the instability of all objects, it is impossible for me, O Sakra, to indulge in grief. All this is provided with an end. Without attachments, without pride, without desire and without hope, freed from all bonds, and dissociated from everything, I bide my time in great happiness, engaged as a witness to the appearance and disappearance of all created objects. For one who is wise, self-restrained, contented, without desire and hope, who beholds all things with the light of Atmagyana, no trouble or anxiety exists, O Sakra. I have no affection or aversion for either the Atman or its transformations. I do not see anyone as my enemy nor anyone as my own. I do not, O Indra, at any time crave either swarga, bhumi or Patala. It is not that there is no happiness in realising the Atman. However, as the Soul is dissociated from everything, it cannot enjoy bliss. Hence I desire nothing."

Sakra said, "Tell me the means, O Prahlada, by which this kind of wisdom may be attained and by which this kind of peace may be made one's own. I beg you."

Prahlada said, "With simplicity, with attention, with a purified Soul, with mastery over the passions, and with service to elders, O Sakra, a man succeeds in attaining moksha. Know this, however, that one acquires wisdom from the Atman, and that the acquisition of peace is also from the same source. Indeed, all that you perceive is due to the Atman."

Thus addressed by the lord of the Daityas, Indra was filled with awe, and praised these words, O king, with a joyous heart. The lord of the Trilokas then worshipped the lord of the Daityas, and took his leave to return to his own realm.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, what sort of intelligence may a king divested of prosperity and crushed by time's heavy blow adopt, in order to endure life on this earth.'

Bhishma says, 'Related to this is an old story of the conversation between Vasava and Virochana's son, Bali. One day, after Vasava had subjugated all the Asuras, he approached Brahma with folded hands, bowed to him and enquired after the whereabouts of Bali.

"Tell me, O Brahma, where I may now find the charitable Bali of boundless wealth? He was the god of wind. He was Varuna. He was Surya. He was Soma. He was Agni that used to warm all creatures. He became Apah for the use of all. I do not see him anywhere. Indeed, O Brahma, tell me where I may find Bali now. Once, he would illumine all the cardinal directions as Surya and thereafter set at dusk. Bereft of idleness, he would pour rain down upon all creatures at the proper season. I do not now see that Bali. Indeed, tell me, O Brahma, where I may find the king of the Asuras now."

Brahma said, "It is not becoming in you, O Maghavat, to enquire after Bali in this manner now. One should not, however, lie when another questions one. I will tell you the whereabouts of Bali. O lord of Sachi, Bali may now have taken his birth among camels, bulls, mules or horses, and as the best of his species, may now abide in Mahasunyata."

Sakra said, "If, O Brahma, I happen to meet Bali, should I kill him or spare him? Tell me what should I do?"

Brahma said, "Do not injure Bali, O Sakra, he does not deserve death. You should, on the other hand, seek instruction from him about dharma."

Bhishma continues, 'Thus addressed by the divine creator, Indra roamed the earth, seated astride Airavata and escorted by an entourage of great splendour. He managed to meet Bali, who, as Brahma had said, abided in Mahasunyata, embodied in the form of an ass.'

Sakra said, "You are now, O Danava, born as an ass and subsist on chaff for food. This order of birth is surely a low one. Do you or do you not grieve for it? I see what I had never seen before—you brought under the might of your enemies, divested of prosperity and friends, and shorn of energy and prowess. Once, you journeyed through the lokas with your convoy of thousands of chariots and thousands of relatives. You blazed along, and seared everybody with your radiance; and you regarded us with scant regard. The Daityas looked up to you as their protector, for they lived under your reign. Through your power, the earth would yield crops without waiting for tillage. Today, however, I see you overtaken by this dire condition. Do you or do you not grieve over this?

Time was, when, with pride reflected in your face, you would divide your vast wealth among your kinsmen, on the eastern shores of the ocean. What was the state of your mind then? When, for many years, you shone with radiance, and frolicked, while thousands of apsaras danced before you. All of them were adorned with garlands of lotuses and all had companions bright as gold. What, O lord of Danavas, was the state of your mind then and what is it now?

You had a large canopy of gold, adorned with jewels and gems. As many as forty-two thousand Gandharvas, in those days, sang and played music before you. In your sacrifices, you had a great sceptre made entirely of gold. On such occasions, you would give away millions upon millions of kine. What, O Daitya, was the state of your mind then? Once, engaged in a sacrifice, you went around the very earth, in keeping with the custom of the hurling of the samya. What was the state of your mind then? No longer do I see that golden sceptre of yours, or the canopy of gemstones, nor all your followers and admirers. I see not also, O king of the Asuras, the garland that was given to you by Brahma."

Bali said, “You see not now, O Vasava, my sceptre, canopy or any followers or admirers. Nor do you see my garland, the gift from Brahma. Those precious possessions of mine are now buried in the darkness of a cave. When my time returns, you will surely see them once again. This conduct of yours, however, does not suit your position or fame. In your prosperity, you wish to mock my misery. Those who have acquired wisdom, and received contentment from it, who are of peaceful souls, and virtuous among all creatures, never grieve in misery, nor rejoice in happiness. Led, however, by a low intelligence, you indulge in glory, O Purandara. When you become like me you will not then regale yourself with such talk.”

Bhishma says, 'Yet, laughing at Bali, who sighed like a snake, Indra said something more hurtful than before.

Sakra said, "You are now deserted by both kinsmen and friends. In view of this miserable plight that has overtaken you, do you or do you not grieve? Time was when all the worlds were under your reign and great was your joy. I ask, do you or do you not grieve now, for this fall of yours from glory and splendour?"

Bali said, "Considering all this to be transitory, and caused by the inexorable course of time, I do not, O Indra, indulge in grief. All things have an end. These bodies that creatures own, O Devaraja, are all evanescent. For this reason, Sakra, I do not grieve for this asinine form of mine. Nor is this form due to any fault of mine. The life force and the body come into existence together, because of their own nature. They grow and meet with death together. Having this form of existence now, I have not been permanently enslaved by it. Since I know this, I have no cause for sorrow. As the final resting place of all rivers is the ocean, even so the end of all embodied creatures is death. Those who know this well are never confused, O Vajradharin. Those, however, who are overwhelmed by passion and the loss of judgement, do not know this; those whose intellect is lost sink under the weight of misfortune.

A person who acquires a keen awareness succeeds in destroying all his sins. A sinless person acquires the sattva guna, and becomes joyous. They, however, that deviate from the attribute of goodness, and find repeated births, are obliged to grieve and sorrow, led on by desire and the objects of the senses. Success or its reverse, in respect of the attainment of all objects of desire, life or death, the fruits of karma that are pleasure or pain, I neither abhor nor celebrate.

When one slays another, one kills only his body. The man who thinks that it is he who kills another is himself slain. Indeed, both of them are ignorant of the truth, he who kills and he who is killed. The man, O Maghavat, who brags about his manliness after he has vanquished or killed another, should know that he is not the doer but the action of which he boasts has been accomplished by a real actor who is different. When the question arises about who is it that causes the creation and destruction of all things in the world, it is generally regarded that a man who has himself been caused or created, is the cause of creation or destruction. Know, however, that the one, who is so regarded, has himself a creator.

Earth, light, space, water and wind—from these five do all creatures emerge. When I know this much, what sorrow can I feel for this change in my condition? One who is possessed of great wisdom, one who is bereft of knowledge, one who is strong, one who is without strength, one who owns personal beauty, and one who is uncomely, one who is fortunate and one who is unfortunate, are all swept away by Kaala. When I know that I have been vanquished by time, what sorrow can I feel for this change in my circumstances?

One who burns anything burns a thing that has been already burnt. One who kills, only slays a victim already slain. One who is destroyed has been already destroyed. A thing acquired by a person is that which has already arrived and intended for his acquisition. Time is like an ocean. There is no island in it. Where, indeed, is its other shore? Its boundary cannot be seen. Even upon profound deliberation, I do not foresee the end of this continuous stream that is the great ordainer of all things and is certainly divine. If I did not understand that it is Kaala that destroys all creatures, then, perhaps, I would have felt the emotions of joy, pride and wrath, O Sachindra. Tell me, have you come here to belittle me, now that you have ascertained that I bear the form of an ass that survives on chaff and passes his days in a lonely place remote from the habitations of men? If I wish, O Indra, even now I can assume various awful forms, seeing any of which you would beat a hasty retreat from my presence.

It is time that gives everything and again takes away everything. It is time that ordains all things. Do not, O Sakra, brag about your manliness. In days of yore, Purandara, at my wrath everything used to tremble. However, I am acquainted with the eternal attributes of all things in the world. Do you also know the truth? Do not suffer yourself to be filled with wonder. Affluence and its origin are not under one's control. Your mind seems to be like that of a child. It is the same as it was before. Open your eyes, O Maghavat, and adopt an understanding established on faith and truth. The Devas, Manushyas, Pitris, Gandharvas, Nagas and the Rakshasas, were all under my reign in days gone by. You know this, O Vasava. Their intellects stupefied by ignorance, all creatures used to flatter me, saying, 'Salutations to the cardinal place where Virochana's son Bali may now abide!'

O lord of Sachi, I do not at all grieve when I think of the honour that is no longer paid to me. I feel no sorrow for this fall of mine. My belief is firm that I will live obedient to the will and puissance of the Great Ordainer.

We see that one of noble birth, handsome and awarded with great prowess, lives in misery amidst his advisers and friends. This happens because it has been ordained to be so. Similarly, someone born in a humble vamsa, devoid of knowledge, with even a stain on his birth, is seen, O Sakra, to live in happiness amidst his fellow men. This, too, occurs because it has been so ordained. An auspicious and beautiful woman, O Sakra, is seen to pass her life in sorrow, while an unseemly woman with every inauspicious mark, is seen to pass her days in great happiness.

That we have now become so is not due to any deeds of ours, O Sakra. That you are now so is not due, O wielder of the thunderbolt, to anything you have done. No, you have nothing, O you of hundred sacrifices, because of which you now enjoy this affluence. Nor have I done anything by which I am presently divested of affluence. Affluence and dearth come one after another. I now see you ablaze with splendour, endued with prosperity, possessed of beauty, placed at the head of all the Devas, as you roar at me. This would never be but for the fact of time having ruined me. Indeed, if time had not turned against me I would have killed you today with just a blow of my fist even though you are armed with the vajra. But this is not the time for me to exercise my prowess. On the other hand, it is the time to adopt peace and calmness.

Kaala establishes all things. Time works upon all things and leads them to their final realisation. I was the worshipped lord of the Danavas.

Burning down everything in my way with my tejas, I would roar in pride. When Kaala has ruined even me, who is there whom he will not ruin? Earlier, O king of the Adityas, singly I endured the urjas of all the twelve Adityas with yourself amongst them. I used to vaporise water and then shower it down as rain. I would give both light and heat unto the three worlds. It was I that protected and it was I that would destroy. It was I that gave and it was I that took. It was I that used to bind and it was I that would set free.

In all the worlds, I was the one powerful master. The sovereign reign that I had, O king of the Devas, is no more. I am now ruined by the forces of time. Those things of old are no longer seen to shine in me. I am not the doer of actions that are apparently done by me. You are not the doer of your actions. None, O lord of Sachi, is the doer. It is Kaala, O Sakra, that protects or destroys all things.

Those who know the Vedas say that Kaala is Brahman. The fortnights and months are his body, which is invested with days and nights as its garments. The seasons are his senses. The year is his mouth. Some individuals of superior intelligence say that all this, the entire universe, should be conceived as being Brahman. The Vedas, however, teach that the five sheaths that cover the Soul should be regarded as Brahman. Brahman is like a vast ocean, deep and inaccessible. It has neither beginning nor end, and it is both immortal and mortal; it is the final mystery. Though it is nirguna, without attributes by itself, yet it enters all things that exist and so assumes the gunas, becoming saguna.

Men who know the truth regard Brahman as eternal. Through ignorance, Brahman causes the delusions of samsara to infuse the Atman, which is immaterial spirit with only pure knowledge for its single attribute. Samsara is not the essential quality of the Atman, for upon the dawning of knowledge of the true cause of everything, the very universe ceases to exist for the Soul.

Brahman in the form of Kaala is the refuge of all creatures. Where would you go transcending time? Time or Brahman cannot be avoided by running nor by remaining still; it flows on inexorably. All the five senses are incompetent to perceive Brahman. Some have said that Brahman is Prajapati; some say he is fire; some call him the seasons; some say he is the month; some call him the fortnight; some declare he is the days; some claim he is the hours; some state he is the morning; some say he is the noon; some that he is the evening; and some declare he is the present moment. Thus diverse people speak diversely of Him who is One and singular.

Know that he is eternity, under whose reign all things exist. Many thousands of Indras have passed away, O Vasava, each of whom was possessed of great strength and prowess. You also, O lord of Sachi, will have to pass in the same manner. You, too, O Indra, who possess swelling might and are the monarch of the Adityas, when your hour comes, all-powerful Kaala will extinguish you. Time sweeps away all things. So, O Indra, do not boast and do not gloat. Time cannot be stilled by either you or me, nor by our ancestors. The regal prosperity that you have attained, which you think is beyond comparison, I once had. It is unsubstantial and unreal. Lakshmi does not dwell long in one place. Indeed, she had graced thousands of Indras before you, all of whom, again, were very superior to you. Restless as she is, deserting me she has now approached you, king of the Adityas. Do not, Sakra, be boastful again. It befits you to remain calm. Knowing you to be full of vanity, Sri will very soon desert you."

Bhishma says, 'Thereafter, Sakra saw the Devi Lakshmi in her own embodied form that blazed in splendour issue out of the form of the venerable Bali. When the Deva saw the goddess in her fiery radiance, he addressed Bali in these words, with eyes agape in wonder.

Sakra said, "Ah! Who is this one, O Bali, resplendent with such opulence, with wondrous plumes of light over her head, adorned with golden bracelets on her arms, who exudes a halo of glory on all sides with her tejas? Who is she that issues out of your body?"

Bali said, "I know not whether she is an Asuri, an apsara or a Manavi. You may ask her yourself."

Indra said, "O you of sweet smiles, who are you that have such blinding radiance, and adorned with brilliant plumes of light, emerge from the body of Bali? I do not know you. O tell me your name. Who, indeed, are you that stands here as Maya herself, afire with your own splendour, after deserting the lord of the Daityas? O, tell me this!"

Sree said, "Virochana did not know me. His son Bali also knows me not. The learned called me Duhsaha, the unbearable. Some knew me by the name of Vidhitsa. I have other names too, O Vasava: Bhuti, Lakshmi and Sree. You know me not, O Sakra, nor do any among the Adityas know me."

Sakra said, "O auspicious Devi, why do you forsake Bali now, after you have abided in him for such a long time? Is it because of any actions of mine or is it due to anything that Bali has done?"

Sree said, "Neither the creator nor the ordainer rules me. It is time that moves me from one place to another. Do not, O Sakra, mock Bali."

Sakra said, "For what reason, O goddess adorned with refulgent plumes, do you desert Bali? Why also do you grace me? Tell me this, O you of sweet smiles."

Sree said, "I live in truth, in gifts, good vows, penances, prowess and in virtue. Bali fell from all these. Once, he was devoted to the Brahmanas. He was truthful and had controlled his passions. Lately, however, he began to cherish feelings of animosity towards the Brahmanas and handled ghrita with soiled hands. Once, he was always engaged in the performance of sacrifices. At last, blinded by ignorance and changed by time, he began to boast before one and all that his attachment towards me was endless. For these faults do I leave him and henceforth, O Sakra, I will dwell in you. You should bear me without neglect, with penances and valour."

Sakra said, "O you that lives amid lotuses, there is not a single one among Devas, Manavas and Pashus that can bear you forever."

Sree said, "Truly, O Purandara, there is none among Devas, Gandharvas, Asuras or Rakshasas that can bear me eternally."

Sakra said, "O benevolent Devi, tell me how I should conduct myself so that you may always abide in me. I will obey your command. It befits you to answer me truly."

Sree said, "O lord of the Adityas, I will tell you how you may enable me to abide in you always. Divide me into four parts according to the law laid down in the Vedas."

Sakra said, "I will assign the habitations according to their strength and power to bear you. As for myself, I will always take care, O Lakshmi, that I do not offend you in any way. Amongst men, the earth will bear a fourth part of yourself. I think she has the strength for that."

Sree said, "Here, I grant one quarter amsa of myself. Let it be established on Bhumi. Do you now find a home, O Sakra, for my second quarter."

Sakra said, "The waters perform various services to humans. Let the waters bear a fourth part of your person. They have the endurance to bear a portion of you."

Sree said, "I grant another quarter of mine that is to be established in Apah. Now, O Sakra, assign a proper abode to my third quarter."

Sakra said, “The Vedas, the Yagnas and the Devas are all established in Agni. He will bear your third quarter.”

Sree said, “I give my third quarter to be founded in Agni. Do you, O Sakra, now assign a proper dwelling for my last quarter.”

Sakra said, “They that are good among men, devoted to Brahmanas, and truthful in speech, may bear your fourth quarter. The good have the power to bear you.”

Sree said, “I give my fourth quarter to be placed among the good. My amsas thus assigned to different creations, do you, Indra, continue to protect me.”

Sakra said, “I have distributed you equally among different creations. Those that will offend you will be chastised by me.”

The king of the Daityas, Bali, forsaken by Sree, then said these words: “At present the sun shines as much in the east as in the west, and as much in the north as in the south. When, however, the sun withdraws himself from all sides and shines only upon the realm of Brahman situated in the heart of Sumeru, then will there be another great Devasura yuddha, a war between the Devas and the Asuras, and in that contention I will vanquish all of you.”

Sakra said, “Brahma has commanded never to kill you. It is for this reason, O Bali, that I do not cast my vajra at your head. Go wherever you wish, O lord of the Daityas. O great Asura, peace be upon you. The time will never come when the sun will shine from only the meridian. Brahma has already established the laws that regulate the sun’s motion. Giving light and heat to all creatures, he journeys ceaselessly. For six months, he travels in a northward course and for the other six in a southward direction. The sun travels these paths one after another, creating winter and summer for all creatures.”

Thus addressed by Indra, O Bhaarata, Bali went towards the south. Purandara travelled towards the north. The thousand-eyed Indra, who heard Bali speak with such humility, then flew up into the skies.’

Bhishma says, ‘Yudhishtira, on this subject there is also an ancient story of the conversation between him of a hundred sacrifices and the Asura Namuchi. When Namuchi was seated bereft of prosperity but untroubled at heart, like the vast ocean in perfect stillness, Purandara said to him, “Fallen from your place, bound with ropes, brought under the rule of your enemies, and divested of prosperity, do you, O Namuchi, grieve or pass your days cheerfully?”

Namuchi answered, “By indulging in such sorrow as cannot be averted one only wastes one’s body and gladdens one’s foes. Then, again, no one can lighten another’s sorrow by taking any portion of it upon himself. For these reasons, O Sakra, I do not indulge in sorrow. All this that you see has but one end. Indulgence in sorrow destroys personal grace, prosperity and life, and virtue itself, O lord of the Devas. Doubtlessly, the wise should suppress the sorrow one experiences born of an improper attitude of mind and deliberate on that which yields the highest good, that which dwells in the heart. When one fixes one’s mind in this manner, verily, the result is that one’s objects are all accomplished.

There is one Ordainer, and no second. His control extends over the being that lies within the form. Controlled by the great Ordainer, I journey by his will like water that runs along a downward path. I know what is self and what is moksha, and as I am also aware that liberation is superior to the jiva. I do not, however, strive for mukti. My actions that tend towards virtue or even towards vice, I do by His will.

One acquires things that are destined to be had. That which is to happen will happen. One must repeatedly endure such forms in which the Ordainer places one. There is no choice in the matter. He is never dismayed who, when he finds himself in any particular condition, accepts it as his destiny. Men are affected by pleasure and pain that come by turns in the course of time. There is no individual achievement in the matter of pleasure or pain to anyone. In this lies the misery: that he who abhors sorrow regards himself as the doer.

Amongst Rishis, Devas, Asuras, sannyasins and men who fully know the three Vedas, who is there whom anguish does not approach? Those, however, that are aware of the Atman and that which is anatman never fear sorrow. The wise one, steadfast like Himavat, never gives way to wrath, never suffers himself to be attached to the objects of the senses, never languishes in sorrow or rejoices in happiness. When overwhelmed by even great afflictions, such a one never gives way to grief. Indeed, he is a very superior man whom even great success cannot gladden, nor dire calamities afflict, who bears pleasure and pain, and that which is between them both, dispassionately. Into whatever state a man may fall, he should summon cheerfulness without yielding to sorrow. Surely, even so should one dispel one's mental grief, which if not dispelled is sure to fetch pain.

A conclave of sages engaged in the debate on dharma based upon the srutis and the smritis is not a goodly assembly; indeed, it does not deserve to be called an assembly of the wise, if upon entering it an evil man is not impaled by fear. Such a man is the best of his species who has delved into, enquired after dharma, and thereby gained success in behaving according to the conclusions to which he arrives. The actions of a wise man are not easily understood. A sage is never dismayed when calamities come upon him. Even if he falls from his position like Gautama in his dotage, he does not permit himself to be dismayed.

Through incantations, strength, energy, wisdom, prowess, conduct or the affluence of wealth—through any of these, can a person acquire that which has not been destined to become his? What sorrow then is there for not receiving that upon which one has set one's heart?

Before I was born, the powers that be had ordained what I am to do and to suffer. I only fulfil what was ordained for me. What then can death do to me? One receives only what has been destined to become one's own. One goes where one was always meant to go. The sorrows and joys one draws for oneself are those that were always fated to be. He who knows this fully does not allow himself to be dismayed, and he who is contented under both happiness and sorrow is regarded as the most excellent of his species."

Yudhishtira says, 'What, indeed, O monarch, is good for a man foundering in dire straits, when he has lost friends or his kingdom? In this world, O bull of Bharata's vamsa, you are the best of our gurus. So do I ask you this. It befits you to answer my question.'

Bhishma says, 'For one that has lost sons, wives, wealth and pleasures of every kind, and finds himself in dire straits—courage, viryata, is the highest good. Of the brave, the body is never weak. The refusal to indulge grief bears happiness within it, and health. A healthy body also helps acquire prosperity. The wise man, O sire, who stays with dharma, even when in distress, acquires prosperity, patience and perseverance; and achieves all his objectives. Yudhishtira, listen further to the ancient tale of the conversation between Bali and Vasava.

After the battle between the Devas and the Asuras, in which a large number of Daityas and Danavas fell, had ended, Bali became king. He was then deceived by Vishnu who once more established his reign over all the worlds. Indra of a hundred sacrifices was once more invested with the sovereignty of the Devas. After the rule of the Devas was re-established, and the four asramas of men restored, the three worlds once more swelled with prosperity, and the self-born became glad at heart. At that time, accompanied by the Rudras, Vasus, Adityas, Aswins, Devarishis, Gandharvas, Siddhas and other superior orders of beings, the mighty Indra, seated in splendour astride Airavata, his four-tusked prince of elephants, ranged through all the worlds.

On one of his journeys, the wielder of the thunderbolt saw Bali within a mountain cave on the seashore, and he approached the prince of the Danavas. Although he saw the king of the Devas seated on the back of Airavata, surrounded by all the celestial ones, Bali showed no signs of sorrow or agitation. Indra also, noted that Bali remain unmoved and fearless. He addressed Bali from the back of his awesome elephant, and said, "How is it, O Daitya, that you are so calm? Is it because of your heroism or because you have waited with reverence upon your elders? Is it due to your mind that you have purified through tapasya? To whatever cause it may be due, this serenity is surely difficult to attain. Cast down from a position that was highest, you are now deprived of all your possessions, and brought under the sway of your foes. O son of Virochana, what is that which you have access to by which you do not grieve, although there is occasion for grief?

Once, when you ruled your own empire, unrivalled pleasures were yours. Now you are stripped of all your wealth and your supremacy. Tell us why you are so unmoved. You were before this, a very god, seated on the throne of your sire and grandsires. Even though you now find yourself stripped bare of all felicity by your enemies, why do you not grieve? You are bound in Varuna's noose and have been struck by my vajra. Your wives have been taken away from you, and your wealth too. Tell us why you do not grieve. Bereft of every prosperity and affluence, you do not grieve. This is indeed remarkable. Who else, O Mahabali, but you, could bear the burden of existence after being shorn of the sovereignty of the three worlds?"

Calmly hearing these and other cutting words from Indra, as he asserted his superiority over him, Bali fearlessly answered his questioner.

Bali said, "When calamity has already struck me, O Indra, what do you gain by your bluster now? Today I see you, O Purandara, stand before me with the thunderbolt raised in your hand. Once, however, you could not do this; now you have gained that power. Indeed, who other than you could utter such cruel words? He who, though able to punish, shows compassion towards a heroic foe vanquished and brought under his control, is truly a superior one. When two persons fight, victory in battle is uncertain. One of the two becomes victorious, and the other is vanquished.

O lord of the Devas, let this not be your demeanour. Do not imagine that you have become the sovereign of all creatures because you have conquered all with your might and prowess. That I have become so is not, O Sakra, the result of any deed of mine. That you have become so, O Vajradharin, is not the result of any action of yours. What I am now you will be in the future. Do not slight me, thinking that you have achieved an exceedingly difficult feat. A person obtains joy and sorrow, one following the other, in the course of time. You, Indra, have gained sovereignty over the universe because of time and not from any special merit in you. It is Kaala that leads me also on in his course. That very Kaala leads you as well. It is for this that I am not in your place today, and you are not in mine.

Dutiful services rendered to parents, reverential worship of Devas, due practice of any good quality, none of these can confer felicity or happiness on anyone. Neither knowledge nor penances, gifts or friends, or kinsmen can help one that is marked and tormented by time. Men are impotent to avert, by even a thousand means, an impending disaster. Intelligence and strength are useless against time. There is no rescuer of men that are plagued by Kaala's course.

That you, O Sakra, regarded yourself as the doer lies at the root of all sorrow. If the ostensible doer of an action were the real performer thereof, that doer then would not himself be the work of someone else, the Supreme Being. So, because the supposed doer is himself the creation of another, that other is the Brahman above whom there is nothing higher. With the help of time, I once vanquished you. Likewise, time has helped you vanquish me. Kaala is the mover of all animated beings. Kaala destroys all beings.

Indra, because your intelligence is unrefined you do not see how destruction inevitably awaits all things. Some, indeed, regard you highly, as one that has gained sovereignty of the universe. For all that, how can I who know the course of the world indulge in grief because I have been felled by time? How can I suffer my intellect to be overwhelmed, or succumb to the influence of grave error? Even when brought down by time, subjected to a calamity, how can my mind suffer itself to be destroyed like a wrecked vessel at sea? You, I, and all those who will in future become the lords of the Devas, shall have to go the way along which hundreds of Indras have gone before you. As it has destroyed me, when your hour matures, time will surely destroy you, who are now so invincible, and shine with unrivalled splendour. In Kaala's wake, many thousands of Indras and Adityas have been swept tracelessly away, yuga after yuga. Time, indeed, is irresistible.

Now that you have arrived at your present position, you regard yourself highly, why, even as the creator of all beings, the divine and eternal Brahma. Many before you had attained this position of yours. With none did it prove stable or eternal. Due, albeit, to a foolish intellect, you alone regard it to be immutable and immortal. You trust in that which does not deserve to be trusted. You deem that eternal which is not permanent. O king of the Devas, it is he that is stupefied by Kaala that regards himself in this manner.

Foolishly, you regard your present regal prosperity to be yours. Know that it is never stable for you, any others or me. It belonged to innumerable great ones before you. Moving on, it has now become yours. It will stay with you, O Vasava, for some time and then prove its evanescence. As a cow abandons one drinking trough for another, fortune will surely desert you for someone else. So many sovereigns have gone before you that I will not venture to enumerate them.

In the future also, Purandara, countless sovereigns will rise after you. I do not see those rulers now that once enjoyed this earth with her trees, plants, jewels, living creatures, waters and mines. Prithu, Aila, Maya, Bhima, Naraka, Sambara, Aswagriva, Puloman, Swarbhanu, Prahlada, Namuchi, Daksha, Viprachitti, Virochana, Hrinisheva, Suhotra, Bhurihan, Pushavat, Vrisha, Satyepshu, Rishabha, Bahu, Kapilaswa, Virupaka, Vana, Kartaswara, Vahni, Viswadanshtra, Nairiti, Sankocha, Varitaksha, Varaha, Aswa, Ruchiprabha, Viswajit, Pratirupa, Vrishanda, Vishkara, Madhu, Hiranyakasipu, the Danava Kaitabha and many others that were Daityas, Danavas and Rakshasas, all these and many more unnamed, from remote and lost ages, great Daityas and extraordinary Danavas, whose names we have heard, as well as many excellent Daityas of earlier times, have departed, leaving this earth. All of them were vanquished by time. Kaala proved stronger than all of them.

They all worshipped the creator with hundreds of sacrifices. You are not the only one to do so. All of them were devoted to dharma and always performed great mahayagnas. Each one was able to range through the skies, and were heroes that never shrank from battle. Endowed with mighty physiques, they had arms that resembled heavy clubs. All of them were masters of hundreds of illusions, and could assume any form they wished. We have never heard that any of them ever sustained a defeat in battle.

All were firm observers of the vow of truth, and all of them revelled as they wished. Devoted to the Vedas and Vedic rites, all of them possessed great wisdom. Invested with great prowess, all of them had acquired the highest prosperity and affluence. Still none of these high-Souled monarchs had the least tinge of pride of their sovereignty. They were all liberal, giving unto each what he deserved. All of them behaved kindly and justly towards all creatures.

They were the progeny of Daksha's daughters. Gifted with great strength, all of them were lords of creation. Each sparkled with such splendour that they illuminated everything around with their tejas. Alas, Kaala swept each of them away.

As for you, O Sakra, it is evident that after you have enjoyed your stay on the earth, when it is time for you to finally leave her, you will not be able to contain your grief. Shed this desire that you cherish for objects of affection and enjoyment. Shed this pride that is born of prosperity. If you do so, you will be able to bear the grief that attends the loss of sovereignty. When the hour of sorrow comes, do not yield to anguish. Likewise, at the hour of joy, do not rejoice. Disregard both past and future, and live contentedly with the present. If sleepless time did confront me, who have always been heedful of my duties, then, take heed and awaken, O Indra, and turn your heart to the ways of peace, for the same Kaala will very soon confront you.

You wound me with your words, and seem bent upon terrorising me. Finding me calm, you still regard yourself highly. Time first attacked me; it is even now stalking you. Kaala first vanquished me, and so were you able to defeat me, yet now you roar in hubris for what you did not yourself accomplish. Once, when I would become wrathful, what man on earth could stand up to me in battle? Time, however, is stronger. He has conquered me. It is for this reason, Vasava, that you are able to stand before me today.

The thousand celestial years, which are the measure of your reign, will end. You will fall then and your limbs will become as lustreless and miserable as mine are now, even though I am possessed of mighty tejas. I have fallen from the high place that belongs to the sovereign of the three worlds. You are now Indra in heaven. In this delightful world of living beings, because of Kaala's course, you are now an object of universal adoration. Can you say by dint of which achievement of yours you have become Indra today and due to what means I have fallen from the position that was mine? Time is the one creator and destroyer. Nothing else is a cause in the universe of any effect. Decline, fall, sovereignty, happiness, misery, birth and death—when a wise man encounters any of these, he neither rejoices nor indulges in sorrow. You, O Indra, know me. I also, O Vasava, know you. Why then do you boast before me in this fashion? Why do you forget, shameless one, that it is Kaala that has made you what you are today?

You have seen my valour in those days. The energy and might that I displayed in my battles are enough proof of my heroism. The Adityas, the Rudras, the Sadhyas, the Vasus and the Maruts, O lord of Sachi, I vanquished them all. You know it well, Sakra, that in the Great War between the Devas and the Asuras, how swiftly I routed all the assembled Devas with the fury of my assault. Mountains with their forests and denizens, I repeatedly hurled at your forces. Many were the mountain peaks with craggy edges that I broke on your head. Yet, now, what can I do? Time cannot be resisted. If this were not so, do not think that I would not have killed you, despite your vajra, with just one blow of my fist?

This present time, however, is not in my favour for the display of my prowess. The hour is such that I should adopt patience and tolerance of everything. Therefore, Sakra, do I tolerate your insolence. Know, however, that I am even less tolerant of insolence than you. Realise, that you boast before one who is surrounded by time's inferno and bound fast in Kaala's shackles. Look, there stands the dark one who cannot be resisted by the world. Of fierce form, he stands there, having restrained me like a dog bound in chains.

Gain and loss, happiness and sorrow, lust and anger, birth and death, captivity and release, all these one encounters in the course of time. Neither am I the doer nor are you. He is the doer who, indeed, is omnipotent. Time ripens me to be plucked like a fruit from a tree. One man finds happiness by some deeds. However, the very same deeds bring misery to another, all in the course of time. Versed as I am with the virtues of Kaala, it does not befit me to indulge in grief when it is Kaala that has ruined me. Therefore, Sakra, I do not grieve. Grief cannot do us any good. Mourning over it never dispels one's dire condition. On the other hand, it destroys one's power. Hence, I do not grieve."

Thus addressed by the lord of the Daityas, He of a hundred sacrifices, the mighty and thousand-eyed chastiser of Paka, restrained his wrath and spoke calmly to Bali.

Sakra said, "Behold this upraised arm of mine, with the vajra, and the paasas of Varuna. Who is there that would not be afraid, including Yama himself who brings death to all beings? Your mind, however, so firm and so empowered with the vision of the truth, is not in the least disturbed. O you of invincible prowess, verily, you are unmoved today because of your fortitude.

When everything in this universe is seen to be fleeting, who would venture to repose confidence in either his body or the objects of his desires? Like yourself I, too, know that this universe is transient, and that it has been thrown into Kaala's invisible dreadful fire that burns endlessly. Everyone here is accosted by time. None among subtle or gross beings enjoys immunity from time's might. Everything simmers in Kaala's cauldron. Kaala has no master. It is ever watchful and always astir within itself. No one who has entered the realm of time can escape it. All embodied beings may pay no heed to it, but Kaala is ever vigilant as it stalks them. No one has ever averted time. Ancient, eternal and the embodiment of justice, time is uniform towards all living creatures. Kaala cannot be avoided, and there is no revering its course.

As a banker tallies his interest, time sums up its subtle divisions represented by kaalas, lavas, kashtas, kshanas, masas, divasas and ratras. Just as the current of a river washes away a tree whose roots it has reached, Kaala hunts and sweeps away him, who says, 'This I will do today, but this other task I will do tomorrow'. Time whisks us away and men exclaim, 'I saw him just a while ago. How did he die?' Wealth, comforts, rank, prosperity, all fall prey to Kaala who approaches every living creature and snatches his life away.

All things that proudly raise their heads high are destined to fall. That which exists is only an illusory form of the non-existent. Everything is transitory and unstable. Such conviction is, however, difficult to arrive at. Your intellect, so firm and endued with true vision, is unmoved. You do not, even mentally, realise what you were but some time ago. Time assails the universe, reshapes it within itself and sweeps away everything without consideration for age. Yet, one who is hauled along by time is unaware of the noose thrown round his neck. Those given to jealousy, vanity, greed, lust, wrath, fear, desire, impulsiveness and pride, allow themselves to be traumatised by time. You, however, know the truth of existence. You are knowledgeable and empowered with wisdom and penance. You see time as clearly, as if it were an amla berry lying on the palm of your hand.

O son of Virochana, well versed are you with Kaala's conduct. You are adept in all the branches of knowledge. You have a purified soul and are a thorough master of your being. You are, for this, an object of affection with wise men. With your intelligence, you have fully comprehended the whole universe. Though you have enjoyed every kind of happiness, you remain unattached, and hence you have not been stained by anything. The gunas of passion and darkness do not tarnish you for you have conquered your senses. You rest only in your Atman, which is without both joy and sorrow. A friend to all creatures, without animosity, with your heart set upon peace, seeing you as you are, my heart turns merciful towards you. I do not wish to afflict an enlightened one like you with enslavement. Ahimsa is the highest dharma. I feel sympathy for you. These coils of Varuna, with which you have been bound, will loosen in due course from the misconduct of men. Blessed be you, O great Asura!

When the daughter-in-law will set the aged mother-in-law to work, when the son, through delusion, will command the father to work for him, when Sudras will have their feet washed by Brahmanas and fearlessly have sexual congress with women of twice-born families, when men will discharge their vital seed into forbidden wombs, when the refuse of houses will begin to be carried upon plates and vessels made of white brass, and when sacrificial offerings intended for the Devas will be carried upon forbidden platters, when the four asramas will transgress all limits, then these bonds of yours will begin to loosen, one by one. From me you need have no fear. Be at peace. Be happy. Be without sorrow. Let your heart be cheerful. Let no illness befall you."

With these words, Indra mounted Airavata, that prince of all elephants, and rode on.

With his conquest of the Asuras, the king of the Devas rejoiced and became the sole sovereign of all the Lokas. The Maharishis sang praises of the lord of all mobile and unmoving creatures. Agni once more began to bear the offerings of clarified butter poured into his visible form, and the great Devendra took charge of the Amrita that was committed into his care. His praises sung by the best of Brahmanas engaged in sacrifices, the lord Indra, ablaze with splendour, his wrath pacified, and his heart appeased, became joyous as he returned to his swarga to pass his days in untold happiness.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, the signs of the future greatness and the imminent downfall in a man.'

Bhishma says, 'The mind itself, blessed be you, indicates the fateful signs of one's future prosperity and subsequent fall. In this regard is an ancient tale of the conversation between Sree and Sakra. Listen to it, O Yudhishtira.

Maharishi Narada, of tejas as immeasurable as Brahman itself, bereft of sins, adept at seeing through the prosperity of his tapasya in both this and the other world, a peer of the Devarishis in Brahmaloka, roved as he pleased through the Trilokas. Once, at dawn, he wished to perform his ablutions, so he went to the Ganga river as she flowed through the Dhruva valley and he plunged into the stream. At the time, Indra too arrived at the very bank where Narada bathed. The Maharishi and the Deva finished their ablutions, completed their silent japas, and sat down to pass the hour as they recited and listened to the excellent stories narrated by the Devarishis, which describe many good and lofty deeds. Indeed, they sat with rapt attention, engaged in a pleasant discourse on ancient history.

While so engaged they saw the advent of the thousand rays of the sun as he rose. Once the fiery orb was in full view, both of them stood up and sang his praises. Suddenly, in a direction opposite to that of the rising star, they witnessed a resplendent object; it appeared to be a second star! They stood by, O Bhaarata, and watched as the magnificent object gradually approached them. Astride Vishnu's chariot adorned with Garuda and Surya himself, the presence blazed forth with unrivalled splendour, and seemed to illumine the three worlds. The entity they saw was none other than the Devi Sree herself, attended by many apsaras of great beauty. Indeed, she resembled a large sun herself, her effulgence like that of fire. Embellished with ornaments that looked like veritable stars, she wore a garland of pearls.

Indra watched Goddess Padma as she alighted from her magnificent chariot, and approached the lord of the Trilokas and the celestial Rishi Narada. Followed by Narada, Maghavat also went towards her. With folded hands, he offered himself up to her, and worshipped her with unsurpassed reverence and sincerity. The adorations over, the king of the Devas addressed Sree.

Sakra said, "O you of sweet smiles, who are you, and what brings you here? O you of fair brows, from where do you come and where will you proceed, O auspicious Devi?"

Sree said, "In the three worlds full of felicitous seeds, all creatures, mobile and unmoving, strive with their whole hearts to be with me. I am Padma, I am Sree graced with lotuses, who emerged from the lotus that blooms at the touch of Surya's rays for the prosperity of all creatures. I am called Lakshmi, Bhuti and Sree, O slayer of Bala. I am Swaha, I am Swadha. I am Bhakti, I am Buddhi, I am Samriddhi, I am Jaya and I am Akshara. I am Kshama, I am Vijaya, I am Lakshmi. I am sraddha, I am bhagya, and I am smriti.

I dwell at the forefront of armies and on the standards of victorious, virtuous sovereigns, as in their homes, cities and dominions. I always reside, O vanquisher of Bala, with superior men, heroes breathless for victory and ambitious in battle. I also reside forever with those firmly attached to virtue, gifted with great intelligence, devoted to Brahma, truthful in speech, possessed of humility and generous. Once, I lived with the Asuras because by nature I am bound to truth and merit. But I see how the Asuras have assumed adverse traits, and so I have left them and wish to dwell in you."

Sakra said, "O you of fair face, from what conduct of the Asuras did you live with them? What did you see there that made you desert the Daityas and the Danavas, and come here?"

Sree said, "I attach myself steadfastly to those that are devoted to the duties of svadharma, to those that never lose patience, to those that take pleasure in treading the path that leads to swarga. I always dwell with those that are distinguished for their generosity, for their study of the scriptures, for sacrifices and other scriptural rites, and for their worship of Pitris, Devas, Gurus, Agrajas, Sresthas and Atithis.

Once, the Danavas kept their dwellings clean, their women under control, poured havis on the sacrificial fire, waited dutifully on their gurus, restrained their passions, were obedient to the Brahmanas, and truthful in their speech. They were full of faith; they kept their anger under control; they practiced the virtue of charity; they never envied others; they looked after their friends, advisers and spouses; they were never envious. In those days, they never assaulted one another in anger. They were all contented and never felt pain at the sight of other people's affluence and prosperity. They were all charitable and never wasteful, of honourable conduct and gifted with compassion. They were excessively inclined to grace, possessed simplicity of behaviour and steadfastness in faith, and had their passions under perfect control. They kept their servants and counsellors contented. They were grateful and gifted with sweet speech. They served everyone in accord with his position and merit.

They were endowed with self-reproach. They were of rigid vows. They would perform their ablutions on every sacred day. They smeared themselves properly with perfumes and favourable pastes. They also adorned their persons appropriately. They were observant of fasts and penances, were trustful, and chanters of Vedic hymns. The sun never rose over them while they lay asleep. They never out-slept the moon. They always abstained from eating curd and pounded barley. Each morning they looked at ghrita and other auspicious things, and with senses withdrawn, they would recite the Vedas and worship Brahmanas with dakshina.

Their speech was always virtuous, and they never accepted gifts. Regularly they went to sleep by midnight and never slept during the day. They invariably took pleasure in showing compassion for the distressed, the helpless, the aged, the weak, the sick and women. They enjoyed all their possessions by sharing these with them. They would constantly pacify and comfort the agitated, the cheerless, the anxious, the terrified, the diseased, the weak, the starved, the robbed and the afflicted. They followed the dictates of dharma and never injured one another. They were ready and well disposed towards action of every kind.

They would serve and wait with reverence upon elders and the aged. They duly worshipped the Pitris, the Devas and Athitis, and ate their leftovers after gratifying them. They were firmly devoted to truth and penances. None amongst them ate singly, nor had congress with the wives of others. As for compassion, they behaved towards all creatures as towards their own selves. They never allowed the emission of the vital seed into empty space, into inferior animals, into forbidden wombs or on sacred days.

They were ever distinguished by the gifts they made, cleverness, simplicity, optimism, humility, friendliness and forgiveness. Moreover, O mighty one, traits such as truth, charity, penance, purity, compassion, soft speech and goodwill towards friends always inhered in them. Torpor, procrastination, fretfulness, envy, want of foresight, discontent, melancholy and greed never assailed them. Because the Danavas were distinguished for these sterling qualities, I stayed with them from the advent of creation, for many yugas together, for they are the first-born race of creation.

Times changed, and brought change to the character of the Danavas. I saw virtue and morality desert them and they came under the sway of lust and anger. Though themselves inferior in attainments, they began to cherish animosity towards elders and superiors, and while the elders with virtue and merit, discoursed on appropriate subjects in the midst of assemblies, the unworthy began to ridicule or even laugh at them. When revered elders entered, the younger men, seated at their ease, refused to adore the old ones by rising and saluting them with respect. In the presence of fathers, sons began to exercise power in matters that concerned the fathers alone. Those from a higher vamsa accepted employment with those from a lower clan, and proudly proclaimed the fact. Individuals that amassed great wealth with unrighteous deeds came to be held in esteem.

At nightfall, the Danavas would celebrate with loud cries and screams. Their sacrificial fires no longer blazed with bright and heavenward flames. Sons began to rule over fathers, and wives dominated husbands. Mothers, fathers, elders, teachers, guests and guides ceased to command respect. Their people no longer raised their children with affection and even deserted them. Without giving alms, nor reserving the fixed portion to offer the Devas, everyone ate as he pleased. Indeed, without tendering their wares to the Devas in sacrifices and without sharing them with the Pitris, Atithis and Agrajas, they shamelessly appropriated them for their own use.

Their cooks no longer professed any consideration for purity of mind, deed and word. They ate what had been left uncovered. Their corn lay scattered in the yards, exposed to crows and rats. Their milk remained uncovered, and they began to touch ghrita after eating with unwashed hands. Their spades, kitchen knives, baskets, dishes, cups and other utensils began to lie scattered in their homes. Housewives no more looked after these. They no longer attended to the repairs of their houses and walls. They tethered their animals and did not give them food and drink. They ignored children who only looked on, and without concern to feed their dependants, the Danavas ate what they had. They prepared payasa, krisara, dishes of meat, cakes and sashkuli, not for Devas and Atithis, but for themselves, and began to eat the flesh of animals not killed in sacrifices.

They continued to sleep even after the sun had risen. They made night of their mornings. Day and night, disputes and quarrels waxed in every house. The most disrespectable amongst them no longer showed any regard for those that deserved respect. Fallen from their defined duties, they ceased to revere those that took themselves to the forest to lead a life of peace and meditation. They intermixed castes freely. They ceased to attend to purity of person or mind. Learned Brahmanas ceased to command respect among them and the ones that disregarded the riks were not castigated; in fact, both were treated equally—those that merited respect and those that deserved none. Their servant girls became wicked in their ways, and began to wear necklaces of gold and other ornaments and fine clothes beyond their station. They would enter and leave their homes at their own free will. The Asuras started to derive great pleasure from sports and diversions in which their women were dressed as men and their men as women.

While the affluent amongst their ancestors had made gifts of wealth to deserving persons, the descendants of the Danavas, even though prosperous, began to repossess, to their eternal discredit, those very gifts. When faced with difficulties in the accomplishment of any task, and a friend sought the counsel of a friend, the supposed well-wisher for the petty satisfaction of doing so thwarted the intention.

Amongst even their better classes appeared traders intent upon taking the wealth of others. The Sudras amongst them have taken to the practice of tapasya. Some have begun to study without any proper schedule for work and food, while others persevere with rules that are hollow and useless.

Sishyas no more rendered obedience and service to Acharyas. Mentors in turn have come to treat disciples as friendly companions.

Fathers and mothers are worn out with work, and refrain from all festivity. Parents in old age, divested of power over their sons, are forced to beg food from their offspring. Even scholars of the Vedas, akin to the ocean itself in gravity of deportment, have taken to farming and other such pursuits, while the illiterate and the ignorant are fed at sraddhas.

Every morning, disciples, who once approached their teachers to enquire after and ascertain their duties, tasks, and instructions that awaited accomplishment, are now themselves waited upon by preceptors to discharge the functions. Daughters-in-law, in the presence of their husbands, mothers and fathers, rebuke and chastise servants and maids, and summon their husbands to rebuke them as well. Fathers, with great care, seek to keep sons in good humour, or through fear divide their wealth among children, and live their lives in woe and affliction. Even friends, who see the plight of victims that have suffered loss of wealth in fires or from robbers or by the king, indulge in laughter and mockery of the victim.

The Danavas have become ungrateful, agnostic, sinful and addicted to adulterous congress with even the spouses of their Acharyas. They have taken to consuming forbidden food, transgressed all bounds and restraints, and have lost the splendour that once distinguished them. Because of these and other indications of evil conduct and the very reversal of their past nature, I will not, O king of the Devas, dwell among them any longer. I have come to you of my own accord. Receive me with respect, O lord of Sachi.

Honoured by you, O king of the Devas, I will receive respect from all the other Devas. Wherever I reside, Jaya and the seven Devis, Apeksha, Shradha, Prajna, Tripti, Avajiti, Unnati and Kshama, who adore me, will live with me. The eighth Devi Jaya occupies the highest place amongst them, O scourge of Paka. All of us have deserted the Asuras and have come to your realms. We will henceforth reside among the Devas who are devoted to dharma and bhakti."

In order to please the Devi after she had spoken, Devarishi Narada and Vasava offered her a joyful welcome. Vayu Deva began to blow gently through heaven, bearing delicious fragrances that refreshed all creatures, and increased the felicity of each of the senses. All the Devas gathered in a pure and desirable place and waited there in expectation to behold Maghavat seated with Lakshmi beside him.

Then the thousand-eyed lord of the Devas, accompanied by Sree and his friend the Maharishi, borne by a splendid chariot drawn by green horses, arrived at the gathering of the celestials, and they received him with honour. Maharishi Narada observed a sign, approved by Sree, that the wielder of the thunderbolt made, and accordingly welcomed the advent of the Devi and proclaimed it as exceedingly auspicious.

Heaven's firmament became clear and bright as it began to shower nectar from the region of the self-born Brahma. The unearthly kettledrums, though struck by none, began to beat of themselves, and all the cardinal points of the horizon seemed ablaze with glory. Indra began to pour rain upon crops that appeared according to their season. Not a soul deviated from the path of dharma. The earth was adorned with countless mines filled with jewels and gemstones; the chant of Vedic mantras and other melodious sounds swelled on the triumph of the Devas.

Humans endowed with firm minds, and all those who adhered to the auspicious path of dharma, began to enjoy Vedic and other religious rites and rituals. Manavas, Devas, Kinnaras, Yakshas and Rakshasas were all blessed with prosperity and joy. Not a flower, what need then be said of fruits, dropped untimely from a tree even if Pavana Deva shook it with force. All kine began to yield sweet milk, and no cruel, harsh words were anymore uttered by anyone.

Wishing for advancement, those who approach gatherings of Brahmanas and read this narrative of the glorification of Sree by all the Devas led by Indra, succeed in achieving great prosperity.

These then, O lord of the Kurus, are the best indications of prosperity and adversity. Urged by you, I have revealed all. It befits you to understand what I have said after careful reflection and conduct yourself according to the instructions conveyed herein.'

Yudhishtira says, 'By what disposition, what course of duties, what knowledge, and what energy, does one attain Brahman, which is immutable and beyond the reach of primordial Prakriti?'

Bhishma says, 'One who is engaged in the practice of nivritti, who eats abstemiously, and has his senses under complete control, can attain Brahman which is immutable and above primeval nature. In this regard, listen to the old story, O Bhaarata, of the discourse between Jaigishavya and Asita. Long ago, Asita-Devala addressed the wise Jaigishavya who fully knew the truths of dharma and neeti.

Devala said, "You are not gladdened when praised. You do not give way to anger when blamed or censured. What, indeed, is your wisdom? From where have you got it? And what is the haven of that wisdom?"

Thus questioned by Devala, the pure Jaigishavya of austere tapasya replied with words of high import, fraught with perfect faith and profound sense.

Jaigishavya said, "O best of Rishis, I will tell you of that which is the highest, the supreme goal, and full of peace in the eyes of all who practice dharma. They, O Devala, who behave equally towards those that praise and those who blame them; they who conceal their own vows and good deeds; those who never indulge in recriminations, who never even mention what is good when it is calculated to injure; they who do not desire to return injury in retribution, are said to be men of wisdom.

They never grieve for what is yet to come but remain concerned only with what is before them and respond appropriately. Neither do they indulge in sorrow for the past nor recall it for reminiscence or nostalgia. Imbued with power and regulated minds, they do as they please, in a manner suitable, O Devala, with what needs to be done in respect of all things. Mature of knowledge, highly intelligent, serene with passions kept under restraint, they never inflict injury upon anyone in thought, word or deed. Bereft of envy, they are never pained at the sight of the prosperity of others. Such men never indulge in exaggerations in speech, or set themselves to praise others or speak ill of them. Neither are they ever affected by praise and blame of themselves.

They are calm in respect of all their desires, and engaged in the good of all creatures. They never give way to anger, indulge in transports of joy or injure any creature. Without emotional attachments, they live quite happily. They have no friends nor are they the friends of others. They have no enemies nor are they inimical toward other creatures. Indeed, men that can live in this way can pass their days for ever in happiness. O best of Dvijas, they who acquire a knowledge of the laws of niti and dharma, who observe these in practice, succeed in winning joy, while they who fall away from the path of dharma are afflicted by anxieties and sorrow.

I have now embarked upon the path of dharma. Decried by others, why must I become annoyed with them, or when praised by others, why should I be pleased? Let men obtain whatever objects they please from whatsoever pursuits in which they engage themselves. I am indifferent to acquisitions and losses. Praise and blame cannot contribute to my advancement or failure. He who has understood the truth becomes gratified with even disregard as if it were ambrosia. The man of wisdom is truly annoyed by regard, as if it were poison.

He who is freed from all faults sleeps fearlessly both here and hereafter even if insulted by others. On the other hand, he who insults him suffers destruction. Sages, who seek to attain the highest end, succeed in obtaining it by observing such conduct. He who has vanquished all his senses is regarded to have performed all the sacrifices. Such a one attains the highest condition, that of Brahman, which is eternal and which transcends the reach of primordial Prakriti. The very Devas, Gandharvas, Pisachas and Rakshasas, cannot reach the level of the one who has attained the highest end."

Yudhishtira says, 'What man is there who is dear to all, who gladdens all persons, who is endowed with every merit and accomplishment?'

Bhishma says, 'Here let me recount the words of Kesava in reply to a question Ugrasena once asked him.'

Ugrasena said, "Everyone seem to be anxious to speak of the merits of Narada. I think the Devarishi must really be possessed of every kind of merit. I beseech you to tell me about this, O Krishna!"

Vasudeva said, "O king of the Kukuras, listen to me as I briefly mention some of the great qualities of Narada that I am acquainted with. Narada is as learned in the scriptures as he is good and pious in his conduct. Yet, he eschews pride, which makes one's blood run so hot. Hence he is worshipped everywhere. Discontent, wrath, levity and fear do not exist in Narada. He is courageous and free from procrastination. Hence he is worshipped everywhere.

Narada deserves the reverent worship of all. He never falls back from his words through desire or greed. Hence he is worshipped everywhere. He is fully conversant with the principles that lead to the knowledge of the Atman; he is disposed to peace, possessed of great energy, and is a master of his senses. He is free from guile, and is truthful in speech. Hence, he is worshipped with respect everywhere.

He is distinguished by energy, fame, intelligence, knowledge, humility, birth, penances and years. Hence, he is everywhere worshipped with regard. He practices good behaviour. He clothes and houses himself adequately. He eats pure food. He adores all. He is pure in body and mind. He is silver-tongued. He is free from envy and malice. Hence, he is everywhere worshipped with respect.

He is entirely employed in doing good to all. No sin dwells in Narada. He never rejoices at other people's misfortunes. Hence, he is everywhere worshipped with respect. He always seeks to conquer earthly desires by listening to Vedic mantras and attending to the Puranas. He is a great renouncer and he never disregards anyone. Hence, he is everywhere worshipped with regard.

He casts an equal eye on all; therefore, he has no one whom he loves and none that he hates. His words are ever delightful to the listener. Hence, he is everywhere worshipped with respect. He is a scholar of the scriptures. His conversation is varied and enchanting. His knowledge and wisdom are vast. He is free from cupidity. He is also free from deception. He is large-hearted. He has conquered wrath and avarice. Hence, he is everywhere worshipped with respect. He has never quarrelled with anyone over any subject connected with artha or kama, profit or pleasure. All faults have been torn asunder by him. Hence, he is everywhere worshipped with respect.

His devotion to Brahman is firm. His Atman is blameless. He is well versed in the srutis. He is free from cruelty. He is beyond the influence of delusion or faults. Hence he is worshipped everywhere with respect. He is unattached to all objects of attachment. Yet he appears to be attached to everything. He is never for long subject to the influence of any doubt. Hence, he is everywhere worshipped with respect. He yearns not for objects of artha and kama. He never glorifies himself. He is free from malice, mild in speech. Hence, he is everywhere worshipped with respect.

He observes the hearts, different from one another, of all men, without judgement or condemnation. He is versed in all matters connected with the origin of things. He never disregards or shows hatred for any kind of science. He lives in accord with his own standards of dharma. He never suffers his time to pass away fruitlessly. His soul is under his control. Hence, he is everywhere worshipped with respect.

He has toiled in matters that deserve exertion. He has earned knowledge and wisdom. He is never satiated with yoga. He is ever attentive. Hence, he is everywhere worshipped with respect. He has never to feel shame for any deficiency of his. He is always engaged by others to accomplish what is for their good. He never divulges the secrets of others. Hence, he is everywhere worshipped with respect.

He never yields to transports of joy even when making valuable acquisitions. He is never pained at losses. His intellect is firm and stable. His Soul is unattached to all things. Hence, he is everywhere worshipped with respect.

Who, indeed, is there that will not love him who is so possessed of every merit and accomplishment, who is clever in all things, who is pure in body and mind, who is entirely auspicious, who is well-versed with the course of time and its advantages for particular deeds, and who is well-acquainted with all agreeable things?”

Yudhishtira says, 'I want, O you of Kuru's race, to know about the origin and the end of all creatures. What is the nature of their deliberation and their actions? What are the divisions of time, and the allotted periods of life in the various yugas? I wish also to know in full the truth about the genesis and the conduct of the world; the origin of creatures into the world and the manner of their survival. Indeed, whence their creation and destruction? O best of virtuous persons, if you are inclined to favour us, then tell us about all this. Ever since I once heard you recount this excellent discourse of Bhrigu to the sage Bharadwaja, my intellect, purged of its ignorance, has become most attached to yoga and, withdrawn from worldly objects, rests upon heavenly purity. I ask you to repeat what you said. It becomes you to tell me this in detail.'

Bhishma replies, 'I will recite to you an old narrative of the divine Vyasa's reply to his son Suka's question. Listen to it.

After he studied the illimitable Upanishads and Vedas with all their Angas, Suka wanted to lead a life of brahmacharya. He, therefore, addressed the very same questions, and had his queries answered by his father who had removed through enquiry and contemplation all ambiguities with regard to the subject of the true import of dharma.'

Suka said, "It befits you to tell me who the creator is of all beings, as revealed by your knowledge of time, and what are the duties a Brahmana should accomplish."

In response to his son’s queries, the father, with his knowledge of both the past and future, conversant with all duties and endued with omniscience, so replied.

Vyasa said, “Only Brahman, which is without beginning and without end, unborn, of intense effulgence, beyond decay, immutable, indestructible, inconceivable, who transcends knowledge—exists before the creation. The Rishis who measured time have given names to particular portions. Fifteen winks of the eye make a kashtha. Thirty kashthas make a kaala. Thirty kaalas, with the tenth part of a kaala added, make a muhurta. Thirty muhurtas make up one day and a night. Thirty days and nights make a month, and twelve months make a year.

Persons conversant with mathematical science say that a year is made up of two ayanas that depend on the sun’s movement, the northern and the southern, uttarayana and dakshinayana. The sun makes the day and the night for the world. Night is for the sleep of living creatures, and the day is to engage in activity.

A month of human beings is equal to a day and night of the Pitris. The division of the time of the Pitris is thus: a bright fortnight of the days of men is one day for the Pitris to conduct their activities. And the dark fortnight is their night for sleep. A year of the humans is equal to a day and night of the Devas. The division with respect to the Devas consists in this: The half year in which the sun travels from the vernal to the autumnal equinox, uttarayana, is the day of the Devas, and the half year for which the sun travels in the southern direction, dakshinayana, is their night.

Calculating by the days and nights of Manavas, I will now speak of the day and night of Brahma and his years also. I will, in their right order, tell you the number of years that are, for different reasons and purposes, measured differently in respect of the Krita, Treta, Dwapara, and the Kali yugas.

Four thousand years of the Devas is the duration of the Krita yuga. The dawning of that epoch consists of four hundred years, as does its evening sandhya. The total duration, therefore, of the Krita yuga is four thousand and eight hundred years of the Devas. As regards the other yugas, the duration of each gradually decreases by a quarter in respect of both the substantive period along with the conjoining portion, and the conjoining portion itself. Hence, the duration of the Treta yuga is three thousand years and its dawning is for three hundred years and its evening for three hundred. Likewise, the duration of the Dwapara is two thousand years, and its morning is two hundred years and its evening another two hundred years. The duration of the Kali yuga is one thousand years, and its morning is one hundred years, and its evening another hundred years.

These periods always sustain the never-ending, eternal worlds. They who are conversant with Brahman, O child, regard this as being the immutable Brahman.

In the Krita yuga all of dharma exists in its entirety, along with truth. No knowledge or object came to men of that age through immoral or forbidden means. In the other yugas, dharma, ordained in the Vedas, is seen to gradually decline, by a quarter part in each. Sinfulness grows out of theft, lies and deception. In the Krita yuga, all beings are free from disease and crowned with success in their achievements, and live for four hundred years. In the Treta yuga, the span of life decreases by a quarter. We have also heard that, in subsequent yugas, the words of the Vedas, the periods of life, the grace of Brahmanas and the fruits of Vedic rites, all steadily decrease.

The dharmas ordained for the Krita yuga is of one kind. Those for the Treta yuga are otherwise. Those for the Dwapara are different. And those for the Kali are again separate. This is in accordance with the decline that marks every succeeding yuga.

In the Krita yuga, tapasya occupies the first place. In the Treta, gyana is at the forefront. In the Dwapara, tyaga is said to be first, In the Kali yuga, dana is the only thing that has been prescribed.

The learned say that these twelve thousand years of the Devas constitute what is called a yuga. A thousand such yugas compose a single day of Brahma. A thousand yugas form Brahma's night as well. With the commencement of Brahma's day, the universe begins to awaken into life. During the period of the Pralaya and the universal dissolution, the creator sleeps in Yoganidra. When the period of slumber expires, he awakes.

That then which is Brahman's day extends for a thousand yugas. His nights also extend for a thousand yugas. They who know this are said to know day and night. At the end of his night, Brahma awakens and alters the indestructible Chitta to be overlaid with Avidya. He then causes consciousness to arise, wherefrom proceeds manas, the mind, which is identical with the manifest universe."

Vyasa said, “Brahma is the effulgent seed from which the whole universe of two kinds of beings, the chala and the achala, has come. As he awakens at the dawn of his day, Brahma creates this universe with the help of Avidya. At first emerges Mahat. That Great Being is swiftly transformed into manas, which is the Soul of all the manifest. Manas overwhelms Chitta, pure consciousness, with Avidya and creates seven Great Spirits. Urged by the desire to create, manas begins to create diverse kinds of objects through modifications of itself.

First there comes from it Akasa, space. Know that its property is sound. From space arises the bearer of all scents, Vayu, the pure and mighty wind. It possesses the attribute of touch. From wind comes light endued with effulgence. Also called Sukram, it possesses the attribute of form. Light gives rise to Apah, water that has taste for its attribute. From water springs Bhumi, earth with scent for its quality. These Mahabhutas represent initial creation.

These, one after another, acquire the attributes of the immediately preceding elements from which they have sprung. Each has not only its own special aspect but each succeeding one has the qualities of all the preceding ones. Hence, space has only sound for its attribute. After space comes wind, which has both sound and touch for its qualities. From wind comes fire, which has sound, touch and form. From fire emerges water, which has sound, touch, form and taste for its attributes. From water is earth, which has sound, touch, form, taste and scent for its features. If anyone who perceives scent in water, were to ignorantly infer it to belong to water, he would be in error. For scent is the attribute of earth though it may exist in a state of attachment with water as also with wind.

These seven entities, which possess diverse kinds of energy at first, existed separately from one another. They could not create objects without them coming together as one. As such, they form the constituent parts of the body, which are called limbs. Along with the limbs, the sum total, invested with form and sixteen constituent parts, becomes what is called the body. When the material body is so formed, the subtle Mahat, with the unexhausted residue of karma, enters the body. Next, the original creator of all beings divides himself with his maya and enters the subtle form to witness everything. And inasmuch as he is the original creator of all beings, he is called the lord of all beings.

He creates all beings mobile and immobile. In the avatara of Brahma, he creates the worlds of the Devas, the Rishis, the Pitris and Manushyas; as also the rivers, the seas, the oceans, the cardinal points of the horizon, countries and provinces, hills and mountains and large trees. Kinnaras, Rakshasas, Garudas, Pasus and Sarpas are also his creation. Indeed, he creates both kinds of existent things, those that are mobile and those that do not move; those that can and those that cannot be destroyed.

Of these creatures, each obtains the attributes, which it had during the previous creation; and each, verily, has the same qualities at every subsequent creation. Determined in respect of character by either violence or peace, mildness or fierceness, righteousness or unrighteousness, truthfulness or falsehood, each creature, at every new creation, acquires that guna which it had cherished before. It is due to this that the particular attribute attaches to it.

It is the Ordainer Himself who attaches variety to the great entities of space, earth and the others; to the objects of the senses, form and the rest, according to the size or scale of existent matter, and He appoints the relations of creatures with those multiform entities.

Amongst men who have devoted themselves to the science of phenomena, there are some who say that, in the creation of effects, exertion is supreme. Some scholars say that destiny is supreme, and some say that it is nature that is the operative. Others claim that actions flowing from both exertion and destiny create effects, helped by nature. Instead of regarding any of these as singly competent for the creation of effects, they say that it is the union of the three that produces all effects.

In this, there are some who aver that such is the case, while others claim that such is not the case; some even say that both of these are not the case. These, of course, are the contentions of those that depend on actions with reference to objects. They, however, whose vision is directed to truth, regard Brahman as the cause.

Tapasya is the highest good for living creatures. The roots of penance are peace and self-restraint. Through tapasya, one obtains everything one wishes for. With penance, one attains the Being who creates the universe and hence oneself becomes the mighty Master of all beings. It is by tapasya that the Rishis are enabled to read the Vedas ceaselessly.

At the outset, the Svayambhu created the excellent Vedic sounds to emerge and flow from guru to sishya. From these sounds have sprung all kinds of karmas, the names of the Rishis, the varieties of form seen in existence; in fact, all of creation has its origin in the Vedas. Indeed, the Supreme Master of all beings, in the beginning, created all things from the words of the Vedas. The names of the Rishis, and all else that has been created, occur in the Vedas. Upon the expiration of his night, at the dawn of his day, the self-existent Brahma creates, from archetypes that existed before, all things that are, of course, perfectly made by Him.

In the Vedas the subject of the Soul's emancipation has been described, along with the ten means to achieve mukti: study of the Vedas, adoption of the grihastasrama, penances, the observance of duties common to all the asramas of life, sacrifices, performance of karmas that lead to pure fame, three kinds of meditation, and the kind of mukti known as siddhi. The incomprehensible Brahman, which has been declared in the words of the Vedas, and which has been indicated more clearly in the Upanishads by the seers, can be realised by gradually following these practices.

To a person who thinks he has a body, this consciousness of duality, fraught with pairs of opposites, is born only of the actions in which he is engaged. This consciousness of duality ceases during dreamless sleep or when moksha is attained. He, however, who has attained mukti, helped by his knowledge, forcibly rids himself of the consciousness of duality.

Two Brahmans should be noted, the Brahman represented by sound—the Vedas; and the other which is beyond the Vedas and is supreme. One who realises the Brahman of sound succeeds in attaining the Parabrahman that is supreme.

The slaughter of animals is the sacrifice laid down for the Kshatriyas. The growing of corn is the sacrifice prescribed for the Vaisyas. Tapasya or worship of Brahman is the sacrifice ordained for the Brahmanas. Serving the three other varnas is the sacrifice ordained for the Sudras.

In the Krita yuga, the performance of sacrifices was not necessary; such performance became necessary in the Treta yuga. In the Dwapara yuga, sacrifices had begun to fall off, as they have done in the Kali yuga. In Krita yuga, men worshipped only one Brahman and looked upon the Riks, Samans, Yajuses, rites and sacrifices performed from motives of gain, as all different from the object of their worship, and practiced only yoga, achieved through tapasya.

In the Treta yuga, many mighty men appeared who ruled all mobile and immobile things. Though general, men were not naturally inclined to the practice of dharma, yet the great leaders forced them to such practice. Hence, the Vedas, sacrifices, distinctions between the several orders and the four modes of life, existed in a compact state. As a result, however, of the decrease in the span of life in the Dwapara yuga, all these fell away from that united condition.

In the Kali yuga, all the Vedas become so scarce that men may not even see them. Afflicted by iniquity, they suffer extermination along with the rites and sacrifices laid down in them. The dharma that is seen in the Krita yuga is now visible in such Brahmanas who are of pure souls and are devoted to tapasya and the study of the scriptures.

As regards the other yugas, it is seen that without abandoning the karmas and kriyas that are consistent with dharma, men who observe their svadharma, and know the ordinance of the Vedas, are led by the authority of the scriptures to perform yagnas, keep vratas, make pilgrimages to sacred tirthas and other holy places, in order to obtain punya. As during the rains numerous things burst forth into life, likewise many new kinds of religious observances are brought about in each yuga. As the same phenomena repeat with the seasons, even so, at each new creation identical attributes appear in each new Brahma and Hara. I spoke to you earlier of Kaala, which ordains this variety in the universe. It is Kaala that creates and swallows all creatures. All the innumerable creatures that exist have time for their refuge. It is Kaala that assumes all those forms and Kaala that upholds them.

I have in this manner, O putra, answered your queries about creation, time, sacrifices, rites, the Vedas, the real doer in the universe, action and the results of action."

CANTO 233

Vyasa said, “I will now tell you how the Supreme Lord makes this material universe exceedingly subtle and merges everything into his Soul.

At the time of the Pralaya, a dozen Suryas and Agni come ablaze and the universe erupts in a vast apocalyptic inferno. Everything on earth disappears and merges into the element of which this world is composed. Bhumi, shorn of trees and herbs, resembles a tortoise shell. Apah, water, thereupon acquires gandha, the attribute of earth. When earth becomes shorn of its principal attribute, that element is on the verge of dissolution. Water then prevails and surges into mighty billows that give vent to awful roars and fills this vacuum as it moves about or even remains still.

Agni next adopts the aspect of water, which finds rest in fire. Dazzling flames dance all around as they envelop the sun. Indeed, space itself is ablaze in an immense conflagration.

Thereafter Vayu, wind, acquires the quality of Agni, heat, and extinguishes it. As a result, it obtains its own feature of sabda, sound, becomes awfully agitated and begins to traverse all the ten cardinal points of the horizon.

Akasa, space next subsumes the attribute of sound from wind; space smothers Vayu and enters into a phase of existence described as unheard or unuttered sound. Hereafter space is all that remains, as sound in its unmanifest state. Consequently, sound is absorbed by the mind, which is the essence of all things manifest. Unmanifest manas withdraws all that it has manifested. This subtle withdrawal of Mahat's manifestations is called the Maha-pralaya.

Thereafter chandramas absorbs manas whereby all that remains are the attributes owned by Iswara. Chandramas is also called sankalpa, and in time, it is brought under Iswara's reign, as it has to perform the very difficult task of the annihilation of Chitta. When this is accomplished, the condition reached is said to be of mahagyana. Later, Kaala swallows this gyana, and as the sruti declares, is itself devoured by shakti. However, shakti is again absorbed by Kaala, which is eventually brought under her sway by vidya.

Iswara, the lord of vidya, then swallows unbeing itself into his Atman, which is the unmanifest and Supreme Brahman, eternal, and the highest of the high. In this manner, all creatures, great and minute, are withdrawn into Brahman.

Upon actual experience, conceived with the help of the shastras and as a subject of vigyana, have this truly been so declared by Mahayogins. Even so does the unmanifest Brahman repeatedly undergo the process of elaboration and withdrawal, creation and destruction, and likewise Brahma's day and night each consist of a thousand yugas."

Vyasa said, "You asked me about the creation of all beings; I have narrated that to you in full. Listen to me now as I tell you what the duties are of a Brahmana. The rituals of all ceremonies for which dakshina, sacrificial fees, is enjoined, from the jatakarma to the jamavartana, depend for their performance upon a guru competent in the Vedas. Once the sishya has completed his studies at the guru's asrama and gained knowledge of the Vedas, he should return home with a thorough knowledge of all yagnas.

With his teacher's leave, he should adopt one of the four asramas of life and live in accordance with its duties until he leaves his body. He should either lead a life of a grihasta with wives and raise children, or live as a brahmacharin, or dwell in the forest with his guru, or practice the duties laid down for a yati.

A family life is said to be the root of all the other asramas of life. A self-restrained grihasta who has conquered all his attachments to worldly objects always attains the great aim of life. A Brahmana who begets children acquires knowledge of the Vedas, and performing sacrifices, pays off the three debts he owes. So cleansed by his actions, he should then enter the other asramas. He should settle in the place, which he ascertains to be the most sacred on earth, and strive towards fame and eminence.

The fame of Brahmanas increases through austere penances, mastery of the various branches of knowledge, sacrifices and through charity. A man enjoys endless regions of dharma in the next world as long as his deeds or their memory lasts in this world. A Brahmana should teach, study, officiate at other people's sacrifices and offer sacrifices himself. He should not give away in vain nor accept others' gifts in vain. Sufficient wealth that may come from one who is assisted in a sacrifice, from a pupil, or from the kinsmen of a married daughter, should be spent in the performance of sacrifice or some other benign deed. A Brahmana should never enjoy such wealth singly. For a Brahmana who leads a domestic life there is no means save the acceptance of gifts for the sake of the Devas, Rishis, Pitris, his guru, the old, the sick or to appease hunger.

To those persecuted by unseen foes, or those who strive to the best of their power to acquire knowledge, one should make gifts from one's own possessions, including cooked food, more than one can fairly afford. To a man of punya there is nothing that cannot be given. The good and the wise deserve to have even the prince of steeds, Uchchaisravas, who belongs to Indra himself.

See how the noble King Satyasandha, humbly offered his own prana to save the life of a Brahmana, and ascended into heaven. Sankriti's son Rantideva merely gave lukewarm water to Vasishta, and gained swarga. Atri's son Indradamana gave wealth to a worthy Brahmana, and acquired diverse regions of felicity in the next world. Usinara's son Sibi, who gave away his own limbs and a dear son for the sake of a Brahmana, went directly into swargaloka from this world. Pratardana, the ruler of Kasi, gave away his very eyes to a Brahmana, and found great fame both here and hereafter.

King Devavridha donated a very beautiful and costly chatra, with eight golden ribs, and rose into heaven with all the people of his kingdom. Sankriti of Atri's vamsa imparted instruction to his disciples on the subject of the nirguna Brahman, and reached regions of great felicity. Valiant Ambarisha bestowed eleven arbudas upon the Brahmanas of kine, and so found swarga for himself, along with all his subjects. Savitri gave away her earrings, and King Janamejaya relinquished his own body; both found high regions of felicity. Yuvanaswa, the son of Vrishadarbha, who donated diverse kinds of gemstones, a fine mansion and many beautiful women, ascended into heaven. Nimi, the ruler of the Videhas, gave away his kingdom, Jamadagni's son Rama gave away the whole earth; and Gaya gave away the earth with all her towns and cities, unto the Brahmanas.

Once during a drought, Vasishta, resembling Brahma himself, kept alive all creatures with his energy and kindness. Karandhama's son Marutta bequeathed his daughter to Angiras, and swiftly ascended into heaven. Brahmadatta, the ruler of the Panchalas, donated two precious jewels called Nidhi and Sankha to prominent Brahmanas, and obtained many worlds of felicity.

King Mitrasaha gave his own wife Madayanti to Vasishta, and rose into swarga with his wife. Rajarishi Sahasrajit, of great fame, surrendered his life itself for the sake of a Brahmana, to gain regions of great felicity. King Satadyumna gave Mudgala a mansion made of gold and full of every object of comfort and luxury, and found swarga. The king of the Salwas, Dyutimat, gave Richika his entire kingdom and found heaven for himself. The Rajarishi Madiraswa bestowed his daughter upon Hiranyahasta, and obtained such regions as are held in esteem by the very Devas. Rajarishi Lomapada, bestowed his daughter Santa upon Rishyasringa, and acquired the fruition of all his wishes. King Prasenajit, of great tejas, gave a hundred thousand cows with calves, and acquired majestic realms of grace.

These and many others have, through dana and tapasya, gained swarga. Their fame will last as long as the earth herself will last. All of them have, through gifts, sacrifices and procreation, been rewarded with swargaloka."

Vyasa said, "The knowledge called trayi which occurs in the Vedas and their Angas should be acquired. It is to be derived from the Riks, Samans and the vigyanas called Varna and Akshara. Besides these, there are the Yajuses and the Atharvans. In the six kinds of karma indicated in these, dwells the Divine Being. Atmagyanis who are adept in the revelations of the Vedas are attached to sattva guna, and highly blessed, succeed in understanding the origin and the end of all things.

A Brahmana should live in accordance with the dharma prescribed in the Vedas. He should perform all his karma as a good man of restrained soul. He should earn his livelihood without injuring any creature. Invested with the knowledge derived from the good and wise, he should control his passions and inherent propensities. Well-versed in the scriptures, he should practice the duties laid down for him, and live in this world guided by the sattva guna. Even as a householder, the Brahmana should observe the six karmas. Faithfully, he should worship the Devas in the five main sacrifices. Endowed with patience, never heedless, with self-control, proficient with duties, with a pure heart, divested of joy, pride and anger, the Brahmana should never sink into torpor. Charity, study of the Vedas, sacrifices, penances, modesty, openness and self-restraint—these enhance one's energy and destroy one's sins.

The wise man should be abstemious in his diet and should conquer his senses. Indeed, with lust and wrath subdued, and with his sins washed away, he should strive to reach Brahman. He should worship Agni and Brahmanas, and bow to the Devas. He should avoid all kinds of inauspicious speech and all actions of violence and injury.

This preliminary course of conduct is recommended for a Brahmana. Subsequently, with gyana, he should engage himself in deeds, for in actions lies success. The Brahmana who is imbued with intelligence succeeds in crossing the river of life that is so difficult to navigate, being so furious and terrible with the five senses for its waters, passion as its source and wrath for its mire. He should always remain awake to the fact that Kaala stalks him as a constant threat. Time, who is the great astounder of all things, is armed with irresistible force, and issued from the almighty Ordainer himself.

Generated by the current of Prakriti, the universe is ceaselessly borne along the mighty river of time. Kaala, overspread with eddies constituted by the years, with the months for its waves and the seasons for its current, with the fortnights for its floating moss, and the rise and fall of the eyelids for its froth, with the days and the nights for its water, and desire and lust for its crocodiles, the Vedas and yagnas for its rafts, and dharma for its islands, with artha and kama for its springs, satya and mukti for its shores, benevolence for the trees that float along it, and the yugas for the lakes along its course—the mighty river of Kaala—with an origin as inconceivable as that of Brahman itself, ceaselessly bears away all beings created by the great Ordainer towards the abode of Yama.

The wise and patient successfully cross this awful river with the use of the rafts of knowledge and wisdom. What, however, can fools, bereft of similar vessels, do when thrown into this furious stream? Only the man of wisdom, and never the fool, succeeds in crossing this river. The astute behold from a distance the merits and faults of everything, and succeed in discerning what deserves to be embraced and what merits rejection. However, the unstable man, of little intellect, whose heart is full of desire and greed, is always full of doubt and he never succeeds in fording that river. Neither can the one who sits idly ever pass over it.

The man without the raft of wisdom, he who is weighed down with heavy faults, quickly sinks under the waters. Even a wise man, who is seized by the crocodile of desire, can never hope to make knowledge his lifeboat. The man of wisdom and intelligence should strive hard to cross over the frothing stream of time, without sinking in it. Keeping himself afloat with wisdom, he becomes conversant with Brahman.

One born into a noble race, who abstains from the three duties of teaching, officiating at other's sacrifices and accepting gifts, and conducts only the three other functions: studying, sacrificing and giving, should strive to swim across the rushing current of time. Such a man is sure to gain the far shore in the boat of wisdom. One who is pure in conduct, is self-restrained and keeps good vratas, whose soul is under his control, and who is learned, surely finds success in this and the other world.

The Brahmana who lives as a householder should conquer anger and envy, practice the virtues already named, and worship the Devas in the five sacrifices. He should eat only after he feeds the Devas, Pitris and Athitis. He must conform to the duties that the righteous observe; he must perform karma with a mastered soul, and he should, without injuring any creature, stand firm by adopting a course that is above censure.

One who is skilled in the truths of the Vedas and the other branches of knowledge, whose behaviour is that of a well-guided soul, who is blessed with clear vision, who observes his svadharma, who never by his actions defiles a yagna, who attends to the observances set down in the scriptures, who is full of faith, who is self-restrained, who is wise, who is bereft of envy and malice, and who knows well the distinctions between dharma and adharma: he succeeds in surviving all his trials and tribulations.

The Brahmana, who has fortitude, is always heedful, self-restrained, aware of dharma, whose heart is under control, and who has transcended joy, pride and anger, will never languish in grief. This is the course of conduct ordained of old for a Brahmana. He should strive to acquire knowledge and perform all the scriptural rites. By living thus, he is sure to find success.

One who is bereft of clear vision does wrong even when he wishes to do right. Such a man exercises blind judgement, and performs outwardly virtuous deeds that become entangled in sin. Wanting to do what is right, he does what is wrong; wishing to do what is wrong he might do what is right. Such a man is a fool. Ignorant of the two kinds of karma, he must experience repeated rebirths and deaths."

Vyasa said, “If mukti be desirable, then knowledge must be acquired. For a person who drifts along the course of Kaala, wisdom is the raft by which he can reach the shore. Sages invested with intelligence are able to guide the ignorant to cross the deadly river of life. The naïve, however, fail to save either themselves or others.

One who is free from desire, and all other faults, should attend to these twelve requirements of yoga: a comfortable place, proper actions, a keen interest, sacred articles for rituals, proper posture, worldly renunciation, faith, attentiveness, pure food, dispassion, mental alertness and introspection.

He, who wishes to obtain superior knowledge, needs, with the help of his intellect, to control his speech and his mind. He who wants to have peace, should, with the benefit of his wisdom, restrain his soul. Whether he becomes compassionate or cruel, whether he becomes conversant with all the Vedas or remains ignorant of the Riks, whether he turns to dharma and observes sacrifices or becomes the worst of sinners, whether he becomes eminent for prowess and wealth or plunges into misery, the man who directs his mind towards these twelve attributes, is certain to cross samsara, the arduous ocean of life.

Without mention of the results of the attainment of Brahman through yoga, it may be said that he who sets himself to only enquiring after the Atman transcends the necessity to observe the karmas ordained in the Vedas. The body with the jiva within it is an excellent chariot. When sacrifices and religious rites are made its seat, embarrassment its shield, means and destruction its pole to make fast the yoke, the breath apana its wheel, prana its yoke, knowledge and the allotted span of existence its pillars to secure the steeds, heedfulness the beautiful clasp of the yoke, the assumption of good pravritti the rims of its wheels, vision, touch, scent, and hearing its four horses, wisdom its centre, all the scriptures its long whip, certain knowledge of the scriptural declarations its sarathy, the Soul its firmly-seated rider, faith and self-restraint its fore-runners, renunciation its inseparable companion following behind and bent upon doing it good, purity the path along which it goes, yoga or union with Brahman its goal—then may the ratha reach Brahman and shine there in effulgence.

I will now tell you the swift means to be adopted by one who would equip his chariot in such a fashion to pass through this wilderness of the world in order to reach the goal that is Brahman, which is above decay and death.

To fix the mind upon one thing at a time is called dharana. The yogin who observes proper vows and restraints, practices all seven kinds of dharana. There are, again, as many kinds of concentrations of the mind arising out of these upon subjects that are near or remote. Through these, the yogin gradually acquires mastery over earth, wind, space, water, fire, consciousness and intellect. After this, he gradually acquires a grasp of the unmanifest. I will now describe to you the gradual realisations of individuals engaged in yoga. I will also tell you of the nature of the success that attaches to yoga commenced by him who looks within himself.

The yogin, who follows his guru's instructions and abandons his material body, beholds his Soul display various forms due to its subtlety. To him in the first stage, the sky seems to be filled with a subtle substance akin to a foggy vapour. Such becomes the form of the Soul, which has been freed from the body. When this fog dissipates, a second, new form appears. Subsequently, the yogin beholds within himself the form of water. After the disappearance of water, fire displays itself. This gives way to the appearance of wind glowing as a well-tempered weapon. Gradually, the form displayed by wind turns to resemble the sheerest gossamer. Finally, after it has acquired whiteness, and the subtlety of air, the Brahmana's Soul attains the supreme pureness and subtlety of ethereal space. Let me tell you the outcome of these diverse conditions as they occur.

The yogin, who has achieved the conquest of the earth element, attains by such lordship to the power of creation. Like a second Prajapati endued with perfect composure, he can, from his own body, create all kinds of creatures. With only his toe, or with his hand or feet, he who has achieved mastery over the wind, can singly cause the very earth to tremble. Such is the attribute of the wind as declared in the sruti.

The yogin, who has achieved the lordship of space, can exist brightly in it, and disappear at will as he has attained oneness with the akasic element. With control over water, like Agastya, he can drain rivers, lakes and oceans, drinking them down. With mastery over fire, the yogin becomes so effulgent that his form cannot be looked at. He becomes visible only when he extinguishes his consciousness of individuality.

When the intellect, which is the soul of the five elements and of the consciousness of individuality, is conquered, the yogin attains omnipotence, and perfect knowledge. Consequently, the manifest merges into the unmanifest Paramatman from which the world emanates and becomes manifest.

Listen closely as I explain the science of the unmanifest. First, hear about all that is manifest as illustrated in the Samkhya philosophy. In both the yoga and the Samkhya systems, twenty-five subjects of knowledge have been treated in almost the same way. Listen to me as I mention their cardinal features.

That is said to be manifest, which owns the four attributes of birth, growth, decay and death. That which does not possess these is called unmanifest. The two Souls mentioned in the Vedas and the Vigyanas are based upon them. The first called Jivatma is imbued with the four qualities and it longs for the four purusharthas of dharma, artha, kama and moksha. This Soul is called manifest, and it is born of the unmanifest Supreme Soul. It is both intelligent and unintelligent. I have clearly told you about sattva and kshetrajna.

The Vedas say that both kinds of Soul become attached to objects of the senses. The doctrine of the Samkhyas state that one should keep oneself aloof or dissociated from objects of the senses. The yogin who is freed from attachment and pride, who transcends all the pairs of opposites, pleasure and pain, attraction and revulsion and the rest, who never gives way to anger or hatred, who never tells a lie; who, though slandered or struck, still shows friendship for the violator, who never thinks of doing harm to others, and who restrains speech, actions and thought, and behaves uniformly towards all creatures, succeeds in approaching the presence of Brahman.

One who harbours no desire for earthly objects, who willingly accepts his lot, who depends on earthly objects just for his sustenance, who is free from avarice, who has driven out all grief, who has restrained his senses, who undertakes all necessary karmas, who ignores personal appearance and attire; whose senses are all collected for devotion to the true aims of life, whose purposes are never left unaccomplished, who bears himself with equal friendliness towards all creatures, who regards a clod of earth and a lump of gold with an equal eye, who is equally disposed towards friend and foe, who is patient; who accepts praise and blame equally, who is free from longing of all objects of desire, who practices brahmacharya, and who is firm and steadfast in all his vows and observances; who has no malice or envy for any creature in the universe, is in the eyes of the Samkhya system, a yogin who has attained moksha.

I will now speak about the ways and the means by which a person may gain mukti through yoga. He, who lives and acts after transcending the strength achieved through yoga, succeeds in gaining moksha. I have duly spoken to you on mukti according to the Samkhya doctrine and as rendered by the yoga system, which appear dissimilar if the speaker, be disposed to treat them as such; in reality, they are identical. Thus one can transcend all the pairs of opposites, and so attain Brahman."

Vyasa said, "Tossed about in life's ocean, it is through dhyana that one seizes the raft of knowledge, and clings to it without foundering while trying to reach mukti."

Suka said, "What is that knowledge? Is it the learning by which, when ignorance is dispelled, truth becomes discovered? Or is it the course of duties consisting of the karma to be performed, with the help of which the object sought may be realised? Or still, is it the way of abstaining from actions, by which a realisation of the Atman is to be sought? Do you tell me what it is, so that with its help, birth and death may be avoided."

Vyasa said, "A fool believes that all this exists due to its own nature without any refuge or foundation. With such instruction, he fills the aspirations of his disciples, destroying with his sophistries the reasons a pupil might put forth to the contrary, and he never succeeds in attaining any truth. Others, who firmly believe that all cause inheres in the nature of things and not to a source, also fail to acquire any truth even by listening to Rishis who are competent to instruct them.

Those of little intelligence who abandon their speculations, by adopting either of these doctrines, those who regard nature as the only cause, never succeed in finding any benefit for themselves. This ignorant belief in Prakriti as being the creating and the sustaining cause brings about the destruction of the person who cherishes it. Listen now to the truth about these two doctrines that maintain that things exist by their own nature and that they flow from their own nature, and how the two differ from other true philosophies that precede them.

Wise men apply themselves to farming and tillage to grow crops and vehicles for conveyance. They attend also to the laying of pleasure-gardens, to owning luxurious seats, carpets and houses, the construction of commodious mansions, and the preparation of medicines for diseases of every kind. Wisdom is the active component in the means that lead to the fruition of a man's purposes. Wisdom wins beneficial results. Wisdom enables kings to exercise and enjoy sovereignty. It is through wisdom that the high and the low among beings are distinguished. It is by wisdom that the superior and the inferior among created things are understood. Wisdom is the highest refuge of all things.

All the myriad creations have four kinds of birth. They are viviparous, oviparous, vegetative and those born of filth. Creatures that are mobile should be known to be superior to those that are inert. Intelligent energy must be regarded as being superior to unintelligent matter.

Mobile creatures are innumerable, and of two kinds: those that have many legs and those that have two. Bipedal humans are the superior of the two. Bipeds, again, are of two species, those that live on land and those that are otherwise. Of these, the ones that dwell on land are superior to the others. The superior ones eat diverse kinds of cooked food.

Land-living bipeds are of two kinds, the superior and the undistinguished. Of these, it is commonly, albeit incorrectly ceded, that the multitude are regarded as superior of the two from their observance of the duties of caste in contrast to the exalted who have transcended the needs of such distinctions. The undistinguished ones are said to be of two kinds, those that are conversant with duties, and those that are otherwise. Of these, the first are superior because of their discrimination in respect of what should be done and what should not.

Again, the ones conversant with duties are said to be of two kinds: those that know the Vedas and those that do not. Of these the first ones are superior, for the Vedas are said to dwell in them. Those that are acquainted with the Vedas are yet said to be of two kinds, those who discourse on the Vedas and those who do not. Of these, the previous, who are adept with the Vedas, their duties, their rites and the fruits of these duties and rites, are superior because they promulgate all of those. Indeed, all the Vedas with the duties laid down in them are said to flow from such men. Preceptors of the Vedas are of two kinds: those who have knowledge of the Atman and those that do not. Of these, the first are superior because of their knowledge of the meaning of birth and death.

As for duties, they are, again, of two kinds, pravritti and nivritti. He who is conversant with duties is said to be omniscient or possessed of universal knowledge. Such a man is a renunciate. He is firm in the accomplishment of his objectives, truthful, pure, both outwardly and inwardly, and possessed of might. The Devas know him for a Brahmana who is devoted to the knowledge of Brahman and not him who is only conversant with the duties of pravritti. Such a man is versed in the Vedas and also earnestly devoted to the study of the Atman. They that have true knowledge behold their own Soul as existing both within and without. Such men, O child, are truly enlightened and are as Devas.

Upon these rests this world of beings, in them dwells this whole universe. There is nothing that is equal to their greatness. Transcending birth, death, distinctions and actions of every kind, they are the lords of the four kinds of creatures and are the equals of Brahma himself."

Vyasa said, “These, then, are the obligatory karmas ordained for Brahmanas. The man of knowledge always attains success by performing the prescribed karmas. If no questions arise in respect of one’s efforts, then karmas and kriyas well performed are sure to lead to success. The query to which we refer is this: whether the karmas are obligatory or whether they are optional. As regards the inquiry about the true character of karma, it should be said that if deeds are ordained for man to induce knowledge by which alone Brahman or moksha is to be attained, then they should be regarded as mandatory. I will now discourse on them by the light of both experience and inferences. Listen well to me.

With respect to karma, some men say that exertion is their cause, others that necessity is their cause. Others, again, maintain that nature is the cause. Yet others say that actions are the result of both exertion and necessity, while there are those who maintain that actions flow from time, exertion and nature, all three. Some say that of the three, exertion, necessity and nature, one only and not the other two is the cause. Others are of the opinion that all the three combined are the cause. Then there are those engaged in the performance of karma who, with respect to all objects, say that they exist, and yet they do not exist; that they cannot be said to exist, yet they cannot be said not to exist. These then are the diverse views entertained by different men.

The yogins, however, behold Brahman to be the universal cause. The men of the Treta, Dwapara and Kali yugas are inspired with queries. Those, however, of the Krita yuga are devoted to tapasya, possess peaceful souls and observe dharma, all without effort. Notwithstanding their apparent diversity, they regard the Riks, the Samans and the Yajuses as one, and thus the Veda itself as one. They investigate desire and aversion, and worship only tapasya. Devoted to the practice of penances alone, steadfast in them and rigid in their observance, one obtains the fruition of all desires. With penance, one attains that by becoming which one creates the universe. With tapasya, one becomes the puissant master of all things.

Brahma is expounded in the declarations of the Vedas. For all that, Brahma is inconceivable by even those that are conversant with such declarations. Once more Brahman is affirmed in the Vedanta. Brahman, however, cannot be apprehended through karma.

The sacrifice ordained for Brahmanas consists in japa, for Kshatriyas in the slaughter of clean animals for the gratification of the Devas; for Vaisyas in the production of crops and the upkeep of domestic animals; and for Sudras in menial service to the three other varnas. He who observes his duties and studies the Vedas and other scriptures becomes a true Dvija, a twice-born one. Whether one performs any other karma or not, he who befriends all creatures becomes a Brahmana.

In the beginning of the Treta yuga, the Vedas, yagnas, the divisions of kulas and the asramas of life existed in their entirety. However, from the duration of life being decreased in Dwapara, those are overtaken by decline. In the Dwapara as also in the Kali yuga, the Vedas are overwhelmed by perplexity. Towards the close of Kali yuga, it is questionable if they ever become visible.

In that age of dark wrath, the duties of the respective varnas disappear, and men are afflicted by iniquity. The gracious attributes of kine, of the earth, of water, medicinal and edible herbs, all disappear. Through universal adharma, the Vedas vanish along with all the duties inculcated by them, as also the dharma of the four asramas of life. They who maintain their svadharma are direly afflicted, and all things, mobile and unmoving, change for the worse. As the showers of heaven cause all products of the earth to grow, likewise the Vedas, in every age, cause all the Angas to grow.

Without question, time assumes diverse forms. It has neither beginning nor end. It is time that makes all creatures and again devours them. I have already spoken of it to you. Kaala is the origin of all creatures; it is that which makes them grow. Time is their destroyer, and it is their ruler. Subject to pairs of opposites, such as pleasure and pain, heat and cold, joy and sorrow and the rest, creatures of infinite variety rest on Kaala according to their own natures as ordained by the Supreme Brahman.'"

Bhishma continues, 'Suka was delighted with these instructions of the Maharishi, his father, and he now asked a question that relates to the import of duties that lead to moksha.'

Suka said, "By what means do the wise, who know the Vedas, who perform sacrifices, who are endued with wisdom, and free from malice, succeed in attaining Brahman, which is incapable of being apprehended by either direct evidence or inference, and unlikely of being indicated by the Vedas? I beseech you; tell me by what means can Brahman be apprehended? Is it with tapasya, brahmacharya, sannyasa, gyana, the Samkhya philosophy, or by yoga? With what means may what kind of singleness of purpose be attained by men, with respect to both the mind and the senses? It befits you to elucidate all this to me."

Vyasa said, "No man ever attains success by means other than the acquisition of knowledge, the practice of penances, the subjugation of the senses and renunciation of everything. The five great entities represent the first creation of the Self-born. They have been substantially placed in the embodied creatures of the world.

The bodies of all embodied creatures are derived from earth. The humours are from water. Their eyes are derived from light. Prana, apana and the three other vital breaths have wind for their source. And, lastly, all orifices within them such as the nostrils, the cavities of the ear, and the others, are from akasa, space. In the feet of living beings is Vishnu. In their arms is Indra. Within the stomach is Agni. In the ears are the cardinal points of the horizon representing the sense of hearing. In the tongue is speech, which is Saraswati Vakdevi. The ears, skin, eyes, tongue and nose are the senses of knowing. These exist for the purposes of apprehension of their respective objects. Sound, touch, form, taste and scent are the objects of the five senses. These should always be regarded as being separate from or independent of the senses.

Like the charioteer setting his well-trained steeds along the paths he pleases, the mind sets the senses along directions it likes. The mind, in its turn, is employed by the knowledge seated in the heart. The mind is the lord of all these senses in using them in their functions, and guiding or restraining them. Similarly, knowledge is the lord of the mind in employing, and guiding or restraining it. The senses, the objects of the senses, the attributes of those objects represented by nature, knowledge, mind, the vital breaths and the jiva dwell in the bodies of all embodied creatures.

The body within which knowledge dwells has no real existence. The body, therefore, is not the refuge of knowledge. Prakriti, with its three attributes of goodness, passion and darkness is the refuge of knowledge, which exists only in the form of sound. The Soul also is not the refuge of knowledge. It is desire that creates knowledge; it, however, never creates the three gunas.

The wise man regards the Atman as surrounded by sixteen attributes. The Soul cannot be observed with the eye or with any or all of the senses. Transcending all, the Atman is visible only to the enlightened mind. Divested of the properties of sound, touch, form, without taste or scent, indestructible, without a material or subtle body and without senses, it is nevertheless perceived within the body. Unmanifest and supreme, it dwells in all mortal bodies.

Following the teachings of the guru and the Vedas, he who finds the Atman within himself hereafter becomes Brahman's very self. The wise regard a learned Brahmana, his disciples, a cow, an elephant, a dog and a chandala with an equal eye. Transcending all things, the Atman dwells in all creatures, chala and achala. Indeed, all things are pervaded by it. When a living creature beholds his own Soul in all things, and all things in his Soul, he attains Brahman. One occupies that much of the Supreme Soul as is commensurate with the measure of the acquisition of Brahman in one's own Soul.

He who can always realise the identity of all things with his own self certainly attains immortality. The very Devas are stupefied by the way of the pathless man who himself constitutes the Soul of all creatures, who is engaged in the good of all beings, and who desire to attain Brahman. Indeed, the path pursued by men of knowledge is as invisible as those of birds in flight or of fish in water.

Time, of its own power, cooks all entities within itself. No one, however, knows the Brahman in which Kaala, in its turn, is itself cooked. That of which I speak does not occur above, in the middle, below or in any other direction. It is an Absolute Entity, and not to be found in any one place. All these worlds are within it. There is nothing in these worlds that exists out of it. Even if one flies with the swiftness of an arrow, even if one goes with the speed of the mind itself, one would still not reach the end of That which is the cause of all this. That is so complete that there is nothing greater.

His hands and feet extend everywhere. His eyes, head and face are everywhere. His ears are all over the universe. He exists, overwhelming all things. That Brahman is smaller than the minutest part of an atom. That is the heart of all entities. Existing, without question, That is still imperceptible.

Immortal and mortal: these are the dual forms of existence of the Paramatman. In all mobile and immobile entities the existence it displays is mortal, while the presence it exhibits in pure Chaitanya is divine, immortal and without decay or destruction. Though the lord of all existence, chala and achala, albeit inactive and nirguna, enters, nevertheless, the familiar mansion of nine doors and becomes engaged in karma.

Sages who can perceive the other shore say that the Unborn or the Supreme Soul becomes invested with the attribute of action due to motion, pleasure, pain, variety of form and the nine other attributes. The immortal Soul, which is invested with the karma guna, is nothing other than the immortal and actless Brahman. A man of knowledge, who attains the deathless essence, gives up for good both life and birth."

Vyasa said, "O Uttama putra, at your behest I have truly answered your question according to the doctrine of the Samkhya system. Hear me now explain all that should be done, for the same end, according to the yoga tradition.

The consolidation of the intellect, mind, senses and the all-pervading Atman is said to be knowledge of the highest kind. This vidya should be acquired through a guru by one of a calm disposition, who has mastered his senses, who is able to turn his focus on the Soul with dhyana, who enjoys such meditation, who is gifted with intelligence and who is pure in his actions.

One should try to acquire this knowledge by abandoning the five impediments of yoga known to the wise. Desire, anger, greed, fear and sleep are the five obstacles to yoga. With the help of a calm nature, anger can be conquered. Desire is overcome by renouncing all objectives. Patience and intelligent deliberation on worthy subjects will help forgo sleep. Fear can be avoided with watchfulness. With steady endurance, one should restrain one's organs of procreation and digestion from unworthy indulgence.

One should see to it that one's hands and feet are adequately protected. One must guard one's eyes and ears with the help of one's mind, and defend one's mind and speech by one's actions. One should shun pride by serving the wise. Without delay, one should, by these means, subdue the impediments to yoga.

One should worship Agni and the Brahmanas, and bow one's head to the Devas. One must avoid all kinds of inauspicious talk, and words fraught with malice, and those that are painful to other minds.

Brahman is the effulgent seed of everything. It is, furthermore, the essence of that seed itself whence all this emanates. Brahman, with a glance of his eyes, became the Soul of this mobile and immobile universe, of all entities that took birth.

Meditation, study, gift, truth, modesty, simplicity, forgiveness, purity of body, and purity of conduct, subjugation of the senses: these enhance one's tejas, which duly destroys one's sins. With an impartial demeanour towards all creatures and by living in contentment upon what is acquired effortlessly, one receives the fruits of all one's objectives and obtains knowledge.

Cleansed of all sins, endowed with energy, abstemious in diet, with the senses, desire and wrath subdued, one should seek to attain Brahman. With inwardly focus, in the still hours of eventide or in those before dawn, one should firmly unite the senses that are withdrawn from all external objects and fix one's mind upon gyana. If even one of the five senses of a man is kept unrestrained, all his wisdom may escape as water seeps through a hole in a bag.

The mind, in the first instance, should be restrained by the yogin, just as a fisherman at the outset renders powerless the fish from which there is the greatest danger to his nets. With the mind subdued first, the yogin should then proceed to restrain his ears, eyes, tongue, nose and his sense of touch. Thus with the mind withdrawn from all objectives, the yogin should focus it on knowledge. Indeed, with the five senses subdued, the yati should fix them on the mind. When the senses and the mind become concentrated and steadfast in gyana, Brahman becomes perceptible like a towering fire or the sun. Indeed, he then sees in his self, in his Soul, like lightning in the sky. Everything then appears in it and it appears in everything from its infinitude.

The most learned Brahmanas, imbued with fortitude, and engaged in the weal of all creatures, succeed in perceiving it. Seated in solitude and immersed in the observance of austere vows, the yogin who conducts himself so for six months attains oneness with the Indestructible.

Death, life, the power to present varied aspects in the same person or body, celestial scents, sounds and sights, the most agreeable sensations of taste and touch, pleasurable sensations of coolness and warmth, parity with the wind, insight into the meaning of the scriptures and every work of profound truth, companionship of the apsaras—the yogin who acquires these through yoga, should disregard and merge them all in gyana.

Seated on a mountain summit, or at the foot of a significant tree, or in front of such a tree, with speech and the senses controlled, he should practice yoga after dusk, and at dawn. As a worldly man contemplates wealth and other valuable possessions, he should restrain all the senses within the heart and fix the mind on the eternal and the immortal. He should never become distracted during yoga, but devoutly restrain the restless mind from straying. With the senses and the mind thus withdrawn, the yogin should turn to empty mountain caves, consecrated temples and abandoned houses, for abodes to dwell in.

A yogin should not associate with another in either speech, action or thought. He must disregard one and all, eat abstemiously and look with an equal eye upon objects acquired or lost. He should behave equally towards the one that praises and one that censures him. He must not seek the good or the evil of one or the other. He should not rejoice at an acquisition or suffer anxiety when he meets with failure or loss. Of uniform behaviour towards all beings, he should remain unattached, as the wind.

To one whose mind is thus turned to itself, who leads a life of purity, and who casts an equal eye upon all things, indeed, to one who is ever engaged in such yoga for even six months, Brahman as Pranava, AUM, appears vividly.

Adequately aware of how men are afflicted by anxiety in pursuit of wealth and comfort, the yogin should view a clod of earth, a stone and a lump of gold with an equal eye. Indeed, he should abandon the pursuit of wealth with a keen aversion for it, and never suffer himself to be tempted or bewildered. Even if a seeker belongs to an inferior varna, or is a woman, both will surely attain the highest end if they follow the path indicated above.

He who has subdued his mind witnesses in his own self, with the help of his own intelligence, the Uncreated, Ancient, undeteriorating and eternal Brahman, which is subtler than the subtlest, and grosser than the most gross, which is moksha's self."'

Bhishma continues, ‘With confirmation from the lips of gurus and by their own deliberation upon these immaculate words of the Maharishi, the wise attain oneness with Brahman.’

Suka said, “The declarations of the Vedas are twofold. They command, ‘Perform all karma’. They also say the reverse: ‘Renounce actions.’ I ask you, what do men attain with gyana and what do they achieve with karma? I desire to know this. Tell me about this. Indeed, these declarations about knowledge and actions are dissimilar and even contradictory.”

Thus addressed, the son of Parasara replied to his son, “I will clarify for you the two paths, the destructible and the indestructible, which depend respectively upon karma and gyana. Listen carefully, O child, as I tell you the goal attained with knowledge, and the other through actions. The difference between these two places is as great as the infinite sky. The question that you have asked me has given me such pain, as an atheistic discourse gives a man of faith. These are the two paths upon which the Vedas are established: the duties indicated by pravritti, and those based on nivritti.

By actions, a living creature is destroyed. With knowledge, however, he is emancipated. For this reason, yogins who perceive the other shore of the ocean of life never take to karma. Through karma, one is forced to be reborn, with a body composed of the sixteen elements. Through knowledge, however, one is transformed into that which is eternal, unmanifest and immutable.

Those that are of small intelligence laud actions, because of which they successively assume bodies in a ceaseless cycle of rebirths. Whereas truly intelligent men of sharp perceptions of dharma never encourage karma, even as persons that depend for their drinking water upon running streams never favour wells and ponds.

The fruit that one gains from actions consists of pleasure and pain, of birth and death. With knowledge, one reaches where there is no occasion for grief; where one is freed from both birth and death; where one is not subject to decrepitude; where one transcends the state of conscious existence. Where there is Supreme Brahma, unmanifest, immutable, ever-existent, imperceptible, beyond pain, immortal and above destruction; where all become freed from the influence of duality, from the opposites like pleasure and pain and the rest, as also from aspirations. In such a stage, they view everything equally, become universal friends and devoted to the good of all creatures.

There is a wide gulf, my son, between one committed to gyana and one dedicated to karma. Know that the man of knowledge is indestructible; he remains eternally present like the moon that exists on the last day of the dark fortnight, invisible but undestroyed. The Maharishi Yagnavalkya in the Brihadaranayaka has said this more elaborately. For the man devoted to deeds, his transitory nature may be inferred from observing the new moon, which appears like a bent thread, a sliver in the firmament and is subject to wax and wane.

Know, O Suka, that he who performs actions is reborn with a body with eleven entities for its ingredients, along with a subtle form, with its own essences, which all together are sixteen. The Soul that takes refuge in the material form, like a drop of water on a lotus leaf, should be known as kshetrajna, which is eternal, and which through yoga, transcends both the mind and knowledge.

Tamas, rajas, and sattva are the attributes of knowledge. Knowledge is the aspect of the individual soul that abides within the body. The Jivatman, in turn, comes from the Paramatman, the Supreme Soul. The body with the Soul is said to be the attribute of the jiva. The jiva animates and causes all bodies to live. Those acquainted with kshetra and kshetrajna declare that the creator of the seven worlds is above the jiva."

Suka said, "I have now understood that there are two kinds of creation, one commencing with kshara, the mortal which is universal, and which is from the universal Soul. The other, consisting of the senses with their objects, is traceable to the power of knowledge. This last transcends the other and is regarded to be the best. I wish to hear once more of the course of dharma which runs in this world, regulated by Kaala, and based on which all good men frame their conduct.

In the Vedas are both kinds of declarations: perform karma and abstain from karma. How will I ascertain the propriety of one above the other? It befits you to explain this clearly. Now that I have gained, through your instructions, a thorough knowledge of the conduct of human beings, purified myself with the practice of dharma, and cleansed my intellect, I will discard my body and behold the indestructible Soul."

Vyasa said, "The course of conduct that was first established by Brahma was duly observed by the wise and pious, the Maharishis of ancient times. The great Rishis conquer all the worlds with the practice of brahmacharya. He who seeks good for himself with a focus on knowledge, who practices severe austerities in the forest and subsists on fruits and roots, attains Brahman. He who visits tirthas and other sacred places, practices universal benevolence, and goes on his rounds of mendicancy at the proper time to the huts of forest dwellers, achieves Brahman. Abstain from flattery and do not belittle yourself to others, avoid both good and evil, live in the forest by yourself and appease hunger by any means that comes your way."

Suka said, "In the opinion of the graceless the proclamations of the Vedas with regard to karma are contradictory. When there is this conflict, how can such edicts be called scriptural? I want to hear about this: how can both be regarded as authoritative? How, indeed, can mukti be obtained without violating the directive about the obligatory character of karma?"

The son of Gandhavati, the Rishi Vyasa praised these words of his son, and answered his queries.'

Vyasa said, "The brahmacharin, the grihasta, the vanaprastha, and the sannyasin all reach the same transcendent goal with the due observance of the duties of their different modes of life. Alternatively, if he who is freed from desire and aversion ceaselessly practices all the four asramas of life according to their regulations, he is certainly qualified to attain Brahman. The four asramas constitute a flight of steps that is attached to Brahman. By climbing this stairway, one successfully reaches Brahman.

For the fourth part of his life, the brahmacharin, who knows the distinctions of duty, and is free from malice, should live with his guru or his guru's son. While he stays in his guru's house, he should sleep after his preceptor has retired to bed, and arise before the teacher awakens. All such duties as done by a disciple, as also those undertaken by a menial servant, should be accomplished by him. After he has finished his tasks, he should stand humbly by the side of the preceptor. Skilled in every kind of work, he should conduct himself like a menial, and attend to every kind of work for his guru.

With every task accomplished in its entirety, he should sit at the feet of his preceptor, and study eagerly. He should always behave with simplicity, avoid vile talk and be ready for his lessons at the summons of his teacher. With purity in body and mind, endued with cleverness and other virtues, he should speak but occasionally and in an appropriate manner. With his senses subdued, he should submissively look upon his guru.

He should never eat before his mentor has eaten, never drink before he has drunk; never sit before he has sat down; and never go to bed before his teacher has retired for the night. He should gently touch his preceptor's feet with upturned palms, the right foot with the right and the left with the left. Reverentially saluting the master, he should say to him, 'O illustrious one, teach me. I will undertake this work! O exalted one, this other work I have already accomplished. O reborn one, I am ready to do whatever else you may be pleased to command.'

Once he has said all this, and has duly offered himself thus to the guru, he should complete whatever tasks his teacher needs accomplished, and inform the master once more of their completion.

Whatever scents or tastes the brahmacharin may abstain from during the life of brahmacharya; he may resume them upon his return from the guru's abode. This is consistent with the ordinance. All the customs elaborately laid down in the shastras for brahmacharins, he should practice regularly. He should, again, always be at the beck and call of his mentor.

After he has satisfied his teacher to the very best of his abilities, the disciple should move on to the other asramas in succession, and practice the dharma of each. And so, with a fourth part of his life passed in the study of the Vedas, observance of vows and fasts, the sishya should offer his guru-dakshina, take leave of his preceptor and return home to lead a life in grihastasrama.

He should marry in accordance with the customs, and carefully establish garhapatya, the domestic fire. He should observe all vows and fasts, become a true householder, and thus pass the second period of life."

Vyasa said, "As regards the domestic life, four kinds of conduct have been prescribed by the learned. The first consists in keeping a store of grain sufficient to last for three years; the second of maintaining a stock to last for one year; the third consists of providing for the day without thinking of the morrow; and the fourth consists of collecting grain left behind in the fields by reapers, as done by pigeons. Of these, the shastras say, each succeeding one is superior in punya to that which precedes it.

A householder who observes the first kind of conduct may practice all the six established duties—sacrifice on his own account, sacrifice because of others, teach, study, bestow gifts and accept gifts. He who respects the second kind of conduct need practice only three of these duties—studying, giving and taking. He who follows the third kind of conduct should practice only two of the duties—learning and giving. The householder who adopts the fourth kind of domesticity should observe only one duty, imbibing the scriptures.

All the duties of the grihasta are exceedingly meritorious. The householder should never cook any food for only his own use, nor should he slaughter animals for food except in sacrifices. If it is an animal which the grihastha wishes to kill for food, or if it is a tree which he wants to cut down for fuel, he should do either deed in accordance with the ritual laid down in the Yajuses—for that much is the due of both animate and inanimate beings.

The householder should never sleep during the day, or the first part of the night, neither should he sleep during the last yaama of the night and be sure to awaken before dawn. He should never eat twice between morning and evening, and should never summon his wife to bed except in her season. In his house, no Brahmana should be suffered to remain unfed or go without being worshipped. He should always venerate such guests as are givers of sacrificial offerings, are cleansed by Vedic lore and the observance of excellent vratas, are high-born and conversant with the scriptures; who follow the duties of their svadharma, are self-restrained, mindful of all religious karmas and devoted to tapasya. The shastras ordain that what is offered to the Devas and the Pitris in sacrifices and religious rites is also meant for the service of guests like these.

In this asrama of life, the scriptures ordain that a share of food should be given to every creature irrespective of birth or character: to the one who for the sake of show grows his nails and beard, to one who from pride displays what his own religious practices are, to one who has abandoned his sacred fire and even to one who has injured his guru.

He who leads a grihasta's life should offer food to brahmacharins and sannyasins. The householder should eat vighasa, and thus partake of amrita every day. The grihastha who eats after relatives and servants have been fed eats vighasa. The food mixed with clarified butter that remains after the sacrificial offerings is called amrita.

He who has sex as a householder should be content with his own wife. He should be self-restrained, avoid malice and subdue his senses. He should never quarrel with his ritwik, purohita, acharya, his matulan—maternal uncle—guests and dependants, the aged or the young. He should avoid any dispute with those that are ailing, or with physicians, kinsmen, relatives, friends, parents, women from his paternal family, his brother, son, wife, daughter and his servants. With differences thus kept at bay, the householder becomes cleansed of all sins. By conquering the tendency for disputes, he conquers all the regions of felicity in the hereafter. There is no question about this.

A duly worshipped guru is able to lead one to the regions of Brahma. The adequately revered pita can lead a man to the realms of Prajapati. A guest is empowered to provide access to the region of Indra. The ritwik has influence over the world of the Devas. Female relatives of the paternal line have power over the domains of the apsaras, and relatives by blood, over the realms of the Viswedevas. Relatives by marriage have power over the several quarters of the horizon, north, south, east, west and the intermediate rest, while the mother and the maternal uncle wield authority over the earth. The old, the young, the afflicted and the wasted have dominance over the sky. The eldest brother is like a father to all his younger brothers. The wife and the son are one's own body. One's menial servants are one's own shadow. The daughter is an object of great affection.

For these reasons, a householder imbued with wisdom, observant of dharma, and possessed of endurance, should bear, without attachment or anxiety of heart, every kind of annoyance and even censure from these last-named relatives. No virtuous householder should do anything, urged by considerations of wealth.

There are three courses of duty in respect of a life of domesticity. Of these, that which comes next in the order of specification is more meritorious than the preceding one. As regards the four principal modes of life also, the same rule of merit applies: the one that comes after is superior to the one preceding it. Hence, grihasta is superior to brahmacharya, vanaprastha is superior to domesticity, and sannyasa or complete renunciation is superior to the forest life. One desirous of prosperity should accomplish all such duties and rites as are ordained in the scriptures.

The kingdom grows in prosperity where these deserving people live—those who lead a family life according to the Kumbhadhanya method, ones who lead it in accordant with the Unchha path, and they who lead it in agreement with the Kapoti system.

He, who joyfully lives as a householder, succeeds in sanctifying ten generations of his ancestors and ten generations of his descendants. Furthermore, he obtains a goal that yields felicity equal to what occurs in the realms attained by great kings and emperors. Such is the goal that is ordained for those who have subdued their senses. Swarga is decreed in the Vedas for all high-souled householders, a heaven that is furnished with wonderful chariots that move at the will of the rider. For all grihastas of restrained minds, the regions of swarga constitute the high reward. The Self-born Brahma ordained that grihastasrama should be the very cause of heaven. Therefore, by gradually attaining the second asrama of life, a man finds happiness and respect in swargaloka.

After this comes the high and superior, third, asrama of life for those who want to disown their bodies. This asrama is superior to that of the householders: the life of forest recluses, vanaprasthas who waste their bodies through diverse kinds of austerities into skeletons covered by dried, parchment-like skins. Listen as I tell you about vanaprastha.'"

Bhishma says, 'Thus have the duties of domesticity, grihastasrama, been ordained by the wise. Listen now, O Yudhishtira, to what these duties are. The householder should gradually abandon the domestic life and enter the third asrama, which is so excellent. It is the stage in which wives attenuate themselves through severe austerities. It is the asrama practiced by those that live as forest recluses. Blessed be you, O son, listen to the dharma observed by those that lead this way of life in which occur the practices of all men and all the asramas. Listen, indeed, to the responsibilities of those that are denizens of sacred places and have resorted to this course after proper deliberation. And at the proper time.

Vyasa said to his son Suka, "When the householder has grandchildren, observes wrinkles on his body and grey hair on his head, he should retire into the forest. The third part of his life he should pass in the observance of the vanaprasthasrama. He should attend to the sacrificial fires to which he attended as a householder. Desirous of performing yagnas, he should worship the Devas in accordance with stipulated rituals. Keeping vratas and abstemious in diet, he should eat only once, in the sixth part of the day. He should be ever heedful, attend to his sacrificial fire, rear cows and tend to them dutifully. He should attend to all the rituals of a sacrifice.

He should live upon rice and wheat grown by himself, on various grains growing wild and belonging to none. He should eat what remains after guests have eaten. In this third stage of life, he should offer ghrita in the five established sacrifices. Four methods have been ordained down for observance in the vanaprasthasrama. Some gather only what is needed for the day. Some collect stores to last for a month. Some store grain and other necessities sufficient to last for twelve years.

Forest recluses may act in these ways to honour guests and perform sacrifices. During the monsoons, they should expose themselves to rain and take to standing in water in autumn. During the summer, they must sit in the midst of four fires with the sun burning overhead. Throughout the year, however, they remain abstemious in diet. They sit and sleep on bare earth. They stand only on their toes. With no other means to provide seats or beds, they remain satisfied with the bare earth and small mats of grass. Preparatory to sacrifices, they perform their ablutions morning, noon and evening, during the three sandhyas.

Some amongst them use only teeth for cleaning grain, while others use only stones. A few drink very lightly boiled gruel of wheat or other grain, only during the bright fortnight, when the moon waxes, while there are many who take similar gruel only during the dark fortnight. Some eat only what comes their way without seeking it. Others duly adhere to the path followed by the Vaikhanasas who adopt rigid vows and survive only on roots, a few only upon fruits, and yet some others of them upon only flowers. Such men of wisdom and piety, the forest recluses embrace these and other diverse practices.

Based upon the Upanishads, the fourth asrama is called sannyasa. The customs laid down for it may be seen equally in all the asramas of life. This stage differs from the others and comes after domesticity and the forest life. In this very yuga, O putra, many learned Brahmanas conversant with the truths of all things, have been known to take to sannyasa. Agastya, the Saptarishis, Atri, Angiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, Vasishta, Narada, Kratu, Madhucchandas, Aghamarshana, Sankriti Sudivatandi who lived wherever he pleased, Ahovirya Kavya, Tandya, Medhatithi, Karmanirvaka and Sunyapala who once put in great effort to acquire ascetic powers, all faithfully followed sannyasa, and attained swarga.

Many Maharishis, O son, numerous ascetics known as Yayavaras, many Rishis of austere tapasya, and countless Brahmanas adopted vanaprastha. The Vaikhanasas, Balakhilyas, Saikatas, all of whom were used to realising the fruits of their penances immediately, adopted this mode of life and finally ascended into swargaloka. Freed from fear and not counted among the stars and planets, these have become visible in the firmament as luminous bodies.

When the last part of life is arrived at, and one is weakened by advanced age and afflicted by disease, one should abandon the vanaprasthasrama and embrace sannyasa. He should conduct a sacrifice that can be completed in a single day, a yagna in which the dakshina should be all his possessions. In addition, he should perform his own sraddha. Withdrawn from every object, he should devote himself to his Atman, taking pleasure in himself and resting on his own self. He should establish all his sacrificial fires thereafter within himself, and renounce all kinds of ties and attachments.

If he fails to attain complete renunciation, he must perform such sacrifices and rites as are completed in a single day. Once sacrificial rites and the chanting of mantras result in yoga, he may then discontinue all outward rituals, and to the three inner fires that burn within himself, surrender mind and knowledge for the sake of moksha.

Without finding fault with his food, he should eat five or six morsels, duly offered to the five vital breaths, while reciting the mantras of the Yajurveda. Engaged in tapasya as a vanaprastha, one should keep one's head and face shaved, nails trimmed, cleanse oneself with karmas and kriyas, and only then pass into the fourth and final stage of life that is replete with great sacredness. The reborn person, who enters the fourth mode of life with a pledge of universal compassion to all creatures, achieves many regions of splendour hereafter and finally attains the Infinite.

Of excellent disposition and conduct, with sins all washed away, the person who realises the Atman never desires to indulge in any action for either this or the other world. Freed from anger and error, without anxiety and friendship, such a one lives in this world very uninterested in its concerns. A sannyasin should not feel reluctant to discharge the duties of yama and niyama. Such a sannyasin should live enthusiastically by the ordinances laid down for his asrama, and eschew Vedic study along with the sacred thread that is indicative of the varna of his birth. Devoted to dharma, with senses subdued, such a one possessed of Atmagyana unquestionably attains his ultimate goal.

The fourth asrama of life is the most superior one, and fraught with numerous high virtues. In merit, it transcends the three other stages of life, and occupies the highest place. Pay heed to what I tell you about the duties of this sannyasasrama which is the high refuge of all."

Suka said, “How should one who observes the ways of the best of asramas, and seeks to achieve that which is the highest, set his soul on yoga?”

Vyasa replied, “Once one has purified himself by progressing through the brahmacharya and grihastha asramas, one should fix one’s soul on yoga during vanaprastha. Listen carefully to what should be done to attain the highest object of acquisition. Once all the faults of the mind and heart are subdued with ease in the first three asramas, one should take to the most excellent and most eminent of all the asramas—sannyasa.

Now you pass your days in utter purity. The sannyasin practices yoga alone, without assistance or company, in order to acquire the highest object of acquisition.

He never turns back from mukti who practices yoga in solitude, perceives everything as a reflection of his own self, and never disregards anything since everything is pervaded by the universal Soul. Such a man, who does not maintain sacrificial fires or a fixed abode, should only ever enter a village to beg for his food. He should provide himself for the day without storing for the morrow. He should not eat more than once in a day and eat very little just to keep his body alive. He should take to tapasya, with his heart fixed on the Supreme Brahman.

The other characteristics of a religious mendicant are the human skull for a begging-bowl, trees for shade, and rags for clothing, habitual solitude, and indifference to all creatures.

Just as panic-stricken elephants that have fallen into a well are unable to climb out from it, he from whose lips harsh words do not emerge in response to the ones he has received—such a one is fit to lead the life of a sannyasi, which has moksha for its goal.

The mendicant should never pay heed to the evil actions of any person. He should never listen to what is said in criticism of others. He should especially avoid speaking ill of a Brahmana. He should always say only what is agreeable to the Brahmanas. When anything offensive is said about himself, he should remain silent. Such silence, indeed, is the balm prescribed for him.

He who perceives himself to be in everything and everything to be in himself, and with the help of yoga-shakti withdraws his senses and mind, to even make a place teeming with thousands of men and things, appear to himself as perfectly solitary or unoccupied, is regarded by the Devas to be a true sannyasin.

Him the gods know for a Brahmana who clothes himself with whatever comes by the way, who subsists upon whatever he gets, and who sleeps on whatever ground he finds.

Him the gods know for a Brahmana who is afraid of company as of a snake; of the full measure of satisfaction from sweet viands and drinks as of hell; and of women as of a corpse.

Him the gods know for a Brahmana who is never glad when honoured and never angry when insulted, and who has pledged compassion to all creatures.

One in adherence of the last mode of life should not view death with sorrow. Nor should he view life with joy. He should only await his hour like a servant waiting for his master's summons.

He should purify his heart of all blemishes. He should purify his speech of all faults. He should cleanse himself of all sins.

As he has no foes, what fear can assail him? He who fears no creature and whom no creature fears, can have no fear from any quarter, freed as he is from misdeeds of every kind.

As the footprints of all other creatures are enclosed within those of elephants, likewise all ranks and eminence are absorbed within yoga. Similarly, every other duty and observance is supposed to be engulfed within the one duty of non-violence. He lives an everlasting life of felicity who avoids injuring other creatures.

One who abstains from injury, who perceives all creatures equally, who is devoted to truth, who is endued with fortitude, who has mastered his senses and who grants protection to all beings, attains an end that is beyond compare.

The condition called death succeeds not in transcending such a person who is content with self-knowledge, who is free from fear, and who is divested of desire and expectancy. On the other hand, such a person succeeds in transcending death.

Him the gods know for a Brahmana who is freed from attachments of every kind, who is observant of penances, who lives like space which while holding everything is yet unattached to anything, who has nothing which he calls his own, who leads a life of solitude, and whose Soul is tranquil.

The Devas know him for a Brahmana whose life is for the practice of righteousness, whose righteousness is for the weal of those who wait dutifully upon him, and whose days and nights exist only for the acquisition of merit.

The gods know him for a Brahmana who is freed from desire, who never exerts himself for doing such actions as are done by worldly men, who never bows his head to anyone, who never flatters another and is free from attachments of every kind.

All creatures are pleased with happiness and filled with fear at the prospect of grief. The man of faith, therefore, who should feel distressed at the prospect of filling other creatures with grief, must abstain entirely from actions of every kind.

The gift of assurances of harmlessness to all creatures transcends in point of merit all other gifts. He who, at the outset, forswears the religion of injury, succeeds in attaining emancipation in which there is the assurance of harmlessness to all creatures.

He who refrains from partaking even the five or six mouthfuls that are laid down for the forest recluse, is said to be the navel of the world, and the refuge of the universe.

The mind and other senses, as also the actions good and bad, are all consigned to the sacrificial fire within. Such a man, who sacrifices in his own self, makes a liberation of his senses and mind into the fire that dwells within the limited space of his own heart. From his pouring of such a libation into the sacrificial fire within his own self, the universe with all creatures including the very gods, becomes gratified.

They who comprehend the radiant jiva, the Soul that is enveloped in three sheaths, and has three attributes for its characteristics; to be Iswara partaking of that which is foremost, the nature of the Supreme Soul, become objects of great regard in all the worlds. The very gods, along with all human beings speak highly of their merits.

He who succeeds in perceiving in his Soul all the Vedas, space and the other objects of perception, the rituals that occur in scriptures, all those entities that are comprehensible in sound only and the superior nature of the Supreme Soul—is sought to be worshipped by the very deities as the foremost of all beings.

He who sees in his Soul, that foremost of beings which is not attached to the earth, which is immeasurable in even the infinite firmament, which is made of gold, which is born of the universe and resides within the universe, which is equipped with many arms, which has two wings like a bird, and which is rendered effulgent by many rays of light, is sought to be worshipped by the very gods as the foremost of all beings.

The very Devas worship him in whose intellect is set the wheel of Kaala, which is constantly revolving, which knows no decay, which swallows up the period of existence of every creature, which has the six seasons for its naves, which is equipped with twelve spokes consisting of the twelve months, which has excellent joints, and towards whose gaping mouth proceeds this universe ready to be devoured.

The Supreme Soul is the capacious unconsciousness of dreamless slumber. That unconsciousness is the body of the universe. It pervades all creation. Jiva, occupying a portion of that expansive unconsciousness gratifies the Devas. These last, being gratified, in turn gratify the open mouth of that unconsciousness. Endued with brilliance along with the principle of eternity, jiva is without a beginning. It acquires infinite regions of eternal happiness.

He of whom no creature is afraid, has never to fear any creature. He who never does anything censurable and who never derides another, is said to be a truly reborn person. Such a man succeeds in beholding the Supreme Soul.

He whose ignorance has been dispelled and whose sins have been washed away, never enjoys either here or hereafter the happiness that is enjoyed by others but attains moksha. A person in the observance of the fourth mode of life wanders on the earth like one unconnected with everything. Such a one is freed from wrath and error. Such a one regards a clod of earth and lump of gold with an equal eye. Such a man never stores anything for his use. Such a one has no friends and foes. Such a one is utterly regardless of praise or blame, and of the agreeable and the disagreeable."

Vyasa said, “The Jivatman is endued with all those elements that are qualifications of Prakriti. These do not know the Soul but the Soul knows them all. Like a good charioteer steers his strong, well-broken and brave steeds along his path the Soul acts with the help of the senses, having the mind for their sixth.

The objects of the senses are superior to the senses themselves. The mind is superior to those objects. The intellect is superior to the mind. The Soul, also called Mahat, is superior to the intellect. Superior to Mahat is the unmanifest, Prakriti. Superior to the unmanifest is Brahma. There is nothing superior to Brahma. That is the highest limit of excellence and the highest goal.

The Supreme Soul is concealed in every creature. It is not displayed for ordinary men to see. Only yogins with subtle vision witness the Supreme Soul with the help of their keen and subtle intellect.

Merging the senses having the mind for their sixth and all the objects of the senses into the inner Soul by the aid of the intellect, and reflecting upon the three states of consciousness; the object thought, the act of thinking and the thinker; and abstaining by contemplation from every kind of enjoyment, equipping his mind with the knowledge that he is Brahma’s self; appropriately laying aside all consciousness of power, and thereby making his Soul perfectly tranquil—the yogin obtains that to which immortality inheres.

That person, however, who happens to be the slave of all his senses and whose ideas of right and wrong have been confounded; already liable as he is to death, actually meets with death by such surrender of the self to the passions.

Destroying all desires, one should merge the mind into one's subtle intellect. Having done so, one is sure to become a second Kalanjara mountain.

By purifying his heart, the yogin transcends both righteousness and its reverse. By purifying his heart and by living in his own true nature, he attains the highest happiness. The indication of that purity of heart is the one who has experienced the state of unawareness of all one's surroundings which one experiences in dreamless slumber. The yogin who has attained that state lives like the steady flame of a lamp that burns in an enclosed place.

Becoming abstemious in diet, and having cleansed his heart, that yogin who connects his self to the Soul succeeds in beholding the self in the Soul.

This discourse, O son, intended for your instruction, is the essence of all the Vedas. The truths herein disclosed cannot be understood through inference alone or with mere study of the scriptures. One must understand it with the help of faith.

By churning the wealth contained in all the religious works and in all discourses based on truth, as also the ten thousand riks, this nectar has been raised. As butter from curds and fire from wood, even this has been raised for the sake of my son—this that constitutes the knowledge of all truly wise men.

This discourse, O son, replete with solid instruction, is intended for delivery to Snatakas. It should never be imparted to one who is not of a tranquil Soul, or one who is not self-restrained, or one who has not undergone penances.

It should not be communicated to one who is not conversant with the Vedas, one who does not humbly wait upon one's preceptor, one who is not free from malice, one who is not possessed of sincerity and candour, or one who is of reckless behaviour. It should never be communicated to one whose intellect has been consumed by the science of argumentation, or one that is vile or low.

To that person, however, who is possessed of fame, or who deserves applause for his virtues, or who is of a tranquil Soul, or possessed of ascetic merit, to such a Brahmana, to one's son or obedient disciple, this discourse containing the very essence of duties should be communicated, but on no account should it be imparted to others.

If any person makes a gift of the whole earth with all her treasures, to one conversant with truth, the gyani would still regard the gift of this knowledge to be very much superior to that gift.

I will now speak to you on a subject that is a greater mystery than this, a subject that is connected with the Soul, that transcends the ordinary understandings of human beings, that has been beheld by the foremost of Rishis, that has been treated in the Upanishads, and that forms the topic of your inquiry.

Tell me what, after this is in your mind? Tell me if you still have any queries? Listen, for here I am, O son, faces turned towards all directions. The sun and the moon are seated before you! On what indeed, can I once more speak to you?"

Suka said, “O illustrious one, O foremost of Rishis, once again speak to me on Adhyatma more elaborately. Tell me what, indeed, is Adhyatma and where does it come from?’

Vyasa said, “Listen, O son, as I explain to you regarding Adhyatma with reference to human beings.

Earth, water, light, wind and space are the great entities that form the component parts of all creatures, and, though really one, are yet regarded different from one and others like the waves and the ocean.

Like a tortoise stretching out its limbs and withdrawing them again, these great entities, by dwelling in numberless small forms, undergo transformations called creation and destruction. This whole universe of mobile and immobile objects has for its component parts these five entities. Everything, in respect of its creation and destruction, is referable to this pancha tattva.

These five entities occur in all existent things. The creator of all things, however, has made an unequal distribution of those entities by placing them in different things in different proportions for serving different ends.”

Suka said, “How may one succeed in understanding this unequal distribution of the five great entities in the diverse things of the universe? Which amongst them are the senses and which the attributes? How may this be understood?”

Vyasa said, “I shall explain you this duly one after another. Listen intently to the subject as I elaborate how what I have said actually happens.

Sound, the sense of hearing, and all the cavities within the body—these three—have space for their origin. The vital breaths, the action of the limbs and touch form the attributes of the wind. Form, eyes and the digestive fire within the stomach, are originated by light. Taste, the tongue, and all the humours—these three—are from water. Scent, the nose and the body—these three—are the attributes of earth. These, then, as I have elucidated, are the variations of the five great entities with senses.

Touch is said to be the attribute of the wind; taste of water; form of light. Sound is said to have its origin in space, and scent is said to be the property of earth.

The mind, intellect and nature—these three—spring from their own previous states, and attaining at each rebirth a position higher than the attributes which form their respective objects, do not transcend those attributes.

As the tortoise stretches out its limbs and withdraws them once again within itself, even so the intellect creates the senses and once again withdraws them into itself.

The consciousness of personal identity that arises in respect of that which is above the soles of the feet and below the crown of the head, is principally because of the action of the intellect.

It is the intellect that is transformed into the five attributes of form, scent and the rest. Just as it is also transformed into the five senses with the mind for the sixth.

When the intellect is absent, where are the attributes?

In man there are five senses. The mind is called the sixth sense. The intellect is called the seventh. The Soul is the eighth.

The eyes and the other senses are for only receiving impressions of form, scent and all. The mind exists to question the accuracy of those impressions. The intellect settles those doubts.

The Soul is said only to witness every operation without mingling with them.

Rajas, tamas, and sattva—these three—arise from their own counterparts. These exist equal in all creatures, deities, human beings and all. These are called attributes and should be known by the actions they induce.

As regards those actions all such states in which one becomes conscious of oneself as united with cheerfulness or joy and which are tranquil and pure, should be known as due to the attribute of sattva.

All such states in either the body or the mind, as are united with sorrow, should be regarded as because of the influence of the attribute called rajas.

All such states again as exist with astonishment of the senses, the mind or the intellect whose cause is unascertainable, and which are incomprehensible by either reasons or inward light, should be known as ascribable to the action of tamas.

Delight, cheerfulness, joy, equanimity, contentment of heart, from any known cause or arising otherwise, are all effects of the attribute of sattva.

Pride, untruthfulness of speech, cupidity, bewilderment, vindictiveness, whether arising from any known cause or otherwise, are indications of the quality of rajas.

Stupefaction of judgement, heedlessness, sleep, lethargy and indolence, from whatever cause these may arise, are to be known as indications of the quality of tamas."

CANTO 248

Vyasa said, “The mind creates within itself numerous ideas of objects or existent things. The intellect settles which is which. The heart discriminates which is agreeable and which is disagreeable. These are the three forces that motivate actions.

The objects of the senses are superior to the senses. The mind is superior to those objects. The intellect is superior to the mind. The Soul is regarded as superior to the intellect. As regards the ordinary purposes of man, the intellect is his Soul.

When the intellect, of its own accord, forms ideas of objects within itself, it then comes to be called the mind. Out of the senses being different from one another both in respect of their objects and the manner of their operation, the intellect which is identical presents different aspects as a result of its different qualifications.

When it hears, it becomes the organ of hearing, and when it touches, it becomes the organ of touch. Similarly, when it sees, it becomes the organ of vision, and when it tastes, it becomes the organ of taste, and when it smells, it becomes the organ of scent.

It is the intellect that appears under different guises for different functions by adaptation. It is the qualifications of the intellect that are called the senses. Over them is placed as their presiding overseer, the invisible Soul.

Residing in the body, the intellect exists in the three states of sattva, rajas and tamas. Sometimes it obtains cheerfulness, sometimes it gives way to grief; and sometimes its condition becomes such that it is united with neither cheerfulness nor grief. The intellect, however, whose main function is to create entities, transcends those three states even as the ocean, that lord of the rivers, prevails against the mighty river currents that fall into it.

When the intellect craves for anything, it is known as the mind. The senses again, though apparently different, should all be taken as included within the aforementioned.

The senses, which are engaged in bearing impressions of form, scent and the rest, should all be subdued. When a particular sense becomes subservient to the manas, the intellect though in reality not different from that sense, enters the mind in the form of existent things. Also, this is what happens with the senses sequentially with reference to the ideas that are said to be apprehended by them.

All the three states—sattva, rajas and tamas—inhere to these three, the mind, intellect and consciousness, and like the spokes of a wheel acting out of their attachment to the circumference of the wheel, they follow the different objects that exist in the mind, intellect and consciousness.

The mind must make a lamp of the senses for dispelling the darkness that shuts out the knowledge of the Supreme Soul. This knowledge that is acquired by yogins specifically with the help of yoga, is acquired without any exceptional efforts by men that abstain from worldly objects.

The universe is of this nature, it is only a creation of the intellect. The man of knowledge, therefore, is never bewildered by attachment to things of this world. Such a man never grieves, never rejoices and is free from envy.

The Soul is incapable of being seen with the aid of the senses whose nature is to wander among all earthly objects of desire. Even righteous men, whose senses are pure, fail to behold the Soul, what then should be said of the wicked whose senses are impure?

When, however, a man, with the help of his mind, tightly holds their reins, it is then that his Soul discovers itself like an object in darkness appearing to the view due to the light of a lamp. Indeed, as all things become visible when darkness is dispelled, even the Soul becomes visible when the darkness that covers it is removed.

As an aquatic fowl, though moving on water, remains dry, similarly the emancipated yogin, is never soiled by the imperfections of the three attributes of sattva, rajas and tamas.

Likewise, the wise man who enjoys all earthly objects without being attached to any of them, is never stained by faults of any kind that arise in the case of others from such enjoyment.

Having duly performed his duties in accordance with the preceding three stages of life he who finally avoids actions, and thereafter takes delight in the one really existent entity, the Soul; who has constituted himself the Soul of all created beings; and who succeeds in keeping himself aloof from the three attributes, gains an intellect and senses that are created by the Soul.

The qualities are incapable of apprehending the Soul. The Soul, however, apprehends them always. The Soul is the witness that beholds the qualities and duly calls them up into being. Note, this is the difference between the intellect and the Soul, both of which are exceedingly subtle. One of them creates the qualities. The other never creates them.

Though they are different from each other by nature, yet they are always united. The fish living in the water is different from the element in which it lives. But as the fish and the water forming its home are always united, likewise sattva and kshetrajna exist in a state of union.

The gnat born within a rotten fig is really not the fig but different from it. Nevertheless, as the gnat and the fig are seen to be united with each other, even so are sattva and kshetrajna.

As the blade in a clump of grass, though distinct from the clump, nevertheless exists in a state of union with it, even so these two, though different from each other, each existing in its own self, are to be seen in a state of constant union."

Vyasa said, “The objects by which one is surrounded are created by the intellect. The Soul, without being connected with them, stands aloof, presiding over them. It is the intellect that creates all objects. The three primary qualities are continually being influenced for the creation of objects.

The kshetrajna or Soul, endued with energy, presides, over them all, without, however, mingling with them. The objects which the intellect creates partake of its own nature. Indeed, as the spider creates threads which partakes of its own material substance, the objects created by the intellect partake of the nature of the intellect.

Some maintain that the attributes, when driven away by yoga or knowledge, do not cease to exist. They say this because when once gone, the indications only of their return are not perceptible. But that is no evidence of their actual destruction.

Others say that when dispelled by knowledge, they are at once destroyed, never to return. Reflecting upon these two opinions properly, one should strive one’s best according to the way one deems to be proper. In this manner one should solely attain eminence and take refuge in one’s own Soul.

The Soul is without beginning and without end. Comprehending his Soul properly, man should move and act, without giving way to wrath, without indulging in joy, and always free from envy.

Severing by this means the knot that is in one's heart, the knot whose existence is out of the operation of the faculties of the intellect, which is hard to untie or cut, but which nevertheless can be destroyed with knowledge; one should live happily, without giving way to any grief, and with one's misgivings dispelled.

Know that they who mingle in the affairs of this world are as distressed in body and mind as persons ignorant of the art of swimming when they slip from the land and fall into a large and deep river. The man of learning, however, being conversant with the truth, is never distressed, for he feels like one walking over solid land.

Indeed, he who apprehends his Soul to be such, as presenting only the character of Chitta which has knowledge alone for its indication, is never distressed.

Indeed, in this manner, comprehending the origin and end of all creatures, and so apprehending their inequalities or distinctions, one succeeds in attaining high felicity. This knowledge is the possession of a Brahmana specially by virtue of his birth.

Knowledge of the Soul, and happiness like that which has been referred to, are each fully sufficient to lead to emancipation. By acquiring such knowledge one really becomes learned.

What else is the indication of a person of knowledge? Having acquired such knowledge, they that are wise among men regard themselves crowned with success and become emancipated.

Those things that become sources of fear to men destitute of knowledge do not become sources of fear to those that are endued with knowledge. There is no end higher than the eternal end which is obtained by a person possessed of knowledge.

One considers with aversion all earthly objects of enjoyment which are, of course, replete with faults of every kind. While another, watching others taking pleasure of such objects, is filled with sorrow. In this matter, however, those who know both the objects, regard, that which is fictitious and that which is not so, never indulge in sorrow and are truly happy.

That which one does without expectation of fruits destroys one's actions of a previous life. The actions, however, of such a person both of this and his previous life cannot lead to emancipation. On the other hand, such destruction of earlier deeds and such efforts of this life cannot lead to what is disagreeable, hell, even if the man of wisdom engages in actions."

Suka said, “Let your reverence tell me of that which is the foremost of all duties, indeed, of that duty above which no higher one exists in this world.”

Vyasa said, “I shall now tell you of duties having a very ancient origin and laid down by the Rishis, duties that are distinguished above all others. Listen to me with undivided attention.

The senses that are maddening should carefully be restrained by the intellect like a father restraining his own inexperienced children liable to fall into diverse evil habits. The withdrawal of the mind and the senses from all unworthy objects and their due concentration upon worthy objects is the highest penance. That is the foremost of all duties. Indeed, that is said to be the highest duty.

Directing, with the help of the intellect, the senses having the mind for their sixth, and without, indeed, thinking of worldly objects which have the virtue of inspiring innumerable kinds of thought, one should live contented with one’s own self.

When the senses and the mind, withdrawn from the pastures among which they usually graze, come back for residing in their proper abode, it is then that you will witness in your own self the eternal and Supreme Soul.

Those exalted Brahmanas that are wise, succeed in perceiving that Supreme and Universal Soul which is akin to a blazing fire in effulgence.

As a large tree provided with numerous branches and possessed of many flowers and fruits does not know in which part it has flowers and in which it has fruits, likewise the Soul as adapted by birth and other attributes, does not know from where it has come and where it is to go.

There is, however, an inner self, which witnesses everything. One sees the Soul with the help of the lamp of knowledge. Witnessing, therefore, yourself with your own self, cease to regard your body as yourself and attain mukti.

Cleansed of all sins, like a snake that has cast off its skin, one attains high intelligence here and becomes free from every anxiety and the obligation of acquiring a new body in a subsequent birth.

Its current spreading in diverse directions, frightful is this river of life bearing the world onward in its course. The five senses are its crocodiles. The mind and its purposes are the shores. Cupidity and stupefaction of judgement are the grass and straw that float on it, covering its bosom.

Lust and wrath are the fierce reptiles that live in it. Truth forms the tirtha by its miry banks. Falsehood forms its surges, anger its mire. Rising from the unmanifest, rapid are its currents, which cannot be crossed by men of tainted Souls. With the help of the intellect do you cross that river with desires for its alligators.

The world and its concerns comprise the ocean towards which that river runs. Genus and species form its unfathomable depth that none can understand. One's birth, O child, is the source from which that stream takes its rise. Speech constitutes its eddies.

Difficult to cross, only men of learning and wisdom and intellect succeed in crossing it. Crossing it, you will succeed in freeing yourself from every attachment, acquiring a tranquil heart, knowing the self and becoming pure in every respect. Relying on a purged and elevated intellect, you will succeed in becoming Brahma's self.

Having dissociated yourself from every worldly attachment, having acquired a purified Soul and transcending every kind of sin, look you upon the world like a person looking from the mountain top upon creatures creeping below on the earth's surface.

Without giving way to wrath or joy, and without forming any cruel wish, you will succeed in beholding the origin and the destruction of all created objects. They that are endued with wisdom regard such an action to be the foremost of all things. Indeed, this act of crossing the river of life is regarded by the foremost of righteous persons, by ascetics conversant with the truth, to be the highest of all actions that one can accomplish.

This knowledge of the all-pervading self is intended to be imparted to one's son. It should be inculcated to one who is of restrained senses, is honest in behaviour and who is docile or submissive. This knowledge of the self, of which I have just now spoken to you, O child, and the evidence of whose truth is furnished by the self itself, is a mystery—indeed, the greatest of all mysteries, and the very highest knowledge that one can attain.

Brahman has no sex—male, female or neuter. It is neither sorrow nor happiness. It has for its essence the past, the future and the present. Whatever one's sex, male or female, the person who attains the knowledge of Brahman has never to undergo rebirth. This duty of yoga is inculcated to attain exemption from rebirth.

These words that I have used for answering your question lead to emancipation in the same way as the myriad other opinions advanced by diverse sages that have addressed this subject. I have explicated the subject to you in the appropriate manner. Those opinions sometimes produce fruit and sometimes not.

The words, however, that I have used are of a different kind, for these are sure to lead to success. For this reason, O good child, a preceptor, when asked by a contented, meritorious and self-restrained son or disciple, should, with a delighted heart, instil, according to their true import, these instructions that I have imparted for the benefit of you, my son!"

Vyasa said, "One should not show any affection for scents and tastes and other kinds of enjoyment. Nor should one accept ornaments and other articles contributing to the enjoyment of the senses of scent and taste. One should not covet honour and achievements and fame. Such is the behaviour of a Brahmana possessed of vision.

He who has studied all the Vedas, having waited dutifully on his guru and observed the vow of brahmacharya, he who knows all the Rik, Yajuses and Samans, is not a reborn person.

One who behaves towards all creatures as if one is their kinsman, and one who is acquainted with Brahman, is said to be conversant with all the Vedas.

One that is divested of desire being contented with knowledge of the Soul, never dies. It is by such a behaviour and such a frame of mind that one becomes a truly reborn person.

Having performed only various kinds of religious rites and diverse sacrifices completed with the gift of Dakshina, one does not acquire the status of a Brahmana if he is devoid of compassion and has not given up desire.

When one ceases to fear all creatures and when all creatures cease to fear one, when one never desires anything nor cherishes aversion for anything, then one is said to attain the status of a Brahmana. When one abstains from injuring all creatures in thought, speech and action, then he is said to acquire the status of a Brahmana.

There is only one kind of bondage in this world, the bondage of desire, and no other. One that is freed from the bondage of desire attains the status of a Brahmana.

Freed from desire like the moon that has emerged from murky clouds, the man of wisdom, purged of all stains, lives in patient expectation of his time.

The one in whose mind all sorts of desire enter like diverse streams falling into the ocean without being able to enhance its limits by their load, succeeds in obtaining tranquillity, but not he who cherishes desire for all earthly objects.

Such a person becomes happy in consequence of the fruition of all his wishes, and not he who cherishes desire for earthly objects. The aspirer, even if he attains heaven, has to fall away from it.

The Vedas have truth for their recondite object. Truth has the subjugation of the senses for its concealed aspiration. The subjugation of the senses has charity for its ideal intent. Charity has penance for its mysterious goal. Penance has renunciation for its transcendental objective. Renunciation has happiness for its inner end. Happiness has heaven for its subtle aim. Heaven has tranquillity for its exquisite goal.

For the sake of contentment, you should wish to obtain a serene intellect which is a precious possession, being indicative of emancipation, and which, scorching grief and all purposes or doubts together with yearning, destroys them completely in the end.

One possessed of those six attributes, contentment, happiness, freedom from attachment, peacefulness, cheerfulness and freedom from envy, is sure to become full or complete.

They that, transcending all consciousness of the body, know the self which resides within the body and which is understood by only the wise with the aid of the six aforementioned entities, the Vedas and truth and the rest; when endowed with only the attribute of sattva, and with the aid also of the other three, instruction, meditation and yoga, succeed in attaining moksha.

The man of wisdom, by understanding the self which presides within the body, which is divested of the attributes of birth and death, which exists in its own nature, which being divested of attributes requires no action of purification, and which is identical with Brahman, enjoys beatitude that knows no end.

The fulfilment that the man of wisdom gains by restraining his mind from wandering in all directions and fixing it wholly on the self is such that it cannot be attained by one through any other means.

He is said to be truly conversant with the Vedas who is conversant with that which satiates one whose stomach is empty, which pleases one who is penniless and which invigorates one whose limbs are withered.

Suspending his senses that have been duly restrained from unworthy indulgence, he who lives engaged in yoga-dhyana is a Brahmana. Such a person is distinguished above others. Such a person derives his joys from the self.

With regard to one who lives after having weakened desire and devoting himself to the highest subject of existence, it should be said that his happiness is continuously enhanced like the lunar disc in the lighted fortnight.

Like the sun dispelling darkness, felicity dispels the sorrows of that yogin who transcends both the gross and the subtle elements, as also mahat and the unmanifest.

Decrepitude and death cannot assail that Brahmana who has got beyond the sphere of actions, who has transcended the destruction of the gunas themselves, and who is no longer attached to worldly objects.

Indeed, when the yogin, freed from everything, lives in a state transcending both attachment and aversion, he is said to transcend even in this life his senses and all their objects.

That yogin, who having transcended Prakriti attains the highest cause, becomes freed from the obligation of rebirth because of his having attained that which is the highest."

CANTO 252

Vyasa said, “For a disciple wishes to enquire after emancipation after having transcended duality and accomplished the concerns of both profit and religion, an accomplished teacher should first recount all that has been said in the foregoing Canto, which is elaborate, on the subject of Adhyatma.

Space, wind, fire, water and earth counted as the fifth, and bhava, abhava and Kaala, exist in all living creatures having the five for their constituent ingredients.

Space is an unoccupied interval. The organs of hearing consist of space. One conversant with the science of entities endued with form should know that space has sound for its attribute.

The feet that assist movement have wind for their essence. The vital breaths are made of wind. The sense of touch, skin, has wind for its essence, and touch is the attribute of wind.

Heat, the digestive fire in the stomach, light that discovers all things, the warmth that is in the body, and vision counted as the fifth, are all of fire which has the form of diverse colours for its attribute.

Liquefied discharges, solubility and all kinds of fluids are of water. Blood, marrow and all else in the body that is cool, should be known to have water for their essence. The tongue is the sense of taste, and taste is regarded as the attribute of water.

All solid substances are of earth, as also bones, teeth, nails; facial, head and body hair, nerves, sinews and skin. The nose is called the sense of scent. The object of that sense, scent, should be known as the attribute of earth.

Each subsequent element possesses the attribute or attributes of the preceding one besides its own. In all living creatures again are the three supplementary entities, avidya, kama and karma.

In this way did the Rishis declare the five elements and the effects and attributes flowing from or belonging to them.

The mind forms the ninth in the count, and the intellect is regarded as the tenth. The Soul, which is infinite, is called the eleventh. It is regarded as all this and as the highest.

The mind has doubt for its essence. The intellect discriminates and causes certainty. The infinite Soul, becomes known as jiva invested with body, or Jivatman, through consequences derived from actions.

He who perceives the entire assemblage of living creatures to be unstained, though endowed with all these entities having time for their essence, has never to revert to actions affected by error."

Vyasa said, “Those that are conversant with the scriptures discern, with the help of actions laid down in the scriptures, the Soul which is clothed in an exceedingly subtle body and which is dissociated from the gross body in which it resides.

As the rays of the sun that course in dense masses through every part of the firmament cannot be seen by the naked eye though their existence can be inferred by reason, similarly, existent beings freed from gross bodies and wandering in the universe are beyond the ken of human vision.

As the blazing reflection of the sun is seen in water, likewise the yogin observes the reflection of the self within gross bodies.

All those Souls as well, that are encased in subtle forms after being freed from the gross bodies in which they resided, are perceptible to yogins who have conquered their senses and are gifted with knowledge of the self. Indeed, aided by their own Souls, yogins behold those invisible beings.

Whether asleep or awake, during the day as in the night, they who apply themselves to yoga after dismissing all the creations of the mind and the rajas born of actions, as even the very power that yoga creates, succeed in keeping their linga form under complete control.

The jiva that dwells in such yogins, always endued with the seven subtle entities, mahat, consciousness, and the five tanmatras of the five elemental entities, roams in all regions of bliss, freed from decrepitude and death. I say ‘always’, and ‘freed from death’ only in accordance with the common form of speech, for in reality, that linga form is terminable.

He, however, who without having been able to transcend them is under the influence of his mind and intellect; discriminates, even in his dreams, his own body from that of another and experiences even then both pleasure and pain.

Yes, in even his dreams he enjoys happiness and suffers misery; and yielding to wrath and cupidity, meets with calamities of various kinds.

In his dreams he acquires great wealth and feels highly gratified: accomplishes meritorious deeds, and sees, hears and all, as he does in his wakeful hours.

Wonderful it is to note that jiva, which has to lie within the uterus and amid much internal heat, and which has to pass a period of full ten months in that place, is not digested and reduced to destruction like food within the stomach.

Men overwhelmed by the qualities of rajas and tamas never succeed in seeing within the gross body: the jiva, the Soul which is a portion of the Supreme Soul of transcendent effulgence and which lies within the heart of every creature.

They take to the science of yoga for the purpose of obtaining knowledge of that self transcending the inanimate and gross body, the imperceptible linga body and the karana body that is not destroyed on the occasion of even the universal destruction.

Amongst the duties that have been laid down for the different modes of life including sannyasa, these to which I have referred, having yoga for their foremost, and which imply a cessation of every operation of the mind and the intellect, have been laid down by Sandilya in the Chandogya Upanishad.

Having fathomed the seven subtle entities,; the senses, the objects of the mind, mind, intellect, mahat, unmanifest or Prakriti, and Purusha, having comprehended also the supreme cause of the universe with the six attributes—omniscience, contentment, unlimited comprehension, independence, eternal wakefulness and omnipotence—and lastly, having understood that the universe is only a modification of avidya endued with the three qualities; guided by the scriptures, one witnesses divine Brahma.”

Vyasa said, "There is a wonderful tree, called Desire, in the heart of a man. It is born of the seed called Error. Wrath and pride constitute its large trunk. The wish for action is the water-bearing trough at its base. Ignorance is the root of that tree, and heedlessness is the water that gives it sustenance.

Envy constitutes its leaves. The evil actions of past lives supply it with vigour. Loss of judgement and anxiety are its twigs; grief forms its large branches; and fear is its sprout. Thirst for diverse objects forms the creepers that twine round it on every side.

Excessively greedy men, bound in chains of iron, sitting around that fruit-yielding tree, sing its praises, in expectation of gaining its fruit. He who, unshackling those chains, cuts down that tree and seeks to terminate both sorrow and joy, succeeds in attaining the end of both. A fool who nourishes this tree by indulgence in the objects of the senses is destroyed by those very objects in which he indulges, like a poisonous pill, destroys the patient to whom it is administered.

A dexterous person, however, with the help of yoga, forcibly rips and cuts with the sword of samadhi, the far-reaching root of this tree. One who knows that the end of all actions undertaken from only the desire of fruit is rebirth or chains that bind, succeeds in transcending all sorrow.

The body is said to be a city. The intellect is said to be its mistress. The mind dwelling within the body is the minister, of that mistress, whose essential function is to decide. The senses are the citizen that are employed by the mind to serve the mistress.

For encouraging these citizens, the mind displays a strong inclination for actions of diverse kinds. In the matter of these tasks, two great faults are visible, tamas and rajas.

Upon the fruits of these deeds rest those citizens along with the leaders of the city, the mind, intellect and consciousness. The two faults earlier mentioned, live upon the fruits of those actions that are accomplished by forbidden means.

This being the case, the intellect, which of itself is unconquerable by either rajas or tamas, descends to a state of equality with the mind by becoming as much tainted as the mind that serves it. In turn the senses, agitated by the stained mind, lose their own stability.

Thinking them to be beneficial, the objects that the intellect tries to acquire, ultimately generate grief and are destroyed. Having been destroyed, these objects, are recollected by the mind, and accordingly they afflict the mind even after they are lost.

The intellect is afflicted at the same time, for the mind is said to be different from the buddhi only when the manas is considered in respect of its chief function of receiving impressions about whose certainty it is no judge. In reality, however, the mind is identical with the intellect.

The rajas, productive of only sorrow and evil of every kind, that is in the intellect; then overwhelms the Soul which lies over the rajas-stained intellect, like an image upon a mirror.

It is the mind that first allies with rajas. Having done so, it seizes the Soul, the intellect and the senses—like a deceitful minister in conspiracy with a foe, seizes the king and the citizens, and hands them over to rajas with which it has forged an alliance."

CANTO 255

Bhishma says, 'Listen once again, O son, O sinless one, with feelings of great pride, to the words that fell from the lips of the island-born Rishi on the subject of the enumeration of the entities.

Like unto a blazing fire for having transcended all ignorance, the great Rishi said these words to his son who resembled a fire wrapped in smoke. Instructed by what he said, I also will again expound to you that knowledge which dispels ignorance.

The properties possessed by earth are immobility, weight, hardness, productiveness, scent, density, the capacity to absorb scents of all kinds, cohesion, habitableness and that attribute of the mind which is called patience.

The properties of water are coolness, taste, moisture, liquidity, softness, agreeableness, tongue, fluidity, the capacity to be congealed and the power to melt many earthly products.

The properties of fire are irresistible energy, inflammability, heat, the capacity to soften, light, sorrow, disease, speed, fury and invariably upward motion.

The properties of the wind are touch that is neither hot nor cool, the capacity to assist the organ of speech, independence of motion, strength, celerity, the power to assist all kinds of emission or discharge, the power to raise other objects, breaths inhaled and exhaled, life as the attribute of Chitta and birth, including death.

The properties of space are sound, extension, the capacity of being enclosed, the absence of refuge for resting upon—the absence of all necessity for such refuge, the status of being unmanifest, the capacity for accommodation, the incapacity for producing resistance, the material cause for producing the sense of hearing and the empty cavities of the human body.

These, as stated, are the fifty properties, that constitute the essence of the five elementary entities. Patience, reasoning or disputation, remembrance, forgetfulness or error, imagination, endurance, propensity towards good or evil, and restlessness—these are the properties of the mind. Destruction of both good and evil thoughts, dreamless sleep, perseverance, concentration, decision and ascertainment of all things resting upon direct evidence, constitute the five properties of the intellect.'

Yudhishtira says, 'How can the intellect be said to have five properties? How again, can the five senses be spoken of as properties of the five elementary entities? Please clarify, O Pitamaha, all this that seems to be very abstruse.'

Bhishma says, 'The intellect is said to possess altogether sixty properties, as it includes the five elements. All those properties exist in a state of union with the Soul.

The Vedas declare, O son, that the elements, their fifty properties together with the mind and the intellect and their fourteen properties are all created by Him who is above all deterioration. These seventy-one entities, therefore, are not eternal like the Soul.

The theories contradicting the revelation, that have in the previous Vedas been placed before you, O son; about the origin of the universe and its other incidents, are all defective in the eye of reason. Carefully attending, however, in this world to all that I have said to you about the Supreme Brahma, you should, after attaining the power that the knowledge of Brahma offers, seek to win tranquillity of heart.'

Yudhishtira says, 'These once mighty lords of the earth now lie lifeless on the ground amidst their slain hosts. Every one of these great kings was as strong as ten thousand elephants.

Men of equal prowess killed them all; no one else in the world could have done so, for such was their tejas. They, who were also so wise, now lie dead on bare ground.

Of terrible prowess, all these kings are dead. I have a question: what gives rise to life and death? Who is it that dies? Is it the gross body, the subtle body or the soul? Why does death take away living beings? O Pitamaha, tell me this!'

Bhishma says, 'In the Krita yuga, O son, there was a king named Anukampaka. His enemies decimated his chariots, elephants, horses and men. His son, Hari, equal to Narayana in strength, was slain in that battle along with all his followers and troops. The vanquished, grief-stricken king took to a life of peace.

One day, while wandering aimlessly, he met the Rishi Narada to whom he narrated all that had happened. Narada then told him the following story to dispel his grief at his son's death.

Narada said, "Listen now, O Rajan, to an ancient tale, which I myself once heard.

When he first created the universe, Brahma created a large number of immortal beings. These multiplied vastly, and none of them or their progeny was subject to death. Living creatures populated every inch of the universe. Choked with living beings, the three worlds became breathless. Brahma wondered how he should destroy the multiplying beings, but he could not find any solution to his quandary.

This enraged Brahma so much, O Rajan, that a fire leapt from his body, and burnt all the habitats of the universe. Indeed, the inferno scorched heaven and earth, the firmament and the whole universe along with all living beings, chala and achala.

Thereupon, the divine Sthanu, lord of the Vedas, was moved to pity and sought to appease Brahma. When Shiva approached Brahma, that blazing lord turned to him and said, 'You deserve my boons. I will grant whatever your heart desires.'

Sthanu said, ‘Lord, I appeal to you on behalf of all created beings. Do not be angry with them, O Brahma! Look how the fire of your tejas consumes them all. I am filled with compassion at their plight. Have mercy on them, O lord of the universe.’

Brahma said, ‘Neither am I angry, nor is it my wish to destroy creation. I do this only to lighten the burden of the earth. Overburdened with creatures, Bhumi Devi beseeched me, Mahadeva, to destroy them, for otherwise she would sink beneath the waters and be lost. When even after deep deliberation, I could not find a way to help her, fury seized my heart.’

Shiva said, ‘Do not give way to fury, O lord of the Devas. Be pacified. Do not destroy these mortal and immortal beings. The lakes, grasses and herbs, immobile and mobile creatures face destruction. Your anger will denude the entire universe. Be calmed, O divine lord! O, you of dharma, this is the boon that I plead from you.

If you continue to destroy them, all these creatures will become extinct. So, be merciful, O Brahma, let these living beings and their progeny live on.

You made me Pasupati, the guardian of living creatures. I beseech you, O God of gods, to allow these beings to live on, on earth, in a cycle of births and deaths.’” Narada continued, “Pacified by what Shiva said, Brahma grew calm. Withdrawing the apocalyptic fire into himself, Brahma now ordained that all creatures would experience both birth and death.

Then, from the pores of Brahma's body, emerged a woman attired in robes of black and red and stood at his right. With black eyes and black palms, she wore wondrous earrings, and divine ornaments.

Both the great gods gazed upon her, O king, then Brahma greeted her and said, 'O Mrityu, slay these creatures of the universe. You are here because of my wrath and resolve to annihilate all creatures. Go forth, O Devi, kill them all without exception. At my command you will win great prosperity.'

At these words, Mrityu Devi, who wore a garland of lotuses, shed copious tears, which she held in her palms, O Rajan, and did not let them fall to the ground. Wishing the weal of mankind, she pleaded with Brahma."

Narada said, "The large-eyed Devi composed herself and with joined hands and bending in humility like some exquisite vine, said to Brahma, 'How will a woman like me, who has emerged from you, accomplish such a terrible feat, which will fill all living creatures with dread? I fear to do anything that is unjust. Appoint such work for me as befits dharma. You see that I am frightened.

Oh, spare me. I will not be able to cut down infants, youths and the aged, who have done me no harm. O lord of all creatures, I beg you, show mercy. I cannot slay dear sons, beloved friends, brothers, mothers and fathers. If these die at my hands, their surviving relatives will surely curse me. Their tears will burn me for eternity. The prospect fills me with horror.

I seek your protection. All sinful creatures that I kill will sink into the infernal regions. I seek to appease you, O boon-giving lord! Extend your grace to me, puissant Brahma. I seek this boon for all the worlds. O lord of all the gods, grant me leave to perform severe tapasya.'

Brahma said, 'O Mrityu, I have assigned to you the task of destroying all creatures. Go, and set yourself to your task. Do not reflect upon what you must accomplish. This must be done. It cannot be otherwise. O sinless one, O Devi of faultless limbs, go forth and fulfil my command.'

Thus addressed, O Mahabaho, Mrityu humbly stood there in silence with her eyes turned towards the mighty lord of all creatures. Brahma exhorted her repeatedly, but the Devi seemed to be without life. Seeing her so, the creator fell silent. Indeed, the Svayambhu became pleased with her. With a smile, the lord of all the worlds gazed upon the universe.

When Brahma subdued his wrath, Mrityu, without the promise to destroy the living, quickly left his side. She went, O king, to the sacred place called Dhenuka. There, the Devi stood upon one foot and practiced the severest austerities for fifteen billion years.

After her tapasya was over, Brahma of great energy once more said to her, 'Go forth and perform my bidding, O Mrityu!'

However, the Devi disregarded his command, and standing on one foot began another tapasya that lasted twenty billion years. Later, O son, she led a life in the forest with its denizens for another ten thousand billion years. Additionally, she passed twenty thousand years, subsisting just on air for sustenance. Furthermore, O monarch, she observed a mowna vrata of silence, standing in water for eight thousand years. Then, she went to the Kausiki river, where she passed her days with only water and air for sustenance.

Then, O king, the blessed Devi went to the Ganga and to the mountains of Meru. There, in order to do good to all living creatures, she stood as still as a block of wood. On the summit of Himavat, where the Devas perform great yagnas, Mrityu stood on her toes, in order to please Brahma, for another hundred billion years.

The creator and destroyer of the universe went to her and spoke to her once again, 'With what are you engaged, O daughter? Carry out my command.'

The Devi once more replied, 'I cannot slay living creatures, O lord! I want to please you so that I may be relieved of this horrible task.'

She was frightened at the prospect of sin and prayed she may not obey his command. Brahma silenced her, and repeated, 'No sin will accrue to you, O Mrityu. Go forth, O auspicious Devi, set yourself to your task. You cannot contravene what I have said, O gentle, amiable one. Eternal dharma will now take refuge in you. All the Devas and I will ever engage ourselves in the quest for your weal. I will grant all your other wishes.

Disease will afflict the living, and you will bear the blame for their death. You will become a male in all male beings, a female in all female beings, and a eunuch in all those of the third sex.'

When the Devi heard Brahma, she joined her hands to the exalted lord, and said, 'I cannot obey your command.'

Brahma said again, ‘Mrityu, O Death, go forth and destroy! I declare that what you do will incur no sin, O auspicious one. The tears still cradled in your palms will take the form of terrible diseases and they, too, will destroy men when their time comes. At the end of the lives of living beings, you will launch desire and wrath against them. Immeasurable punya will be yours. You will incur no paapa, for you are so compassionate in your nature. Doing what I say, you will only observe dharma. Go, set your heart upon the task at hand, and command Kama and Krodha to slay all the living.’

Now, Mrityu feared Brahma’s curse and answered, ‘As you wish!’ From that time, she sent desire and wrath at the last hours of living beings to end their life-breaths. Her tears are the diseases that afflict humankind. Therefore, knowing this as the cause behind death, one should never give way to sorrow.

Just as the senses disappear in dreamless sleep and return upon awakening, with the dissolution of their bodies, all the living go to the other world and from there return to this world through rebirth, O Rajasimha.

Wind, imbued with terrible energy, mighty prowess and deafening roars, operates as the breath in all living creatures. Upon their death, prana escapes from the old and enters myriad new bodies. Hence, they call Vayu the lord of the senses, distinguished above the other elements.

When their punya is exhausted, the Devas, without exception, are born as mortals on earth. Similarly, when mortal creatures acquire sufficient merit, they attain the status of Devas. Therefore, O lion among kings, do not grieve for your son. He has attained swarga and enjoys great happiness there.

It was thus, O emperor, that Brahma created Mrityu, and she smites all beings at their hour of death. Her tears turn into diseases, and snatch away all living beings in their final hour.”’

Yudhishtira says, 'All men who live on earth have questions about the nature of dharma. What is this dharma? Where does it come from? Tell me this Pitamaha. Is it for use in this world or for the next? Or, is it for both here and the hereafter? I beseech you, tell me this!'

Bhishma says, 'The practice of sadachara—good conduct—the smritis, and the Vedas, are the three sources of dharma. Additionally, the learned say that the purpose behind an action is its fourth indication. The Rishis of antiquity have declared actions that are virtuous and divided them as superior or inferior, in point of merit. The laws of dharma are established for the conduct of the affairs of the world. In both the worlds, here and hereafter, dharma produces felicity and joy as its fruits.

Unable to acquire punya through subtle means, a sinner remains in sin. Some suggest that evildoers can never be free of their sins. In times of distress, one who even tells a lie acquires the merit of truthfulness, even as a man in a crisis, who performs an ignoble deed, gains the merit of virtue.

Good conduct is the refuge of dharma. It is an indication of honour. It is man's nature that he neither sees nor admits his own faults but notices and proclaims those of others. The thief spends his loot in actions of apparent virtue. In times of anarchy, he is happy to appropriate what belongs to others, but, when others rob him of his loot, he seeks their heads as punishment. Even when his indignation is at its highest, he secretly covets the wealth of those who are content with their own. When he is himself the victim of a robbery, he boldly stands at the king's gate without any guilt in his heart for his own sins.

To speak the truth is dharma. There is nothing higher than honesty. Veracity upholds everything, and everything rests upon satya. On principle, even sinful and ferocious men, who swear to keep honour amongst themselves, band together to go about their criminal business. If they betray one another, they would surely bring destruction upon themselves.

One should never take what belongs to others. Powerful men regard this as an eternal obligation created by the weak, but when fate serves misfortune to these powerful men, they hail the injunction. Furthermore, they who surpass others in strength or prowess do not necessarily become happy. Therefore, it is best not do any wrong. He who conducts himself in this way has no fear of dishonest men, thieves or the king.

The man, who follows ahimsa, lives fearlessly, with a pure heart. A thief fears everybody, like a deer driven from the woods into the midst of a village. He thinks others to be as sinful as himself. The chaste man is always full of joy and has no need to see his own sinfulness in others.

Good men say charity is a noble duty. The wealthy call it an idea born from the needy. However, when misfortune leads the same rich men into poverty, then the practice of charity recommends itself to them. Therefore, wealth does not necessarily meet with happiness.

He who knows pain should never do unto others what he dislikes done to himself. What can the lover of another man's wife possibly say to a person guilty of the same transgression? An adulterer cannot forgive what he himself does when he sees his wife with her lover. How can he who himself breathes prevent another from doing so by committing murder? Whatever wishes one entertains for oneself, one should certainly cherish for another.

A rich man should relieve the wants of the needy with his surplus wealth. This is why the creator ordained trade and other fair means to increase one's wealth. One should faithfully walk the path that leads to the Devas; the performance of yagnas and giving dana is also laudable. The Rishis have said that the accomplishment of goals by just and agreeable means is dharma.

O Yudhishtira this is what you must bear in mind to distinguish both dharma and adharma.

Once Brahma created Nyaya, justice, with the power to hold the world together. Dharma is liable to numerous restraints in order to acquire honour, which depends upon many delicate considerations.

I have now recounted the indications of dharma to you, O pinnacle of Kuru's race. Never set your heart on any sinful deed.'

CANTO 260

Yudhishtira says, 'You say dharma depends on delicate considerations, seen in the conduct of the virtuous. That it is fraught with restraints from numerous actions, and that the Vedas contain explanations for these. Still, I believe that I have a certain insight to help me discriminate between right and wrong.

You have answered many questions of mine. Yet, there is one question left that I will ask. It is not prompted, O Pitama, by a desire for empty debate. It seems to be the nature of all embodied beings, to be born, exist and eventually die. Dharma and its reverse, therefore, cannot be ascertained, O Bhaarata, through the study of the scriptures alone. The burden of a wealthy man is of one kind, while that of the poor man is of another. In times of adversity, how can one ascertain his duty through the scriptures alone?

You claim that the actions of the good constitute rectitude. Even so, it is from their actions that one ascertains the good. The definition, therefore, is based on ambiguity, so that the meaning of, "conduct of the virtuous", remains unclear.

We know how an ordinary person commits dishonourable deeds yet achieves respectability. We also know how an extraordinary person may achieve virtue even while he commits ignoble deeds. Additionally, those who know the shastras well have furnished proof that the ordinances of the Vedas dwindle and disappear gradually in every successive age. The duties in the Krita yuga are of one kind. Those in the Treta yuga are of another kind. In the Dwapara, they are quite different. And in the Kali age, they are entirely of another kind.

It seems, therefore, that dharma adapts to the nature and abilities of men in different yugas. When none of the declarations in the Vedas applies uniformly to all the ages, to say that the proclamations of the Vedas are true, is only a popular expression for the sake of general appeasement.

The claim that the smritis originate from the srutis is again very general and ambiguous. If the Vedas were the final authority on everything, then they would apply to the smritis also since they emanate from the srutis. When the srutis and the smritis contradict each other, how can either be authoritative? Yet we see wicked men in authority arrest certain courses of dharma, even discontinue them forever. Whether we know or do not, whether we can see it or not, the way of dharma is finer than the edge of a razor and grosser than even a mountain.

Dharma, in the form of sacrifices and rituals, at first appears as the romantic edifices of vapour seen in the distant sky. Under the scrutiny of the learned, it vanishes. Like small ponds or shallow aqueducts that quickly dry up, the eternal practices inculcated in the smritis weaken in the Kali yuga, and finally disappear.

In order to acquire honour, amongst evil men, those who perform tapasyas fraught with desire, are hypocrites who torment themselves falsely. It is the same with those who are urged by the wishes of others. Myriad others tread the same path, influenced by various selfish motives. Even so, such deeds, although accomplished under the influence of evil passions, are yet virtuous.

Fools say that dharma is an empty sound among the righteous. They ridicule such righteous men, and regard them as being mad. Then there are many great men, who abandon the duties of their own varna, to engage in the dharma of the Kshatriya varna. Therefore, no conduct can be universally lauded or condemned.

A certain course of conduct makes one man meritorious. The same way can deny merit to another man. Another man, who does as he pleases, remains unchanged. Thus, the conduct that acquires punyas for one man obstructs merit for another.

So, one may see how all courses of conduct appear to lose singleness of purpose and character. It seems, therefore, that only that which the ancient Rishis called dharma remains true to this day; and through the dharma, as declared by them, the distinctions and limitations have become eternal.'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to the ancient tale of the discourse on dharma, between Tuladhara and Jajali. There once lived a Brahmana named Jajali. He lived as a recluse in a forest, where he performed austere penances. Once, he went to the seashore to practice the most severe tapasya. He observed many vows, restraints and fasts; he clothed his body in rags and animal skins, matted locks adorned his head, his entire person was smeared with filth and clay. Thus, the sagacious Brahmana passed many years in silent dhyana. The twice-born Rishi was endowed with great tejas, O Rajan, and he lived in the sea. With a desire to see everything, he roamed through all the worlds with the speed of thought.

After he had seen all the earth, bounded by the ocean, adorned with rivers, lakes and woods, the hermit sat submerged in water, and began to ruminate thus: "In this world of animate and inanimate creatures there is none equal to me. Who can roam with me among the stars and planets in the firmament and also dwell within the waters?"

Unseen by the Rakshasas, the Pisachas said to him, "It does not befit you to speak so. There is a man named Tuladhara, who is a trader and has great wisdom and fame. Even he, O best of Dvijas, is not worthy of saying what you do."

Jajali replied, "I will see this famous Tuladhara who is so wise."

As soon as the Rishi spoke, the superhuman beings lifted him from the sea, and said, "O best of the twice-born, go along this road." Jajali travelled with a heavy heart to Varanasi, where he met Tuladhara.'

Yudhishtira interrupts his grandsire, 'Describe to me Jajali's arduous feats, O Pitamaha, which helped him acquire such high success.'

Bhishma replies, 'Jajali practiced the severest austerities. He performed ablutions morning and evening. Carefully tending his fires, he studied the Vedas earnestly. Adept with the duties laid down for forest hermits, Jajali blazed with effulgence.

He continued to live in the forest, engaged all the while in tapasya. Yet, he never thought of himself as one who had acquired any punya by what he did, although in the monsoons, he slept under the open sky, in autumn, he sat in water and in summer, he exposed himself to the sun and the wind.

He slept on diverse kinds of painful beds and on the bare earth. Once, it rained incessantly on his head as he stood under the open sky. There were jungles that he had to traverse constantly. Exposure to the rains and the mud tangled the sinless Rishi's hair into a thick jata.

Once, the Mahayogi abstained entirely from food, lived just upon air and stood in the forest like a post of wood, never moving. A pair of Kulinga birds, O Bhaarata, took him for the stump of a tree and built their nest on his head. Filled with compassion, the Maharishi remained and endured the feathery couple, which happily lived among his matted locks, into which they placed blades of grass.

The rains passed and autumn came. The birds, taken with desire, mated on the sage's head and laid their eggs there. Although Jajali was aware of what the birds had done, he remained. Firmly resolved to acquire punya, he would not disturb, let alone injure any creature.

Each day, the birds flew to and from his head. Mighty king, they lived there happily. When in time, the eggs matured and young ones emerged, the hatchlings began to grow in that, nest, while Jajali stood still. The Dharmarishi nurtured the young ones, as he stood motionless and rapt in dhyana.

In course of time, the Muni saw the young birds sprout wings and, along with the parent birds, he was delighted. Together with their young ones, the parent birds continued to live in the Rishi's head, in perfect safety.

Jajali soon watched the young birds take to the air each evening, and return to his head without going too far, and he stood rooted to the place. At times, he observed them leave without their parents and return by themselves. A while later, the young birds flew away in the morning, passed the whole day out of his sight, only to return to the nest in the evening, and Jajali never moved. Later, they left the nest for five days at a time, and returned on the sixth day. Jajali remained.

Later, when their strength was fully developed they left him and did not return for many days. Until at last, they flew away and did not return even after a month. It was then, O king, that Jajali finally moved from his place. When the birds had gone, Jajali wondered much, and thought that he had achieved ascetic success, and pride entered his heart. When the great yogi saw the birds leave after he had raised them on his head, he began to think highly of himself, and was filled with delight. He bathed in a stream, poured libations on the sacred fire, and worshipped the rising sun. Indeed, having encouraged the Kulinga birds to be born and grow on his head, Jajali began to slap his armpits and proclaim loudly to the sky, "I have won great punya!"

Then an asariri, an ethereal voice, rose in the sky and Jajali heard these words, "In point of dharma, O Jajali, you are not equal to Tuladhara of great wisdom, who lives in Varanasi.

Jajali was furious to hear the disembodied voice and wanted to meet Tuladhara. He ranged over the whole world, keeping a vow of silence, and slept wherever he found himself at nightfall. After a considerable while, he reached the city of Kasi, where he saw Tuladhara engaged in selling sundry essences and perfumes, ghrita, honey and oils. As soon as the trader saw the Brahmana, he joyfully stood up and worshipped the guest with proper salutations.

Tuladhara said, "O Brahmana, I knew that you were coming to me. O Dvijottama, listen to what I have to say. You lived on a low land near the seashore and performed severe tapasya, but you never felt that you had achieved dharma or punya. When you did at last attain ascetic success, some birds were born on your head and you took great care of the little creatures.

In time, the birds grew wings and flew away in search of food. Due to your giving shelter to the little sparrows, you began to feel a sense of pride, O Brahmana, thinking you had achieved great merit. Then, you heard a voice in the sky that spoke of me. These words filled you with anger, and brought you here. Tell me, what can I do for you, O best of Brahmanas?"

Bhishma says 'Thus addressed by Tuladhara, Jajali said "You sell all kinds of extracts and scents, O Vaisya, as also bark, leaves, herbs, fruits and roots of various trees. How did you acquire your wisdom and certitude? Where has this knowledge come from? O you of great intelligence, tell me all this in detail."

Tuladhara of the Vaisya varna, who knew the truths of dharma and was graced with gyana, said, "O Jajali, I know dharma, which is eternal. With all its mysteries, it is nothing other than the ancient virtue that is known to all. It consists of universal compassion, and is fraught with beneficence to all creatures. The way of life, which relies on ahimsa towards all creatures or, in case of necessity, upon a minimum of such harm, is the highest dharma. I live according to that dharma, O Jajali.

My house is built with wood and grass cut by other people's hands. With the exception of wines, O enlightened Rishi, I purchase from other men lac, dye, the roots of lotus, its filaments, diverse kinds of fine perfumes and various lotions, to sell in fair trade.

He, O Jajali, who is ever the friend and always engaged in the good of all creatures, in thought, word and deed, knows godliness. I never solicit anyone, or desire anything. I never quarrel with anyone, nor cherish aversion for anyone. I consider all objects and creatures to be equal. Jajali, this is my vrata.

My scales are in perfect balance, for all creatures. I neither praise nor blame the actions of others. I view the diversity in the world, O Brahmana, like the array seen in the sky. Know, O Jajali, that I view all creatures with an equal eye.

Wisest of intelligent men, I see no difference between a clod of earth a piece of stone and a lump of gold. As the blind, the deaf and the ignorant are perfectly accustomed to the loss of their senses, in the same way am I conformed to my vows of abstinence from pleasures.

As they who are feeble, ailing, weak and starved, have no relish for amusements of any kind, similarly have I ceased to feel any zest for wealth, pleasure or luxuries.

When a man fears nothing and nothing fears him, when he cherishes no desire and has no aversion for anything, he attains Brahman. When a man does not sin, in thought, word or deed, towards any creature, he attains Brahman.

There is no past or future. There is no neeti or dharma. He who does not rouse fear acquires a state in which there is no fear. On the other hand, the man of harsh speech and violent temper, who is like death itself to all creatures, certainly attains a condition that abounds with fear.

I follow the practices of exalted, benevolent elders who with their children and grandchildren live in accord with the ordinance laid down in the shastra. He, who falls prey to the errors of the good and wise, entirely abandons the sanatana dharma recommended in the Vedas. The wise man or he who has subdued his senses, or he who has strength of mind, attains moksha. The learned man who restrains his senses, and practices dharma with a heart cleansed from the very craving for himsa, violence, is sure, O Jajali, to acquire the merit of dharma and the fruit of mukti.

Look upon worldly unions as pieces of driftwood that float along the river and briefly meet. And having briefly touched, they drift apart again. Grass, sticks and floating cakes of cowdung come together, and then part forever. He who no creature fears in the least is himself, O sannyasi, never frightened of any creature. While he, of whom every creature is afraid, as of a wolf, is himself filled with terror like creatures of the sea forced to leap onto the shore from fear of the roaring Badava fire.

This is how the practice of universal ahimsa has arisen. Man must follow it by every means within his power. Kings and men of wealth may seek to adopt it. It is sure to lead to bhagya and swarga as well. Because of their ability to dispel the fears of others, the learned consider wealthy men and their followers to be outstanding. Men who seek ordinary happiness practice ahimsa for the sake of fame, while the truly skilled practice it to attain Brahman.

The path of ahimsa provides all the rewards one enjoys through tapasya, yagnas, dana, satya and the cultivation of gyana. He who assures protection to all creatures receives the boon of all sacrifices and wins fearlessness for himself as his reward. There is no dharma superior to ahimsa. He, of whom everybody is frightened, as one is of a snake within one's bedroom, never acquires any punya in this world or in the hereafter.

The very Devas are bewildered by the one who transcends all states, who himself constitutes the Soul of all creatures and looks upon all creatures as identical with his own self. Of all gifts, ahimsa is of the highest value. It is true, O Jajali believe me. One who takes to karma at first wins prosperity, but on the exhaustion of his punyas, he once more encounters adversity. Aware of the inevitable destruction of such gains, the wise do not praise karma.

There is no duty, O Jajali, without motive. Dharma, however, is most tenuous. They are in the Vedas for the sake of both Brahman and swargaloka. The subject of dharma has many secrets and mysteries. It is so subtle that it is almost impossible to understand fully. Amongst diverse conflicts in precepts, few men who observed the deeds of the virtuous have understood dharma.

Why do you not destroy those that geld bulls, bore their noses, and cause them to bear heavy burdens, bind them and put them under diverse kinds of restraint? Why indeed do you not eliminate men who eat the flesh of living creatures they have slain?

There are men that live by trafficking in living beings! They are seen to own humans as slaves. They strike, bind and otherwise subject them to restraints and torture. They make them labour day and night. These people are not ignorant of the pain that results from such torment. When they earn a living by such sins, what scruples need they feel in selling cadavers?

The Devas—Surya, Chandramas, Vayu, Brahma, Prana, Kratu and Yama—all dwell in living creatures. The goat is Agni. The sheep is Varuna. The horse is Surya. The earth is Virat. The cow and the calf are Soma. The man who sells these can never gain success.

Such being the case, O Dvija, what fault can attach to the sale of taila, ghrita, madhu or hanu. Many animals grow up in ease and comfort in places free from gnats and other insects. Still, there are men who persecute them in diverse ways, and lead them into marshes that abound with stinging insects, even though they are aware that their mothers bear them great love.

Many draft animals are laden with heavy burdens. Others, again, have to languish because of treatment not sanctioned by the scriptures. I believe that such himsa against animals amounts to foeticide. Men regard agriculture to be sinless, although it is surely fraught with cruelty. The iron-faced plough wounds the soil and the many creatures that live therein. Cast your eyes, O Jajali, on the bullocks yoked to the plough. In the srutis, kine are deemed as being not fit for slaughter. He perpetrates a great sin who slays a bull or a cow.

Once, many Rishis approached Nahusha, and said, “You have, O king, killed a cow which is declared in the scriptures to be like one’s mother. You have also slain a bull, which the shastras say is akin to Brahma himself. You have perpetrated an evil act, O Nahusha, and we are pained.”

To purify Nahusha, the Rishis divided his sin into a hundred and one parts, transformed the fragments into diseases and cast them among all creatures. Then, O Jajali, the blessed Rishis turned to Nahusha, who was guilty of foeticide, and said, “We will not be able to pour libations in your sacrifice.”

So spoke the Maharishis and Yatis, after they ascertained that king Nahusha was not intentionally guilty of the sin.

These, O Jajali, are some of the evil and dreadful practices that are current in this world. You perform them because men from ancient times have done so, and not because they agree with the dictates of your purified intellect. Guided by reason, one should practice what one considers dharma, instead of blindly following the practices of the world.

Listen now, O Jajali, to what my conduct is towards him that injures me and him that praises me. I regard both of them in the same light. I have none whom I like and none whom I dislike. The wise laud such a behaviour as consistent with dharma and the Yatis concur as well. The virtuous always observe it with sharp insight.”

Jajali countered, “This course of dharma that you preach, O upholder of nyaya, shuts the door of swarga on all creatures and puts a stop to the very means of their subsistence. From agriculture comes food. That food offers nourishment even to you. It is the help of animals, crops and herbs, O trader, which enables humans to support their existence. From animals and food do sacrifices flow. Your doctrines seem laden with atheism. This world will come to an end if the means by which life is supported must be abandoned.”

Tuladhara replied, “I will tell you of the means of sustenance. I am not, O Brahmana, an atheist. I do not blame sacrifices. He is very rare who truly knows yagna. I bow to the yagna that is ordained for Brahmanas. I bow also to them that are conversant with that yagna.

Alas, the Brahmanas have abandoned the sacrifice ordained for them, and have taken to the performance of yagnas meant for Kshatriyas. Many believers, O enlightened one, that are covetous and fond of wealth, cannot understand the true meaning of the srutis, and proclaim falsehoods as being truth. They have introduced many kinds of sacrifices, and said, ‘This should be given away in this particular yagna, while that is to be offered in that other yagna. The first of these is laudable’, and so on. The outcome of all this, O Jajali, is the emergence of theft and other evils.

Be aware that only the sacrificial offering acquired through dharma can satisfy the Devas. There are abundant indications in the scriptures that the worship of the gods may be accomplished with vows, libations poured on the sacred fire, recitations of the Vedas and with plants and herbs.

From their religious karmas and mere hollow rituals, sinful men have wicked offspring. To covetous men greedy children are born, and to the contented are born happy children.

If the performer of sacrifices and the priest-in-attendance wish for rewards from their yagnas, their children are visited with that stain. If, on the other hand, they do not wish to reap the rewards of the yagna, then their children become desireless. From sacrifices appear progeny like pure water from the firmament.

The libations poured on the yagna fire rise up to the sun. From the sun comes rain. From rain, crops grow. From food living creatures are born. Long ago, men of dharma, devoted to selfless sacrifices, obtained the fruition of all their wishes. The earth would yield crops without tillage and the blessing of Rishis sufficed to produce herbs and plants. Ancient men never conducted yagnas from a wish for their fruits, and never regarded themselves as beneficiaries. Those who somehow perform sacrifices, while questioning their efficacy, are born in their next lives as dishonest, wily and greedy men, obsessively covetous of wealth.

He, who with the help of false logic claims the authoritative scriptures as fraught with evil, is certain to enter into the realms of sin. Surely, O lord of Brahmanas, such a man, bereft of wisdom, possesses a sinful soul, and always remains here in this world of sin.

He, who regards those tasks the Vedas ordain to accomplish every day, as obligatory, and fears lest he fails to finish them, who considers all the essentials of yagnas identical with Brahman, and never views himself as the doer, is truly a Brahmana. If the duties of such a one remain incomplete, or hindered by unclean yagnapasus, even then, such actions are of superior efficacy. However, if such deeds are done from a craving for their fruit and their completion be obstructed, then atonement becomes necessary.

Those who, bereft of all desire for worldly wealth, renounce all provision for the future and covet mukti, while being free from envy, embrace dharma and samyama as their yagna. Men who know the distinction between body and soul, who are devoted to yoga, and meditate on Pranava, AUM, always, succeed in gratifying others.

The universal Brahman, which is the Soul of the Devas, dwells in him who realises Brahman. When such a man's hunger is satiated, all the gods, O Jajali, are pleased. He who satisfies all his desires and no longer desires anything, and who is consummate in knowledge, gains eternal mukti, which to him is a source of perfect bliss.

Wise men are the refuge of dharma. They are virtuous men who are clear about their norms of conduct. He who owns such wisdom always sees everything in the universe to have sprung from his own self.

A few learned men, who faithfully strive to reach the other shore of this ocean of samsara, attain the world of Brahma, which is full of great blessings, most sacred and inhabited by the righteous. It is a world that is free from sorrow, upheaval and pain, a place from which there is no return.

Such men do not covet swarga. They do not worship Brahma in costly sacrifices. They walk the path of dharma. Ahimsa is paramount in their yagnas and no harm befalls any creature. These men know trees, herbs, fruits and roots as the only sacrificial offerings.

Greedy priests never officiate at the sacrifices of these simple enlightened men. Although all their duties are complete, they still perform sacrifices from a desire for the good of all creatures and offer their own selves as sacrificial offerings. This is why selfish priests officiate at the yagnas of only the misguided, who seek only swarga, without trying to gain moksha. Whereas those who are good forever seek to help others find freedom and bliss. In view of both these ways, O Jajali, I have come to embrace all creatures with an equal heart.

Endowed with wisdom, many peerless Brahmanas perform yagnas of two kinds; some lead to mukti from where there is no return, and others lead to regions of bliss from where there is a return. The sacrifices help them advance, O Maharishi, along paths taken by the Devas.

Those who sacrifice from a desire for reward, return from their goals, for further rewards; for the truly wise, who sacrifice selflessly, there is no return. Although both these kinds of yajamanas, sacrifice performers, O Jajali, travel along the path of the Devas, such is the difference between their final ends.

Because of the success achieved by such men of true dharma, their bulls willingly set their shoulders to the plough for tillage, and to the yoke to pull their carriages. Their cows yield milk from udders untouched by human hands. These men create sacrificial wood and other ritual needs simply by willing it, and perform various sacrifices replete with abundant gifts.

Those of such purified souls may slaughter a cow as a sacrificial offering. While others, who are not of that stature, should beware and perform yagnas only with herbs and plants, and not with animals.

Since renunciation has such punya, I stress on it when I speak to you. The Devas know him for a Brahmana who has given up all expectation of gains, who makes no effort to achieve worldly duties, who no longer serves anyone, who never utters the praises of others, and although his actions are weak, he is endowed with strength.

What, O Jajali, will be the fate of him who does not recite the Vedas, of the others, who do not perform proper yagnas, those who do not offer gifts to Brahmanas, and those who follow an avocation in which every kind of desire is indulged? Through perfect reverence for the dharma that is renunciation, one is sure to gain Brahman."

Jajali said, "I had never before, O son of a Vaisya, heard of these mystical and profound dharmas of ascetics who perform only mental sacrifices. It is for this reason that I inquire about them. The sages of old did not follow those doctrines of yoga. Hence, the yogins that succeeded them have not propounded them for general acceptance. If you say that men of brutish minds fail to achieve sacrifices beneficial to their soul, then, O Vaisya, how else will they achieve their happiness? Tell me this, O wise one. Great is my faith in your words."

Tuladhara replied, "At times, yagnas are not effective because of the absence of faith in the yajamana. Such men are not worthy of performing any sacrifice.

As for the faithful, only one thing, the cow, is enough to maintain all sacrifices through libations of clarified butter, milk, curds, and the hair at end of her tail, her horns and her hooves.

The Vedas declare that unmarried men should not perform sacrifices. Nevertheless, should it be necessary for an unmarried man to perform a yagna, then he must take sraddha, faith, as his wedded wife in order to make his offerings to the Devas. Through proper reverence in such sacrifices, he is sure to attain Brahman.

To the exclusion of all animals, which are certainly unclean as offerings in yagnas, the rice-ball is a worthy offering. All rivers are as sacred as the Saraswati, and all mountains are holy. O Jajali, do not wander needlessly on earth to visit sacred places; the Soul itself is a tirtha. He, who observes these duties, and seeks to acquire merit within his ability, certainly acquires blessed regions hereafter."

Bhishma continues, 'These are the dharmas, O Yudhishtira, which Tuladhara praised: responsibilities that are consistent with reason, and always observed by those who are good and wise.'

Tuladhara said, "Observe, O Jajali, who, amongst the good or the sinful, have adopted this path of dharma of which I have spoken. You will then clearly understand the truth. Look, amongst the hawks and other numerous birds that range in the sky, are the ones reared on your head! Look, O Brahmana, how the birds have contracted their wings and legs to enter their nests. Summon them, O enlightened one, for the birds you treated with affection display their love for you who are their father. Indeed, O Jajali, you are their father. Do summon your children."

Beckoned by Jajali, the birds responded joyfully to the voice of dharma, which ordains ahimsa towards all creatures. All deeds of ahimsa, performed towards any creature, become beneficial both here and hereafter. The deeds that involve harm to others destroy faith, and with faith destroyed, ruin follows the destroyer. The sacrifices of those who view acquisition and non-acquisition in the same light, who are invested with bhakti and are self-restrained, who are of peaceful minds, and perform yagnas from a sense of duty and not from a desire for benefits—men like these become worthy of reward.

Bhakti and sraddha towards Brahman is the daughter of Surya, O Dvija. She is the protector and she is the giver of good birth. Devotion is superior to the punya born of Vedic mantras and dhyana sraddha redeems an action vitiated by a defect of speech, and salvages a deed poisoned by a defect of the mind. However, neither speech nor the mind can save a deed that is defiled through want of devotion.

Men who have experienced past events recall what Brahma said on this subject: after deliberation, the Devas concluded that the sacrificial offerings made by a man, who is pure but lacking in faith, and of another who is impure, hence unworthy of acceptance; of one who knows the Vedas but is miserly, and that of a moneylender who is generous, are worthy of equal approval.

Brahma, the Supreme Lord of all creatures, then told them that they had committed an error. He asserted that sraddha sanctifies the offerings of a liberal person, while the food of the faithless man is lost. The offering of a liberal usurer is acceptable but not that of a miser. Furthermore, there is only one person in the world, he who is faithless, unfit to make offerings to the Devas. This is also the opinion of men who understand dharma.

Faith is a purifier of sins, while the lack of faith is a high sin. As a snake sheds its slough, the man of belief casts off all his sin. Abstention with faith is the most sacred of all. He sanctifies himself who turns to sraddha and abstains from all faults of conduct. What need has such a one of tapasya, aachara or dridatha?

Every man has sraddha, which is of three kinds—as influenced by sattva, rajas and tamas. The way to recognise a man is through his belief. Those gifted with sattva and insights into the true import of righteousness have accordingly established the subject of dharma.

I have, because of my enquiries, gathered this knowledge from the Rishi Dharmadarsana. O wise one, take to faith, for you will then gain that which is superior. Know this, O Jajali, he who has faith in the srutis, and who follows their import, is certainly a man of dharma, and he who faithfully adheres to his own path is surely a superior man."

Soon, Tuladhara and Jajali, both gifted with great wisdom, who had acquired their punya through their good deeds ascended to swarga and revelled there in great happiness.

A great deal is told of Tuladhara, who understood ahimsa completely and hence proclaimed these eternal duties. The enlightened Jajali, O son of Kunti, heard these words of celebrated tejas, and became calm. In this manner, Tuladhara spoke many truths of grave import and illustrated them with examples. Tell me, O Bhaarata, what else do you wish to hear?'

Bhishma says, 'There is an old story of what King Vichakhi said about karuna, compassion for all creatures. When the king witnessed the mangled body of a bull during a cow-sacrifice, heard the agonised bellows of the animal and saw the cruel Brahmanas that gathered there to assist in the rituals, the king shouted, "Jaya to all kine!"

He pronounced this blessing on the helpless animals, even at the time of slaughter. And Vichakhi further said, "Only those who are atheists and sceptics, bereft of intelligence, who transgress defined limits, who desire fame through sacrifices and religious rites, speak highly of the slaughter of animals in yagnas. Manu has lauded ahimsa in all actions.

Hence, guided by the shastras, with regard to himsa and ahimsa, one should practice the true course of dharma, which is most subtle. Ahimsa towards all creatures is the highest dharma.

The householder should ignore the rewards of Vedic rituals and give up his family life. He should embrace sannyasa, live near an inhabited place and observe rigid vows. Only selfish men wish for benefit of their actions.

Men do not eat defiled meat obtained from animals which are not killed in sacrifices. This practice is not worthy of praise, since all meat is tainted, including that of animals killed in yagnas.

Knaves have introduced wine, fish, honey, meat, alcohol and preparations of rice and sesame seeds. The use of these in sacrifices is not sanctioned in the Vedas. The craving for these arises from pride, error of judgement and cupidity.

True Brahmanas realise the presence of Vishnu in every sacrifice. He should be worshipped with delicious payasa, and the leaves and flowers of trees described in the Vedas. All worthy actions and all which is held pure by eminent sages, are excellent oblations to the Supreme Deity and deserve his approval.'

Yudhishtira says, 'The body and all sorts of dangers and calamities are constantly at war, with each trying to destroy the other. How then is it possible for a non-violent man to refrain from harmful deeds in order to survive?'

Bhishma replies, 'One should, if possible, acquire merit and behave in such a way that one's body may not languish, suffer pain and invite death.'

Yudhishtira says, 'You, O Pitamaha, are our highest guru for deeds that are difficult to accomplish. I ask, how should we judge an action to be either our obligation to perform or abstain from? Is it to be determined soon or in course of time?'

Bhishma answers, 'Listen to an ancient tale of what happened to Chirakarin of the Angirasa vamsa. May the man who reflects long before he performs a task, be twice blessed. Such a man certainly possesses great intelligence and never offends in any manner.

There was once a very wise man named Chirakarin, the son of Rishi Gautama. Everything he did was done after deep consideration. He was named Chirakarin because he deliberated for long upon everything; he would remain awake for a long time, sleep for a long time and take a long time to begin the tasks he was entrusted with. The blame of being an idle man adhered to him. Men of small minds and poor foresight regarded him a fool.

Once, Pitamaha Gautama saw his wife do a terrible thing. He was so furious that he ordered Chirakarin, "Slay this woman." The learned Gautama spoke these words without much thought, and departed for the vana.

Chirakarin took a long time to assent to his father's command, before saying, "So be it." Still, due to his very nature, and habit of never embarking on any task without long reflection, he began to ponder upon the propriety or otherwise of his father's instruction.

How will I obey the command of my father and yet avoid killing my mother? How can I not drown in sin, like any evil man, in this situation where contradictory obligations pull me in opposite directions?

Obedience to the commands of the father is essential and constitutes the highest merit. The protection of the mother again is equally a clear duty. The status of a son is fraught with dependence. How will I avoid this sin? What can I do so that both responsibilities may be discharged? Who can kill a woman, especially his own mother, and remain happy? Who can disregard his own father and yet gain prosperity and fame?

The father places his own self within the mother's womb and is born as the son, so that he may continue his vocation, conduct, name and race. My parents have begotten me as their son. Since I know my origin, why should I not have this knowledge of my relationship with both of them?

The words spoken by the father during the initial rite after birth, and those at the time of the subsidiary rites settle the reverence due to him and confirm the respect paid to him.

Since it is the father who raises and educates his son, he is the son's primary elder and his highest dharma. The Vedas assertively stipulate that the son's supreme dharma is to follow the sire's instructions.

Unto the father, the son is only a source of joy. Whereas for the son, the father is everything. The body and all else that the son owns have the father alone as the provider. Hence, the wishes of the father should be obeyed without ever questioning them in the least. His very sins are cleansed of the man who obeys his pita.

The father provides sustenance, teaches the Vedas and imparts the knowledge of the world. He is the performer of such rites as garbhadhana and simantonnayana. He is dharma. He is swarga. He is the highest tapasya. Through his satisfaction, all the Devas are satisfied. The words spoken by the father turn to blessings for the son. His joyous speech washes away all the sins of the son. The flower falls away from the stalk. The fruit drops from the tree. However, the father, whatever be his distress, never abandons the son. These then are my views on the reverence due from the son to the father. To the son, the sire is not an ordinary being. I will now reflect upon what is due to the mother.

As much as firewood is essential to fire, in the same manner the mother is the main cause of this union of the Pancha Mahabutas within my body. She is as tinder to the bodies of all men. She is the panacea for all kinds of calamities. Her existence invests one with protection; whereas her absence robs one of all shelter.

The impoverished man who enters his house, with the words, “O mother!” need never indulge in sorrow. Nor will weakness ever assail him. Even if a man has sons and grandsons, and is a hundred years old, he still looks like a two-year-old child as long as his mother is alive. Able or disabled, lean or robust, the son is always protected by the mother. The teachings state that none other than the mother is the son’s guardian. In the event of her demise, the son becomes old; he is grief-stricken, and to him the world begins to look empty. There is no refuge, nor any defence, like the mother. There is no one as dear as the mother is.

Because she carried him in her womb, the mother is the son’s Dhatri. As the principal cause of his birth, she is his Janani. For nourishing his young limbs into growth, she is called Amba. For delivering a courageous child, she is known as Virasu. For nursing and looking after the son, she is named Sura.

The mother is one’s own body. What rational man is there who would kill his mother, to whose care alone belongs the reason why his own head did not lie by the street like a dry gourd?

When husband and wife procreate, both of them harbour the wish for a son; but its success depends more upon the mother than on the father.

The mother knows the family in which the son is born and the man who fathered him. From the moment of conception, the mother begins to show affection to her child and takes delight in him or her. Yet, the scriptures state that the offspring belongs to the father alone.

If married men, who are pledged to earn religious punya, seek congress outside their marriage, they cease to be worthy of respect. Because the husband supports his wife, he is called Bhartri, and, since he protects her, he is called Pati. When these two functions disappear from him, he ceases to be both Bhartri and Pati.

Then, again, a woman can commit no fault. The mantle of faults lies upon a man’s shoulders. By committing adultery, he becomes stained with guilt.

It has been said that the husband is the wife's highest goal, an idol of worship to her. My mother surrendered her sacred self to the one who came to her in the form and guise of her husband. Indeed, because of the natural weakness of their sex, and their liability to solicitation, women cannot be regarded as offenders. Conversely, the sinfulness is evident of Indra himself who, though guilty of committing brahmahatya, caused a third part of this sin to be cast upon the woman, at her request.

There is no question about my mother's innocence. She whom I have been commanded to kill is a woman. That woman, again, is my mother. She occupies, therefore, a place of greater reverence. The very beasts that are irrational know that the mother is not to be harmed. The father must be known to be a combination of all the Devas put together. To the mother attaches a union of all the mortal creatures and all the gods.

Because of his habit of long deliberations before initiating any action, Chirakarin pondered in this manner for a long while.

After many days of tapasya, and intense dhyana, Gautama returned home. Endowed with great wisdom, he came back convinced of the impropriety of the chastisement he had commanded to be inflicted upon his wife.

Burning with sorrow and shedding copious tears of repentance, he said, "The lord of the three worlds, Purandara, came to my asrama in the guise of a Brahmana seeking comfort. I welcomed him with words of reverence, with padya to wash his feet and arghya. I also granted him the rest that he sought. I further told him how I had found a protector in him.

I thought that such conduct on my part would encourage him to behave amicably towards me. On the contrary, he misbehaved himself, and my wife Ahalya, could not be regarded to have committed any fault on her part. It seems that while Indra was coursing through the sky, he had seen my wife and lost his good sense on seeing her extraordinary beauty.

Neither my wife nor I, not even Indra, can be held responsible for the offence. In fact, the blame really lies with my carelessness of not protecting her through my yoga shakti. The Rishis have said that all calamities spring from envy, which, in turn, arises from error of judgement. It is by such envy that I have been dragged from where I was and plunged into this sea of sin.

Alas, I have slain my wife. She is known as Vasita as she shares in her lord's calamities. And since she is under my care, she is known as Bhariya. Who can save me from this sin? In haste I ordered Chirakarin to kill my wife. Even now, if he proves true to his name he may still deliver me from this guilt. Twice blessed be you, O Chirakaraka! If in this instance you have delayed accomplishing your task, then you are truly worthy of your name. Save your mother, yourself, as also me and my tapasya, from grave sin. Be really a Chirakaraka today! Ordinarily, you are judicious before you begin any activity. Let not your conduct be otherwise today. Be you a true Chirakaraka. Your mother awaited your arrival for a long time while she bore you in her womb. O Chirakaraka, let your introspective nature yield beneficial results today.

Perhaps in view of the sorrow it would cause me, my son Chirakaraka will delay doing my bidding today. Maybe, he deliberates on it, while bearing it in his heart. Perchance, he procrastinates, in view of the grief it would cause us both."

While steeped in such repentance, O king, Maharishi Gautama saw Chirakarin seated before him. The sight of his father's return overwhelmed Chirakarin with sorrow, as he cast away his weapon, bowed his head and began to pacify Gautama. When Gautama saw his son prostrate before him, and also saw his wife well-nigh petrified with shame, the Rishi was filled with great joy. From that time, the Maharishi Gautama never went anywhere to live away from his wife or his heedful son.

Having issued the order that his wife should be slain, Gautama had left his home to attend to some personal task. Since then his son had humbly stood by, with weapon in hand, ready to execute his mother.

Seeing his son prostrated at his feet, the Rishi thought that struck with fear, Chirakarin was seeking mercy for taking up a weapon to kill his own mother. Gautama held Chirakaraka in a close embrace, showered him with praise and affection, and blessed him saying, "May you live long!"

Joyful and satisfied with the turn of events, Gautama, O wise one, addressed his son with these words, "Blessed be you, O Chirakaraka! May you always be thoughtful of your actions. Because of your delay in accomplishing my bidding you have made me eternally happy today."

The king of Rishis then spoke of the merits of masters who reflect for a long time before setting their hands to any task. He said, "If it is the matter of the death of a friend, one should accomplish it after due deliberation. If it is about abandoning a project already begun, it should be left for after long consideration. A friendship that is time tested will last a long time. In giving way to wrath, haughtiness, pride, disputes, sinful actions and doing unpleasant tasks he who exercises patience, deserves praise. When an offence is not clearly proved against a relative, a friend, a servant or a wife, he who reflects long before passing judgement is commendable."

Bhaarata, this is why Gautama was pleased with his son's delay in carrying out his order. He who never nurses his anger for long, and reflects patiently before discharging any action, does not ever repent. One should tolerantly wait upon the aged, and show them reverence. One should attend to one's duties submissively and ascertain them faithfully. He, who patiently pleases the learned, reverentially serves the good-natured, and persistently keeps his soul under control, succeeds in enjoying the respect of the world for a long time. One engaged in instructing others on the subject of dharma and svadharma, should, upon being questioned, calmly reflect before giving an answer so as to avoid any regret."

Rishi Gautama faithfully worshiped the Devas in his asrama, and finally ascended into swarga with his circumspect son.'

Yudhishtira says, 'How, indeed, should the king protect his subjects without harming anybody? I ask you this, O Pitamaha; tell me, O best of good men.'

Bhishma replies, 'For this, listen to an old story of the conversation between Dyumatsena and King Satyavat.

I have heard that, once, when a few men were about to be executed at the behest of his father Dyumatsena, Prince Satyavat said certain words that had never been spoken before. He said, "Sometimes dharma assumes the form of paapa, and paapa assumes the form of dharma. Under no circumstances can the killing of men ever be considered good."

Dyumatsena replied, "If the sparing of ones that deserve to be slain be virtuous, if robbers be spared, O Satyavat, then all distinctions between virtue and vice would disappear. 'This is mine', 'That is not his': ideas like these will not prevail in the Kali yuga. The affairs of the world will come to a standstill. If you know of a way that the world may persist without punishment, then tell me about it."

Satyavat said, "The Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras should be placed under the control of the Brahmanas. If these three varnas were kept within the ambit of niti, then the lower classes will imitate them in their practices. Those who transgress the laws will be reported by the Brahmanas to the king, for punishment.

Without killing the offender, the king should dispense punishment as prescribed by the shastras. He must not neglect to thoroughly examine the nature of the crime and reflect on the science of niti.

By executing one guilty man, the king in truth kills a number of innocent persons as well. See, how with the death of a single robber, his wife, mother, father and children are all killed for they become deprived of the means of a livelihood. Hence, the king must deliberate deeply on the question of punishment.

Sometimes an evil man is seen to imbibe good conduct from a man of virtue. At times, good children are born to wicked men. The wicked, therefore, should not be torn up by their roots. Their extermination is not consistent with sanatana dharma.

A gentle reprimand may be given to correct their offences. Confiscation of their wealth, incarceration, even disfigurement may be meted out to punish them. However, their relatives should not be persecuted through the infliction of capital sentences on them. If in the presence of the purohita and others, they surrender to him, and swear, saying, "O Brahmana, we will never again commit any sinful deed," they would then deserve to be let off without any punishment. This is the edict of Brahma himself. Even a Brahmana should be punished for a crime. If great men transgress, then their chastisement should be proportionate to their greatness. Habitual offenders do not deserve any leniency as might be shown for their first offence."

Dyumatsena said, "As long as the laws are not broken, dharma prevails. If dire offenders were not punished with death, dharma would soon be destroyed. Men of old were governed with ease as they were honourable and not easily given to disputes and quarrels. They seldom gave way to anger, or, if they did so, they never yielded themselves wildly to wrath. In those days the mere crying of 'Fie!' at offenders was sufficient punishment, followed by the punishment represented by censures, penalties of fines and forfeitures. In this age, however, the punishment of death has become common. The measure of evil has increased to such an extent that even the penalty of death is no longer a deterrent.

The srutis declare that the robber has no affiliation towards the Manavas, Devas, Gandharvas or the Pitris. The habitual thief steals the ornaments of corpses from cemeteries, and clothes from men possessed by spirits. It is foolish to make any covenant with such wretches or trust their word."

Satyavat said, "If you do not succeed in making honest men of such rogues by means other than execution, then uproot them through a sacrifice. Kings are ashamed when thieves and robbers multiply in their kingdoms; therefore, for the sake of their subjects' happiness and prosperity, they practice severe tapasya.

Fear of the king can make honest subjects. Good kings never execute the wicked for retribution. They are successful in ruling their subjects with the help of their own good conduct. If the king performs justly, the superior subjects imitate him, and in turn, are imitated by their subordinates. Men are so constituted that they imitate their superiors.

On the other hand, a corrupt king who tries to deter others from evil ways becomes an object of ridicule.

He, who, through arrogance or misjudgement, offends the king in any manner, should be detained by all means, so that he may not repeat the offence in future. The emperor should first control his own self if he wishes to check offences in others. If the need arises, even his erring friends and kin must be severely punished. In a kingdom where a dire criminal does not receive harsh justice, for sure, adharma increases, and dharma wanes.

Long ago, a learned Brahmana invested with clemency taught me this. My ancestors too, who were sworn to ahimsa, gave me similar instruction. They said, 'In the Krita yuga, kings must rule their subjects in an entirely harmless manner. In the Treta yuga, they should conduct themselves in ways that conform to dharma fallen away by a fourth from its full complement. In the Dwapara yuga, they must adapt to dharma fallen away by a half, and in the Kali yuga, they should adjust to dharma fallen away by three-fourths.

In the Kali yuga, due to evil kings and the nature of the epoch itself, fifteen parts of even the fourth portion of dharma disappears, leaving behind just a sixteenth portion.

If, O Satyavat, confusion sets in by adopting ahimsa, the king must then consider the human life-span, the strength of human beings and the nature of the prevailing yuga, before he metes out punishments.

Indeed, Manu, the son of Brahma, has shown compassion for human beings and indicated the path by which men may adhere to knowledge for the sake of mukti.'

Yudhishtira says, 'You have already explained to me, O Pitamaha, how yoga dharma, may be adopted and practiced along with ahimsa. Tell me now about the dharma which leads to both bhoga and moksha, and which among these two is superior?'

Bhishma says, 'Both these paths are highly blessed. They are extremely difficult to accomplish, and yield great benefits. The two are practiced by the good. To answer your questions about their true meaning, I will tell you about the efficacy of both courses. Listen carefully, Yudhishtira, to the ancient tale of the discourse between Kapila and the cow.

I have heard that once when Lord Tvashtri visited the palace of King Nahusha, that king, for the sake of hospitality, was on the verge of killing a cow agreeably to the eternal precept of the Vedas.

Seeing the cow tied up for slaughter, Kapila, ever observant of the duties of sattva, exclaimed, "Alas, ye Vedas!" Suddenly, a Rishi named Syumarasmi, appeared there, through his yoga shakti, in the form of a cow. He turned to the Yati Kapila, and said, "Listen O Kapila! If the Vedas sanction the slaughter of living beings, then by what right does ahimsa deserve to be regarded as authoritative? There are men devoted to tapasya and invested with buddhi, with the srutis and gyana for their insight, who regard the tenets of the Vedas to be the words of Iswara himself. What can anybody say about the contents of the Vedas when they are the words of the Paramatman, who is free from any desire for reward, who is beyond envy and aversion, who is addicted to nothing, and because of the instant fruition of all his wishes, for him, the word 'effort' does not even exist?"

Kapila said, "I do not criticise the Vedas. I have no wish to say anything derogatory about them. I have heard that the different dharmas established for the brahmacharin, the grihastha, the vanaprastha and the sannyasa asramas, all lead to the same goal. The four asramas have always been regarded as the Devayana marga. The relative superiority or inferiority of these are revealed in the nature of their individual objectives.

Know these and perform such karmas which will lead to swarga and other blessings, say the Vedas. At the same time, they also proclaim—do not perform any karma. If abstention from karma were meritorious, then their achievement must be reprehensible. When the scriptures take such a stand, the strength or weakness of particular declarations must be most difficult to ascertain. If you know of any dharma which is superior to ahimsa, and which depends upon direct evidence instead of that of the scriptures, do tell me about it."

Syumarasmi said, "The sruti that is constantly heard by us is that one should perform sacrifices with a wish to reach swarga. Depending on the benefits one wishes for, one makes appropriate preparations for the yagna. Goats, horses, cows, domestic and unfettered birds, herbs and plants, are some of the foods available to living creatures. Daily consumption of food is recommended in the Vedas. In addition, the sruti says that animals and grains are the limbs of a sacrifice, and that Brahma created them along with yagna, with instructions to the gods to perform sacrifices with their help. In all, seven domestic and seven wild animals are identified as fit for sacrifice. Instead of them all being equally fit to be yagnapasus, each succeeding one is inferior to each preceding one. The Vedas also declare that the whole universe, including Purusha, is appointed for sacrifice. Men of ancient times confirm this.

Is there a learned man who does not select, according to his own intelligence, individuals from among living creatures for sacrifice? The lesser animals, human beings, trees and herbs, all wish to attain heaven. The only means to fulfil their wishes is through sacrifice.

There are altogether seventeen angas of a yagna. These comprise deciduous herbs, animals, trees, creepers, clarified butter, milk, curds, meat, other approved articles of sacrifice, land, the cardinal directions, faith and Kaala, which are thirteen. The Riks, Yajuses, Samans, the Yajamana and Agni, which should be known as the grihastha, bring the tally to nineteen.

The sruti declares that sacrifice is the root of the world and its course. Along with ghrita, milk, curds, cowdung, skin, the hair in her tail, horns and hooves, the cow alone is able to furnish all the needs of a sacrifice. Particular items among these, coupled with ritwijas and upaharas for the pujaris and Brahmanas are gathered by Yajamanas, sacrificers, to perform specific yagnas. We hear from the sruti that everything is created for sacrifices, and it is in this manner that men of ancient times performed sacrifices.

As regards he who conducts sacrifices more out of faith than for the sake of benefit, it is seen that he does not harm any creature nor bear himself with any hostility, nor does he set himself to achieve any worldly task. The things known as the limbs of sacrifice, and its other requirements, support each other when used according to the approved rituals.

I have seen Rishis who follow the Brahmanas regard the smritis into which the Vedas are introduced, as authoritative. The Brahmanas are the source and support of yagnas. The universe and sacrifice are interdependent.

The syllable AUM is the root of the Vedas. Every rite, therefore, should begin with the expression of that syllable of vast import. He who utters the sounds AUM, namas, swaha, svadha and vashat, and performs sacrifices and other rites, need not fear the afterlife in all the three worlds. So say the Vedas, and the best of Rishis.

He in whom abide the Riks, the Yajuses, the Samans and the inflections necessary for completing the rhythm of the Samans in accord with the rules of Vedic grammar, is indeed a Brahmana.

You know, O adorable Brahmana, about the benefits of Agnihotra, the Soma yagna, and other great yagnas. Hence, one should sacrifice and assist at other's sacrifices, without scruples of any kind. He who performs the Jyotishtoma yagna, and the rest that lead to swarga, acquires high rewards hereafter in the form of heavenly beatitude. This is certain, that those who do not perform sacrifices have neither this world, nor the next.

Those who know the revelations of the Vedas regard both kinds of explanations, the ones that urge actions and those that preach abstention, to be equally authoritative.”

Kapila said, "Knowing that all the fruits of karma are terminable, Yatis embrace samyama and shanti, to attain Brahman through the path of knowledge. There is nothing in any of the worlds that can stop them, for, by mere exercise of their will, they achieve all their wishes.

They are freed from the influence of duality. They never bow down to anything or anyone. They are wise and above all the bonds of want. They are free from every sin. Pure and spotless, they live and roam blissfully wherever they will. Their minds are clear about all moral things and renunciation.

Devoted to Brahman, akin to Brahman, they have taken refuge in Brahman. Transcending sorrow, and freed from rajas, they have acquired the eternal. When the high goal is within reach, where is the need to live as a grihasta?"

Syumarasmi said, "If Brahman is the highest object of acquisition, if it truly is the highest end attained by renunciation, then the importance of the grihastasrama becomes evident. Because, without the grihastasrama no other asrama of life can ever become possible. Indeed, as all living creatures survive because of their dependence on their mothers, so do the three other asramas exist as a result of their dependence on the grihastasrama.

For the welfare of his family, the householder performs sacrifices, and practices penances. Hence, the roots of happiness lie within the domestic life. All living beings consider procreation of children as a great source of joy. In any asrama other than the family life, this is impossible to achieve.

Every kind of grass and straw, all plants, herbs and crops that yield corn or grain, and others of the kind that grow on hills and mountains, have the grihastasrama as their source. The life of living beings depends upon these crops, and since nothing else other than life is seen in the universe, domesticity may be considered as the haven of the entire universe. Who then speaks the truth that says that domesticity cannot lead to moksha?

Only those who are destitute of faith, wisdom and insight, who are bereft of reputation, idle and toil-worn, who are miserable due to their past evil karma, and those who are ignorant, perceive the abundance of peace in a life of mendicancy. The eternal and clear Vedic distinctions are the causes that sustain the three worlds. The illustrious man of the highest order, who knows the Vedas, is worshipped from the moment he is born. Besides the garbhadhana, men of the enlightened varnas need Veda mantras to accomplish all their tasks in both this and the other world.

Veda mantras are necessary for cremation, to attain and nourish the next body, while gifting cows and other animals to help cross the river that divides the shores of prana from those of Yama, and for the ceremony of pinda dana to ancestors. Even the three classes of Pitris—the Archishmats, Barhishads and Kravyadas—approve of the need of mantras and their efficacy at the time of rites in honour of the deceased.

When the Vedas are so clear about this and it is evident that all human beings are indebted to the Pitris, Rishis and Devas, how then can anyone attain moksha? This false doctrine of ethereal existence called mukti, apparently dressed in colours of truth, but subversive of the real purport of the revelations of the Vedas, has been introduced by learned men robbed of prosperity and consumed by idleness.

A Brahmana who performs approved sacrifices is never seduced by sin. In fact, he attains high regions of felicity along with the animals he has slain in the sacrifices, and gratified by achieving his wishes, succeeds in pleasing the very animals. No one ever succeeds in attaining the Supreme through disregard of the Vedas, not with guile, or deception. On the contrary, one achieves Brahman through practising the rites prescribed in the Vedas."Kapila said, "If actions are obligatory, there are the Darsa, Paurnamasa, Agnihotra, Chaturmasya and others for the man of buddhi. They are full of eternal merit. Why then do something that involves cruelty?

Those who have taken to sannyasa, and know Brahman, succeed in paying their debts to the Devas, Rishis and Pitris. The very gods are unable to trace the path of the trackless person who appoints himself as the soul of all creatures and who looks upon all creatures as one.

Through the guru, one learns about how that which dwells within this body has a fourfold nature, with four doors and four mouths. Endowed with two arms, the organ of speech, a stomach and the organ of pleasure, even the gods are said to have four sensory doors. One should, therefore, strive one's best to keep the senses under control.

Men should not gamble, nor appropriate what belongs to another. They should not assist at the sacrifice of an ignoble person, nor yield to wrath and strike another with hands or feet. The wise man who conducts himself in this way is in control of his limbs.

He should not indulge in vociferous abuse or censure, nor speak words that are vain. He should forbear from duplicity and slander. He should be truthful, sparing in speech and always heedful. In this manner, one should be pure and restrained of speech.

He must not abstain from food entirely, nor should he eat too much. He should renounce greed, and always seek the company of the good. He should eat only as much as is needed for sustenance. Through such behaviour, one controls the stomach.

He should not lustfully take another wife, when he is already married, nor summon a woman to bed except in her season. He should be content with his own wife and not seek congress with other women. Through this manner, he controls his organ of pleasure.

A wise man, who has all these four senses under control, is truly enlightened.

Everything becomes useless to him whose sensory doors are not in check. What can the tapasya of such a man achieve? What can his sacrifices bring about? What can be accomplished by his body?

The Devas know him for a Brahmana who, with a serene heart, sheds his upper garment, sleeps on the bare ground, and makes his arm a pillow. The one who singly enjoys all the happiness that married couples enjoy, who is not distracted by the joys and sorrow of others, and remains focused in meditation, should be known as a Brahmana.

He who rightly understands all this as it exists in reality with its numerous transformations, and who knows what the end is of all created things, is known by the gods for a Brahmana. He who does not fear any creature and whom no creature fears, who constitutes himself the soul of all creatures, should be known for a Brahmana.

Purity of heart is the true result of all pious deeds. Even when explained by gurus, foolish men bereft of such purity, are not able to gather what is required for the making of a Brahmana. These ignorant men wish for fruits of a different kind—swarga and its passing joys.

Unable to practice even a small part of the good conduct which has descended from time immemorial, which is eternal, and characterised by certainty, it enters as a thread into all our duties, which intelligent men from all modes of life embrace, and transform their individual dharma and penances into formidable weapons to destroy the ignorance and evils of worldliness. Actions that are eternal and fraught with the highest energy, which present visible gains, are considered by fools to be not sanctioned by the scriptures, and thus fruitless and deviations from the proper path.

In truth, however, such karmas are the very opposite of those that are seen in times of distress; it is the very core of heedfulness and is never affected by lust, wrath and other passions of the kind.

As to sacrifices—it is difficult to ascertain all their particulars. If determined, it is exceedingly hard to observe them in practice. If practiced, their fruits are terminable. Mark this well and walk the path of knowledge."

Syumarasmi said, "The Vedas acknowledge karma but also disapprove of it. Where is their authority when their statements contradict each other? Besides, renunciation of actions, yields great benefit. Both these have been indicated in the Vedas. Do speak to me on this subject, O Brahmana!"

Kapila replied, "Through the direct evidence of your senses, you are able to realise the benefits of yoga in this very life. What are the visible results of your actions in pursuit of other objects?"

Syumarasmi replied, "O Brahmana, I am Syumarasmi. I have come here to acquire knowledge. I have begun this conversation in artless candour out of a need for my own good, and not from a thirst for debate. The dark question has taken possession of my mind. O illustrious one, dispel the darkness.

You have said that those who embrace yoga, which leads to Brahman, realise its fruits through the direct evidence of their senses. What, indeed, is so realised by this direct evidence that you also pursue? I have avoided all sciences that have controversy for their sole objective, and studied the Agamas with enough intensity to have mastered their true meaning. Through the Agamas, I understand the declarations of the Vedas. I also include all those vigyanas based on logic, which are aimed at revealing the real and inner meaning of the Vedas.

Without circumventing the duties laid down for his asrama, one should pursue the practices laid down in the Agamas, which are sure to meet with success. Because of the certainty of its conclusions, the success to which the Agamas leads may be said to be almost realisable by direct evidence. Just as passengers of a ship cannot be taken to the port of their will by being towed by another ship bound for a different port, similarly we can never cross the interminable river of birth and death by being bound to our past karmas.

Speak to me on this subject, O illustrious one! Teach me as a guru does his sishya. There is not a man who has completely renounced all worldly objects, who is perfectly content with himself, who has transcended sorrow, and is perfectly free from disease. No one has entirely abstained from activity of every kind, is free from the need for action or has an absolute distaste for companionship. Like us, even you are seen to give way to joy and indulge in despair, and like other beings, your senses have their functions and objects. Tell me, if we are to investigate happiness, where can pure felicity be found for the four varnas and four asramas, which have the same foundation for their tendencies?"

Kapila said, "Whichever shastras one may follow to perform one's duties, the niyamas, ordinances, laid down in it to rule one's actions never become fruitless. Whatever again the patha that one may tread, with yoga, one is sure to attain the highest only through observing dharma.

Knowledge helps the one who pursues it; even so, deviating from gyana is the cause for suffering. It is evident that you are knowledgeable and dissociated from worldly objects, but have any of you, at any time, acquired the knowledge with which everything is viewed as identical with the one Universal Soul?

There are men who lack proper awareness of the scriptures, and are only happy with debate. Because they are overwhelmed by thirst and aversion, they become slaves of pride and arrogance. These arrogant ignorers of the shastras, these mistaken depredators of Brahman, who do not fully understand the meaning of scriptural tenets, refuse to pursue shanti and samyama, peace and restraint. These men behold emptiness on every side, and, if perchance they succeed in acquiring the power of knowledge, they never impart it for the benefit of others.

Yielded entirely of the tamoguna, they have tamas as their only refuge. One becomes prone to all the incidents of the nature, which one imbibes. Accordingly, for the one with tamas for his sanctuary, the passions of envy, lust, wrath, pride, falsehood, and vanity are constantly on the rise. Thinking in this strain and considering these faults, Yatis who seek the highest goal, abandon both good and evil, and take to yoga."

Syumarasmi said, "O Brahmana, all that I said in praise of action and renunciation, is agreeable to the scriptures. Nevertheless, it is true that, without proper realisation of the meaning of the scriptures, one does not feel inclined to abide by what they declare. Whatever conduct is consistent with dharma is proper with the shastras. Even the sruti confirms this. Similarly, whatever conduct is inconsistent with dharma, is in conflict with the scriptures. This too is affirmed by the sruti. It is certain that no one can do anything scriptural by transgressing the scriptures, and that which is against the Vedas is unscriptural. The sruti confirms this.

Many men, who believe only what directly appeals to their senses, witness only this world. They do not perceive what the scriptures declare as faults. Like us, they have to give way to sorrow. The objects of the senses with which men like you are concerned are the same ones by which other living creatures are affected. Yet, because of your knowledge of the Soul, and their ignorance of it, how vast is the difference between the two of you.

The four varnas, and the four asramas, with their different dharmas, seek the same single end, Akhanda-Ananda, Universal Bliss.

You possess unquestioned talents and abilities. By identifying a specific path, which is appropriate to reach the goal, and by speaking to me on the infinite Brahman, you have filled my soul with peace. As for us, because we are unable to comprehend the Atman, we are robbed of a proper grasp of reality. Our wisdom is concerned with things that are low, and we are enveloped in thick darkness. The path that you have indicated in order to attain moksha is exceedingly difficult to practice. Only a dispassionate yogi, who has discharged all his karmas, and brought his soul under perfect control, can transgress the declarations of the Vedas with regard to actions, and say that he has mukti. Still, for one who lives in the midst of relatives, this course of conduct is indeed difficult to follow.

If the practices of giving gifts, sacrifices, studying of the Vedas, begetting children, simplicity of conduct, do not bestow mukti on anyone—then fie on him who seeks it, and fie on moksha itself! It seems that the labour spent in its pursuit is fruitless.

One is accused of atheism if he disregards the directives of the Vedas. O illustrious one, I wish to hear about mukti as described in the Vedas after the declarations in favour of karma. Do you tell me the truth, O Brahmana. I sit at your feet as a disciple. Teach me, kindly! I wish to know as much about moksha as is known to you, O learned one."

Kapila said, "Everyone accepts the authority of the Vedas. People never disregard them. Brahman is of two kinds—as represented by sound, sabdabrahman, and as supreme and intangible, nirguna Brahman. One who knows Brahman represented by sound succeeds in attaining Supreme Brahman. Beginning with garbhadhana, insemination, the body that the progenitor creates with the help of Vedic mantras is cleansed upon birth. Thereafter, its living entity is known as a Brahmana who becomes a vessel fit to receive knowledge of the Brahman. Know that the reward of actions is purity of heart, which leads to mukti.

The person who has gained it can only know whether purity of heart is acquired. The Vedas or inference can never know it. Those who do not cherish any expectation, who give away surplus wealth, who are not covetous, and are free from every kind of affection and aversion, believe that it is their dharma to perform sacrifices. Charity towards deserving persons is the right use of all wealth.

Long ago, there were many men who were never addicted to sinful ways; they performed the prescribed rites of the Veda, and easily achieved what they wished for. Gyana provided them with positive views, through which they did not give in to anger or envy, and helped them remain free from pride and malice. These men were true yogis of pure birth devoted to the good of all creatures. They lived as grihastas very faithful to their svadharma.

There were many kings as well, like Janaka, and many Brahmanas like Yajnavalkya, and others too—all equally blessed and endowed, and devoted to yoga. They were sincere and equal in their behaviour towards all beings. They were satisfied men, gifted with infallible knowledge, and the fruits of their dharma were plainly visible. With pure hearts and good conduct, these men duly observed all vows and believed in Brahman of both forms. Even in times of distress and hardship, they never flinched from their obligations to dharma. Together they performed meritorious deeds in which they found great happiness. And because they never erred, no need ever arose for them to perform any atonement.

Their reliance upon the true course of dharma invested them with irresistible tejas, and in order to earn punya, they ignored their own intelligence and chose to live by the dictates of the scriptures alone. In this way, they were never guilty of guile in the matter of performing deeds of dharma. Because of their undivided observance of the absolute precepts of the scriptures, they were never required to perform penances. There is no expiation for men who observe the edicts of the scriptures. The sruti declares that tapasya exists for only men that are weak and unable to follow the absolute requirements of the sacred law.

In olden days, there were many famed Brahmanas of profound knowledge of the Vedas, who were pure and of righteous conduct. They always worshipped Brahma in the sacrifices, and were free from greed. Gifted with great wisdom, they transcended all the bonds of life. With their yagnas, their vidya, their ethical karmas, their devoted study of the shastras, these men were free from lust and wrath, and they observed pious carriage and actions in the face of all difficulties.

Renowned as they were for performing the duties of their own varnas and asramas, purified as their souls were by their very nature, characterised as they were by thorough sincerity, devoted as they were to peace, and mindful as they were of their svadharma—these men were identical with infinite Brahman. Furthermore, the eternal sruti informs us about how the tapasya of exalted men become efficacious weapons for the destruction of all earthly yearnings.

The Brahmanas say that sadachara, good conduct, and its eternal unchangeable characteristics may be traced to the most ancient times. Even though good men may deviate from it in some situations, they eventually turn to it in times of distress. As it is identical with awareness—lust, wrath and other evil passions can never prevail upon it. This is why, in days of old, in all humankind, there was no sin or transgression. Men, who were unable to practice good conduct in its entirety, subsequently distributed it into four divisions that correspond with the four asramas of life.

Good men who observe sadachara from all the four asramas, beginning with sannyasa, vanaprastha, grihasta and brahmacharya, all attain the highest goal of Brahman. As affirmed in the Vedas, countless Brahmanas have acquired ananta and now reside as shining stars and constellations across the firmament—as a result of renunciation. If such men are reborn, they are never tainted by residual sins accumulated from previous lives.

Indeed, the brahmacharin who has dutifully served his guru, devoted himself to yoga and realised the Atman, is truly a Brahmana. Who else would deserve to be called a Brahmana? Actions alone determine who is a Brahmana—deeds must be held accountable for the happiness or misery of a person. Once again, we hear from the sruti about men who conquer evil passions and acquire purity of heart. Of how they perceive everything to be Brahman, because of the infinity they attain and of the knowledge of Brahman that they acquire.

The duties for these chaste men who have moksha and brahmagyana as their sole aim are equally laid down for all the four varnas and the four asramas of life. Truly, Brahmanas of pure hearts and restrained Souls always acquire that knowledge. He who is content and his Soul is set on renunciation, is seen as the refuge of true knowledge.

Parityaga, in which there is wisdom that leads to moksha, is essential for a Brahmana. Since ages, times out of mind, it has passed down from guru to sishya. Nirvritti, abstention, sometimes exists mixed with the duties of other asramas, but whether it exists in that state or by itself, one practices it in keeping with the measure of one's spiritual maturity. Abstinence is of supreme benefit to everyone. Only the weak fail to practice it. The pure-hearted man who seeks to attain Brahman is rescued from the world of suffering."

Syumarasmi said, "Among those who have surrendered to joys of ownership, men who are charitable, others who perform sacrifices, some who study the Vedas, and even the sannyasin, O Brahmana, who indeed from these, acquires the highest place in swarga when they depart from this world? I ask you this, O Brahmana. Do you tell me truly."

Kapila replied, “The grihastas are certainly auspicious and acquire excellence of every kind. Still, they are unable to enjoy the felicity that attaches to parityaga. Even you must see this.”

Syumarasmi said, “You depend upon knowledge as the means for mukti. The grihastas have invested their faith in dharma. Even so, it is said that the goal of all the asramas of life is mukti. No difference, therefore, is distinguished between them with regard to either their superiority or inferiority. O illustrious one, please tell me then how this matter truly stands.”

Kapila said, “Karma only cleanses the body. Gyana, however, is the highest goal. When the heart is pure, and the bliss of Brahman abides in knowledge, then, benevolence, forgiveness, peace, compassion, truthfulness and candour, non-violence, absence of pride, modesty, renunciation and abstention from work are all naturally attained.

These form the path that lead to Brahman. By them, one attains the highest. To the wise, it becomes clear that the purification of the heart is attained by performing one’s svadharma. This, indeed, is the highest goal to be gained by Brahmanas.

He, who acquires knowledge of the Vedas, and the finer aspects of kriya, is well versed in the Vedas. Any other man is only as a bag of wind. He who understands the Vedas knows everything, for everything is established on them. Truly, the past, present and future all exist in the Vedas.

The one conclusion deducible from all the shastras is that this universe both exists and does not exist. To the gyani, all that is perceived is both satya and asatya. To him, all this is both the end and the middle. This truth rests upon all the Vedas, that when complete nirvritti occurs one receives what is sufficient.

Then again, the highest satisfaction follows and rests upon moksha, which is absolute, exists as the soul of all mortal and immortal things, is acclaimed as the Paramatman soul, and is the highest goal of gyana.

It is identical with all being, chala and achala, is complete, and is perfect felicity; it is without duality, and is the most excellent of all things. It is the Avyakta Brahman, as well as the cause from where the unmanifest has emerged, and is without decay of any kind.

The three causes of perfect joy are an ability to subdue the senses, forgiveness and abstention from activity, which is born from an absence of desire. With the help of these three qualities, sages successfully reach the uncreated Brahman, which is the prime cause of the universe, is unchangeable and beyond destruction. I bow to that Brahman, which is identical with him who knows it.”

CANTO 271

Yudhishtira says, 'Bhaarata, the Vedas speak of dharma, labha and ananda. Tell me, even so, O Pitamaha, the attainment of which amongst these three is superior.'

Bhishma replies, 'There is an old tale about this, of the boon that Kundadhara once conferred upon one of his devotees. Listen to it.

Once upon a time, a poor Brahmana was in search of dharma. In order to perform sacrifices he constantly sought wealth for which he practiced austere tapasya. Committed to accomplish his purpose, he worshipped the Devas with great devotion, but he failed to acquire wealth by such worship. Hence, he reflected to himself, "Who is the Deva, hitherto neglected by men, who may be favourably disposed to reward me without delay?"

While calmly meditating in this manner, he beheld stationed before him the retainer of the Devas, the cloud-named Kundadhara.

As soon as he saw the mighty-armed being, the Brahmana's feelings of devotion were excited, and he said to himself, "This one will surely bestow prosperity upon me. Indeed, his form indicates as much. He lives in close proximity to the gods and other men do not yet worship him. He will verily give me abundant wealth, instantly."

The Brahmana, then, worshipped Kundadhara with dhupa, sugandha and malyadaman, garlands of flowers, of the most superior kind, and diverse other offerings.

Worshipped in this manner, Kundadhara was very pleased and spoke these favourable words to the Brahmana, "The wise have ordained redemption for he who is guilty of brahmahatya, who drinks alcohol, steals or neglects punya vratas. There is no atonement, however, for the man who is ungrateful.

Expectation has a child named sorrow. Ire is the child of envy. Cupidity is the child of deceit. Whereas ingratitude is barren and has no children."

After this, the Brahmana stretched out on a bed of kusa grass, and infused with the tejas of Kundadhara, he beheld all living beings in a dream. Indeed, because of his absence of passion, his penances and devotion, the chaste and celibate Brahmana witnessed that night the result of his devotion to Kundadhara.

Truly, O Yudhishtira, he saw the high-souled and resplendent Manibhadra stationed in the midst of the Devas, engaged in dispensing wisdom and instruction. The gods were engrossed in bestowing kingdoms and riches upon men, prompted by their good deeds, and in seizing them from men who declined from dharma.

Then, O bull of Bharata's race, Kundadhara bowed low, and prostrated himself on the ground before the Devas in the presence of all the Yakshas. At the behest of the Devas, Manibhadra addressed Kundadhara and said, "What does Kundadhara wish?"

Kundadhara replied, "If, indeed, the lords are pleased with me, that Brahmana there reverences me greatly and I pray for some favour being shown to him, something that may bring him happiness."

Hearing this, Manibhadra said, "Rise, O Kundadhara! Your boon is granted. Rejoice! If this Brahmana wishes for affluence, let as much wealth as he needs be given to him. At the behest of the Devas I will give him untold riches."

Kundadhara was aware of the fleeting nature of humankind, O Yudhishtira, so he decided to inspire the Brahmana towards tapasya.

Kundadhara said, "I do not, O giver of wealth, beg for prosperity on behalf of this Brahmana. I wish that you bestow another boon upon him. For this devotee of mine, I do not seek mountains of pearls and gems nor the whole earth with all her riches. I desire, however, that he should be virtuous. Let his heart find pleasure in goodness. Let him have purity. Let dharma be the loftiest of all objectives with him. Such is the boon that meets with my approval."

Manibhadra replied, "The fruits of virtue are always sovereignty and happiness of diverse kinds. Ever freed from physical pain of every kind, let him enjoy such rewards."

Nevertheless, Kundadhara repeatedly pleaded for dharma alone for the Brahmana, and the Devas were greatly pleased with this.

Manibhadra said, "The gods are all pleased with you and the Brahmana, who will become a virtuous man, and his mind will be devoted to dharma."

Kundadhara was delighted, O Yudhishtira, with the fulfilment of his wish. The boon that he received was unattainable by anybody else.

The Brahmana saw, scattered around him, reams of delicate silks and other priceless things. With a total disregard for them, he came to loathe the world.

The Brahmana said, "When Kundadhara does not value good deeds, who else will? I had better go into the forest to lead a life of tapasya."

With an abhorrence for the world, and through the grace of the gods, the peerless Brahmana entered the jungle and began the austerest of penances.

Subsisting upon fruits and roots left over after serving the Devas and Atithis, the mind of the enlightened one, O monarch, was firmly set upon dharma. Gradually, the Brahmana renounced fruits and roots, and took to eating leaves for his food. Later, he forsook these as well and survived just on water, until at last he passed many years by living on air alone. All the while, his strength did not diminish. This seemed most marvellous. Devoted to dharma, and engaged in the severest austerities, he eventually acquired spiritual perception.

He then reflected to himself, "If someone pleases me, and I wish wealth upon him, my words will come true." His face sparkled with smiles, as he once more took to even stricter tapasya. Now that he had won even greater ascetic success, he thought that he could create the very highest objects, through sheer power of his will. "If I merely wish sovereignty upon someone I am pleased with, he will immediately become a king, for my wish will instantly come true."

While he was thinking in this way, Kundadhara, inspired by his friendship for the Brahmana and no less in his yoga shakti, materialised, O

Bhaarata, before his friend and devotee. Seeing him, the Brahmana offered the customary adorations. The Brahmana, however, soon felt some surprise, O king.

Turning to the Brahmana, Kundadhara said, “Through this excellent spiritual vision you have now realised, observe the end that is achieved by kings, and survey all the worlds besides.” From a distance, the Brahmana observed thousands of kings sunk in hell.

Kundadhara said, “You feel that even though you worshipped me with devotion, all you received in return is sorrow. Of what use and value is my boon to you? Look at the end for which men crave the satisfaction of carnal pleasures. The door of heaven is shut to them.”

The Brahmana witnessed many men living in this world, embracing lust, anger, cupidity, fear, pride, sleep, hesitation and idleness.’

Kundadhara said, “Human beings are enslaved with these vices. The gods are afraid of men. At the behest of the Devas, these vices mar and disconcert Manavas on every side. No man can become virtuous unless permitted by the Devas. It is with their consent that you are able to give away kingdoms and wealth through your tapasya.”

When the Brahmana heard this, he prostrated on the ground before Kundadhara, and said, “You have indeed opened my eyes. Unconscious of your great affection towards me, through the influence of desire and cupidity, I failed to show gratitude to you.”

Kundadhara embraced him and replied, “I forgive you.” And there and then, Kundadhara disappeared.

The Brahmana then ranged through all the worlds with the help of the yoga shakti bestowed on him through Kundadhara’s grace. One is able to sail through the skies and to fructify all one’s wishes and purposes, and finally reach the highest goal, with the energy gained from sattva and tapasya.

The Devas, Brahmanas, Yakshas, Charanas and Sajjanas, good men, always adore those that are virtuous but never those that are rich or given up to the indulgence of their desires. The gods are truly propitious to you since your mind is devoted to dharma. In wealth there may be some brief happiness but in dharma the measure of happiness is endless.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘Amongst the myriad sacrifices, all of which are regarded to have but one object, the cleansing of the heart or the glory of God, tell me, O Pitamaha, which of these yagnas is assigned only for the sake of dharma and not for the acquisition of either heaven or prosperity?’

Bhishma says, ‘About this, Narada once spoke of a Brahmana who lived in the Unchha vrata to perform yagnas. Listen to that story.

Narada said, “In one of the superior kingdoms distinguished for virtue, there once lived a Brahmana who worshipped Vishnu in sacrifices and, devoted to penances, lived according to the Unchha vrata.

For his sustenance, he ate syamaka, suryaparni, suvarchala and other herbs that are bitter to the taste; but, because of his tapasya, they tasted sweet.

At peace with all the animals, he lived as a hermit in the forest, and gained ascetic success.

With roots and fruits, O scorcher of foes, he adored Vishnu in sacrifices that were intended to bestow swarga upon him.

The Brahmana’s name was Satya, and his wife was Pushkaradharini and her garments were made of fallen plumes of peacocks. She was pure-minded, and had liberated herself through many austere vows. A benevolent woman, she did not approve of her husband’s addiction to performing sacrifices that were cruel. Still, summoned as she was to take her rightful seat by his side to perform a yagna, she tolerated his conduct lest she incur his curse. At the behest of her lord who was its hotri, she performed the yagna, unwillingly.

In the forest near the Brahmana's asrama, there lived a neighbour, the virtuous Parnada of Sukra's vamsa, in the form of a deer.

He addressed Satya, in a clear voice and said, "Your yagna will be most inappropriate if you perform a sacrifice in a manner which is defective in mantras and other rituals. I, therefore, ask you to slay and cut me into pieces as an offering for your sacrificial fire. Do this and you will ascend to swarga without any sin or guilt."

At once, Savitri, the presiding Goddess of the Sun, appeared in her embodied form and insisted that the Brahmana take heed of the deer's words. Despite her insistence, the Brahmana replied, "I will not kill this deer who lives with me as my neighbour."

Since Devi Savitri did not wish to see defects in the sacrifice, she acceded to the words of the Brahmana and entered the yagna to survey the nether world.

The deer joined his hands and once again pleaded with Satya to be cut into pieces and sacrificed. Nevertheless, Satya embraced him in friendship and told him to go his way. The deer obeyed him and went away. Hardly had he taken eight steps when he returned, and pleaded once more, "Indeed, slay me. For if you do, I will surely acquire dharma. Let me give you spiritual drishti, whereby you will witness the celestial apsaras and the beautiful rathas of the exalted Gandharvas."

Satya examined the sight at length with longing. He also noted the deer's willingness to be sacrificed, and thinking that swarga was attainable only through slaughter, he admired the deer's counsel.

It was Dharma himself who had become a deer that lived in those jungles for many years. He provided for the Brahmana's salvation and counselled him, saying that the slaughter of living creatures is not harmonious with the ordinances laid down for yagnas.

The great magnitude of the penances of Satya, whose mind had entertained the need for killing the deer, diminished vastly because of the very thought. Thus, himsa towards living creatures forms no part of a true yagna.

The illustrious Dharma at once assumed his real form and assisted Satya to perform the sacrifice. Thereafter, the Brahmana's inner nature was as one with that of his wife Pushkaradharini.

Ahimsa is that dharma which is complete in respect of its rewards. The religion, however, of cruelty is beneficial only insofar as it leads to a terminable heaven. I have spoken to you of dharma, which, indeed, is the religion of those who speak of Brahman.'

CANTO 273

Yudhishtira says, 'By what means does a man become paapi, a sinner? How does he achieve punya, how does he attain parityaga, and how does he achieve moksha?'

Bhishma says, 'You are well aware of all dharma. Your question is only for affirmation of your own findings. Listen now about sin, virtue, renunciation and emancipation, to their very roots.

Upon the perception of any one of the five senses—form, taste, scent, sound and touch—desire, or aversion, as the case may be, responds to it at first. Accordingly, one performs various laborious tasks and actions. As in the case of pleasure, one struggles hard to experience it repeatedly. Gradually, attachment, aversion, greed and errors of judgement arise.

The mind of the man overwhelmed by greed and error, and who is affected by attachment and aversion, is never fixed on dharma. Instead, it turns to hypocrisy to perform good deeds. Indeed, with the help of deceit and deception it then seeks to acquire wealth and virtue, artha and dharma.

When a man succeeds, O son of Kuru's vamsa, in winning wealth with duplicity, his heart becomes fixed on such means of acquisition. He then begins to perform sinful deeds, unmindful of the admonitions of the wise and of well-wishers. He responds to them with answers plausibly consistent with reason and agreeable to the injunctions of the scriptures. Born of attachment and error, his sins rapidly increase, for he thinks, speaks, and acts sinfully.

His advent on the path of sin and his evil ways are marked by the virtuous. And, even as birds of similar species fly together, those with similar sinful traits embrace him as a friend. He does not succeed in winning happiness even here. Where then would he succeed in winning happiness hereafter? In this manner, he becomes a paapi, a sinner.

Listen now as I speak to you of the righteous man. As long as such a man seeks the good of others, he succeeds in winning well-being for himself. By practising duties that are fraught with other people's weal, he eventually attains a highly pleasant end.

He, who foresees the faults, mentioned earlier, who is adept in judging happiness and sorrow and how each is brought about, and who respectfully attends on those that are righteous, makes progress in achieving virtue. The mind of such a man takes delight in sattva, and he lives on, making dharma his support.

If he sets his heart on the acquisition of wealth, he desires only such wealth as may be gained through dharma. Surely, he nurtures the roots of only such things in which he sees punya. In this way, he becomes a man of dharma and acquires friends that are virtuous. With good friends, wealth and children acquired, he revels in happiness both here and in the hereafter.

Remember this, O Bhaarata, the mastery that a man attains over sound, touch, taste, form and scent, represent the fruits of dharma. Even though he gains these rewards, O Yudhishtira, he does not give in to joy; instead, guided by gyana, he takes to sannyasa, and ceases to indulge in gratifying the senses, whereby he succeeds in freeing himself from passion. Even so, he does not discard virtue or righteous actions. Once he realises the transitory nature of all the worlds, he strives to abandon even punya karma with its rewards of swarga and sukha, and endeavours to attain moksha. In time, he abandons all indulgence and sin, embraces renunciation, becomes chaste, and eventually does attain mukti.

O Bhaarata, I have now replied to your queries on papam, dharma, vairagya and moksha. You should, therefore, O Yudhishtira, adhere to sattva in all situations. Eternal will be the success, O son of Kunti, of you who respect dharma.'

Yudhishtira says, 'You say, O Pitamaha, that mukti is to be won by certain means and not through others. I wish to know more about these methods, O Anagha.'

Bhishma says, 'O Rajarishi, your question about this subtle subject is worthy of you, for you always try to accomplish your goals through appropriate means. The image of a jar remains in the potter's mind as long as he is moulding it, and disappears once it is complete. Similarly, the cause, which urges men who regard dharma as the root of advancement and prosperity, ceases to function for those who seek mukti. The path to the eastern ocean is not the same as the one that leads to the western ocean. There is only one path that leads to moksha, and it is different from those that lead to earthly possessions. Listen, as I explain this in detail.

To overcome anger, one practices forgiveness and discards all ambition to uproot desire. To overcome sleep, embrace the sattva guna, and resist fear through awareness. To conquer prana, meditate upon the Atman.

Patience dispels desire, aversion and lust, whereas the study of truth eliminates error, ignorance and suspicion. In pursuit of knowledge, one should avoid insouciance and inquiry after things of no value.

Through frugal and easily digestible food, one should rid oneself of all disorders and diseases. With contentment, one should dispel greed and confusion, and all worldly concerns should be avoided by a knowledge of the truth.

Through benevolence, one should quell iniquity, and with love for all creatures, one should acquire virtue. One should avoid expectation with the observation that it is concerned with the future; and one should discard wealth by abandoning desire itself.

With the knowledge that the world is transitory, the wise should forgo affection. Through yoga, they should subdue hunger, with benevolence shun all ideas of self-importance, and by being content, banish all manner of craving. Procrastination must be overcome with timely action and uncertainty through confidence. With the help of taciturnity and courage, one should overcome every kind of fear.

Speech and the mind must be controlled by buddhi, which in turn is restrained with gyana. Gyana, again, is disciplined through awareness of the Atman, and finally the Paramatman masters the Atman. This last is attainable by those who are pure of actions and gifted with serenity of the Soul.

Discard desire, wrath, greed, fear, sleep, and silently practice meditation, study, charity, truth, modesty, candour, forgiveness, purity of heart and of food, and mastery over the senses. These are all favourable to yoga, and help increase one's energy, dispel sins, fulfil wishes and help gain inclusive knowledge.

When a man purifies his paapa, acquires tejas and mastery of his indriyas, he then proceeds to subdue kama and krodha, in order to attain Brahman.

Gyana, yoga, freedom from desire and wrath, absence of pride and haughtiness, freedom from anxiety and paucity of attachment to home and family, constitute the road to moksha. This path is gentle, delightful and pure. Similarly, to restrain speech, the body and the mind, from a lack of desire, also comprises the path to mukti.'

CANTO 275

Bhishma says, 'There is an ancient tale of a discourse on this subject that took place between Narada and Asita-Devala. Once upon a time, Narada queried the most intelligent of men, Devala, about the origin and the destruction of all creatures.

Narada said, "From where, O Brahmana, has this universe, been created? Whence again does the universal destruction come, and into whom does the universe merge? O Muni, explain this to me."

Asita-Devala said, "When the Paramatman wishes to exist in manifold forms he creates all beings, and the gyanis say that the materials from which he creates them are known as the five great essences, the Panchamahabhutas. Buddhi thereafter urges Kaala to create other objects from the five. He, who claims that there is anything else besides these, is wrong. Realise, O Narada, that these five are eternal, indestructible and without beginning or end. With Kaala as their sixth, Apah, Akasa, Prithvi, Vayu and Agni are naturally endowed with great tejas. Surely, there is nothing higher or superior to these in energy. No one can affirm the existence of anything else based on conclusions reached from the srutis or from arguments drawn from reason. If anyone does so, his assertion would be idle or vain.

Know that these six influence the cause of all effects. All of this, which you perceive, is called asat. These five, and time, along with the effects of past deeds, and ignorance, which form the eight eternal essences are the causes of the birth and the destruction of all creatures. On their death, creatures return to the five Mahabhutas, and when they are born, they emerge from the very same source.

Indeed, his body is made of earth; his ear has its origin in space; his eye has light for its cause; his breath is of wind and his blood is of water. The eyes, nose, ears, skin and the tongue are the senses. These, the learned know, exist for the perception of the objects of the senses. Sight, sound, smell, touch and taste are the functions of the senses that are concerned with five objects in five ways. Realise their likeness in qualities, through the inference of reason.

Although form, scent, taste, touch and sound appear to be individually apprehended by the five senses in five different manners, in reality, it is the Soul that experiences them through the senses, which are inert by their very nature.

Chitta is superior to the five senses. Manas is higher than Chitta. Greater than manas is buddhi, and kshetrajna transcends buddhi.

At first, a living creature perceives different objects through the senses. With manas, he reflects over them, and with the help of buddhi, he arrives at a certitude of knowledge. Equipped with buddhi, he ascertains objects perceived through the senses. Men who know the science of Adhyatma consider the five indriyas, Chitta, manas and buddhi, as instruments of knowledge.

The hands, feet, the anal duct, generative organ and the mouth, form the five organs of action. The mouth is considered an organ of action because it contains the means of speech, and of eating. The feet are mediums of motion and the hands of conducting various activities. The anal duct and the penis are two organs that exist for a similar purpose—evacuation. The first is for excretion of faeces, the second for that of urine as also of the vital seed in times of mating.

Besides these, there is a sixth channel of action: physical energy. These then are the six instruments of kama according to the shastras. I have now identified all the organs of knowledge and action, and all the qualities of the five primal essences.

When the organs get fatigued, they cease to function and grow lethargic, and the entity within the body, falls asleep. Even so, the functions of the mind do not cease, and it continues to concern itself with its goals. This is known as the svapnavastha, the dream state.

In jagratavastha, the wakeful state, there are three aspects of the mind—those of sattva, rajas and tamas: goodness, passion and darkness. In svapnavastha too, the mind relates with the same three states. When these gunas connect with enjoyable actions, and appear in dreams, they meet with approval.

Happiness, success, knowledge and neutrality are the signs of sattva. The states that the living beings experience in their wakeful hours are replayed in their memory when they sleep and dream.

The passage of our impressions from wakefulness to dreams, and the reverse, become transparent in the state of consciousness known as sushupti, dreamless sleep, which is eternal, and desirable.

There are five means of gyana, and five of karma. Along with saririka shakti—physical energy—manas, buddhi, Chitta and the traigunas, they are seventeen. These seventeen, with avidya making eighteen, dwell in the body attached to the Jivatma that owns the body. When the Jivatma leaves the body, the eighteen cease to co-exist in the body. The eighteen attributes, along with the eternal entity, which abides in the body, and ruchira, digestion, bring the total to twenty, and form that which is known as the Panchamahabhutas, the combination of the five.

There is a being called Mahat, which, with the help of prana, supports this combination of the twenty qualities, and in the event of the destruction of the body, Vayu, wind, is the only element left with Mahat.

Every living being resolves into the five constituent elements once his merits and demerits are exhausted; and receives a new body based on the punya and paapa accumulated through his deeds in the previous one. As his elements result from avidya, kama and kriya, and moved by Kaala, like a man who changes houses in succession, he repeatedly migrates from one body to another. The wise who witness this migration, do not give in to sorrow at seeing death. Only the ignorant, who are erroneously attached to relationships, where none exists in reality, look at such physical transitions and mourn.

Jiva is no one's relative; there is none again who belongs to him. Ever alone, he creates his own body, happiness, and sorrow. He is never born, nor does he ever die. Freed from the bond of the body, he succeeds sometimes in gaining the highest end. Deprived of the body, liberated through the exhaustion of paapa and punya, jiva at last attains Brahman.

The Samkhya school advocates gyana, in order to exhaust paapa and punya. When jiva gains the condition of Brahman, the Rishis consider it to have attained its highest goal.”

Yudhishtira says, ‘Cruel and sinful that we are, alas, we have slain brothers, fathers, grandsons, kinsmen, friends and sons. How, O Pitamaha, will we dispel this thirst for kingdom and wealth? Ah! Through this thirst have we perpetrated so many sinful deeds.’

Bhishma says, ‘Listen to this old story which narrates the reply of the ruler of the Videhas to the queries of Mandavya.

The king of the Videhas said, “I own nothing, yet I live in great happiness. If my entire kingdom of Mithila were to be reduced to ashes in a great fire, still I would lose nothing. Tangible possessions, however valuable, are a source of despair to the wise, while belongings of even little value fascinate the ignorant. All worldly joys and heavenly bliss do not measure up to even a sixteenth part of the felicity that attends the complete absence of desire.

Like the cow’s horns that grow as she ages, likewise the thirst for wealth increases with each new acquisition. Any object for which one feels an attachment turns into a source of pain when it is lost. Therefore, one should not cherish cupidity, for it leads to sorrow. One should abandon aspiration and utilise wealth for the purpose of dharma.

The wise man always sees himself in others and, since he has purified his soul as well as acquired success, he lets go of everything. Through discarding of truth, falsehood, grief, joy, the agreeable and disagreeable, fearlessness and fear, one meets peace and freedom from anxiety.

Foolish men find it difficult to discard the thirst for worldly objects. The thirst wanes not with the decay of the body, and is perceived as a fatal disease by the wise. He, who succeeds in shunning it, is sure to find felicity.

The man of dharma, who observes how his own behaviour has become bright as the moon and free from evil, succeeds in happily attaining great fame both here and in the hereafter."

The Brahmana was overjoyed with these words of the king, and appreciating them, Mandavya advanced along the path of moksha.'

Yudhishtira says, ‘Kaala, the terror of all creatures, is running his course. What is the source of dharma after which one should strive? Tell me this, O Pitamaha.’

Bhishma says, ‘There is an ancient tale of a conversation between a father and his son. Listen to it, O Yudhishtira.

Once, O son of Pritha, a twice-born man devoted only to the study of the Vedas had a very intelligent son named Medhavin, who was a pandita on the subject of moksha dharma. The son one day asked a question of his father, who although ignorant of dharma, followed the precepts of the Vedas.’

The son said, “When the life span allotted to men is so short, O pita, what should a learned man do? Tell me this truly, O father, so that with your guidance, I may gain dharma.”

The father said, “After the study of the Vedas is completed as a brahmacharin, O son, one should, as a grihasta, aspire for children for the salvation of one’s ancestors. Later, after installing one’s sacred fire, and completing the customary yagnas, one should retire into the jungle to live in solitude as a vanaprastha. After this, one should become a sannyasi and calmly await death.”

The son said, “When the world is under attack and besieged on all sides; while such inescapable thunderbolts of fate fall in every direction, how can you speak so calmly?”

The father said, “What assails the world? What smothers it? What are the powerful calamities that fall on every side? Do you wish to frighten me with your words?”

The boy said, “Death storms the world. Decrepitude surrounds it. Days and nights constantly descend on it like thunderbolts. Why do you not take heed of these?

When I know that death waits for no one, how can I possibly wait for him, wrapped as I am in the ignorant pursuit of my petty concerns? Who can be happy in the knowledge that his life wears away with the passage of each night. Indeed, his position is similar to that of a fish that lives in shallow water, which evaporates each day.

As carefree as a man who casually plucks flowers, death strikes in the very midst of one’s tasks and ambitions. Hence, that which is kept for completion tomorrow should be done today, and that which one thinks of doing in the afternoon should be done in the morn. Death does not wait; it does not care if a man’s concerns are achieved or not. Therefore, do not delay, and attend to your needs today. Beware of Yama, from whom there is no escape, that he may not crush you before you finish your tasks. Can anyone be certain that death will not arrive this very day?

Life is uncertain and before one’s deeds are accomplished, Yama drags one away. One should, therefore, begin to embrace the sattva guna while one is still young. Through dharma, one is ensured eternal happiness both here and hereafter.

Overpowered by folly, man girds up his loins to slave on behalf of sons and wives. He satisfies these relatives through foul or fair means. Even such a man who is so devoted to his family—death seizes him, and makes off, like a tiger taking a sleeping deer. Even though man is busy fulfilling diverse wishes, and his desires remain unsatisfied, Yama seizes him and runs away as a she-wolf snatches a sheep.

‘This has been done’, ‘This remains to be done’, ‘This other is half done’, are words that one may say in one’s defence. However, death does not heed them, and hauls one away. Yama carries away the man who is yet to acquire the fruit of his labour. Yama claims the weak, the strong, the wise, the brave, the foolish, the learned, and him who has not yet realised his hopes.

From the moment a man is born, it is impossible for him to avoid death, decrepitude, disease, sorrow and their like. How, then, O father, can you sit so relaxed? These two, decay and death, own all forms of life, chala and achala.

When Yama's soldiers are on the march, nothing except the power of truth can resist them. For in satya alone dwells immortality. The delight of being in the midst of men is the pasture of death. The sruti says that the forest is the true range for the Devas, while the joy one feels in the midst of men, is the cord that binds one in helplessness. Men of dharma cut this cord and escape. Whereas sinners fail to sever it.

He who practices ahimsa with fellow beings, through thought, word and deed, and does not deprive them of their means of sustenance, is never harmed by any creature. Therefore, one must exercise the vow of truth, be firmly honest and seek nothing but satya.

One must restrain one's senses and look upon all creatures equally, and overcome death with the help of dharma. Both immortality and death are founded in the body. Death is met from ignorance, and immortality is won by truth.

Once I transcend kama and krodha, and practice ahimsa, I will embrace dharma and happily avoid death like an immortal.

When the sun moves northwards, I will restrain my senses and perform the Santi yagna, the Brahma yagna and the yagnas of speech, mind and actions. How can I conduct a brutal Pasu yagna? Gifted as I am with wisdom, how can I, like a savage Pisacha, commit hatya for a yagna, in the manner of Kshatriyas? That, too, a yagna with temporary benefits? I am atmaja, self-born, O pita, and without taking recourse to procreation, I will rest in my own atmabhava. For my salvation, I have no need of children; I will perform the yagna of the Atman.

He who is moderate in words and thoughts, he who performs tapasya, keeps vairagya and engages in yoga, is sure to acquire everything through these. There is no perception equal to knowledge, nor a reward to match awareness, nor a sorrow like attachment and no happiness like renunciation.

For a Brahmana, there is no wealth like solitude, an equal view towards all creatures, veracity in speech, unwavering good conduct, total abandonment of chastisement, simplicity and the gradual abstention from all actions. What need have you with wealth, relatives, friends and wives? You are a Brahmana and you have Mrityu to meet. Seek within yourself. Where have your forefathers gone and your father too?"

The father paid heed to his son's words and conformed to their directions, O Rajan! You also must behave in the same manner, and devote yourself to dharma.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Of what conduct must a man be, of what actions, of what kind of knowledge, and to what must he be devoted, in order to attain Brahman, which is immutable and transcends Prakriti?'

Bhishma says, 'He who worships the moksha dharma, is frugal with food, and the master of his senses, gains the realm which is changeless and transcends Prakriti. He should leave being a grihasta, evaluate gain and loss in the same light, restrain his senses, ignore all objects of need even when they are at hand, and embrace sannyasa.

Neither with the eye, nor with word, nor in thought, should he disparage another. He should speak no evil of any person either in or out of his hearing. He must abstain from himsa to any creature, and conduct himself observing the course of the sun. Born into this life, he should not dislike any creature. He should disregard opprobrious speeches, and never in arrogance deem himself superior to another. When provoked by another, he must still respond in agreeable words. Even when calumniated, he should not defame in return.

He should remain unbiased amidst fellow human beings. He must not visit many houses to collect alms, nor should he revisit the same houses. Even when abused by others, he should remain firm and refrain from addressing his abusers in unpleasant or obscene words. Instead, he must show compassion and abstain from himsa. He should be fearless, and control self-laudation.

The man of moderate senses should seek charity in a house where the food is already prepared, and the family has finished their meal and the dishes have been washed. He must content himself with only as much as is necessary for his sustenance. Even the smallest morsel that causes pleasure he should covet.

When he fails to get what he wants, he should not cherish discontent, nor be pleased with his gains. He should never wish for such things as yearned for by ordinary men, and never accept an invitation to dine at anybody's house. A man like him must shun gains even though they may be obtained with honour.

He should never find fault with the food placed before him, nor should he praise its merits. He must seek a bed and a seat away from populated places—a deserted house, the foot of a tree, a forest or a cave.

Without allowing his practices to be known by others, or concealing their real nature by appearing to adopt others, he should enter his own self. Through yoga and sannyasa, he must remain perfectly equable, constant and steadily fixed. He should not earn either merit or demerit through actions. He should be ever satisfied, joyous, fearless, always engaged in mantra japa, mowna, and wedded to sannyasa.

Aware of the cycle of birth and death of his body with the senses, and seeing how other beings appear and vanish, he should become free from want and learn to view everyone uniformly.

Subsisting frugally upon both cooked and uncooked food, he must subdue his senses, and gain peace of the self through the self. He should control the rising impulses of words, mind, wrath, envy, hunger and lust. He should devote himself to tapasya to purify his heart, and never allow censure to affect him.

He should come to accept a condition of neutrality to all creatures, and view praise and blame with indifference. This, indeed, is the holiest and the highest path of sannyasa. The venerable sannyasin should restrain his senses from all things and remain aloof from all attachments. He should never visit places already known to him, nor meet acquaintances from his earlier asramas of life.

A nomad, and friend to all creatures, he must devote himself to meditation of the Atman, and never mingle with grihastas and Munis. He should eat such food as he may receive without effort and design, and never allow pleasure to ensnare his heart. To the wise, sannyasa is the means for the attainment of mukti. For the ignorant, the practice of these ways is exceedingly laborious.

The Rishi Harita declared all this to be the path by which moksha is achieved. He who leaves his home with an assurance of total ahimsa towards all creatures, gains many bright regions of eternal felicity.'

CANTO 279

Yudhishtira says, ‘O Pitamaha, all men speak of us as being highly fortunate. In truth, there is no one more wretched than we are. Though honoured by the world, O best of the Kurus, and while born among men, we were begotten by the very Devas, yet, when so much anguish has been our fate, it seems, O sublime lord, that the cause of all sorrow is to be born in an embodied form. Alas, when will we adopt sannyasa, which annihilates this anguish?

To never incur rebirth, Rishis, in addition to their rigid vows, must be freed from the five breaths, mind, intellect, desire, wrath, greed and fear. Furthermore, they should be free from the ten organs of knowledge and action, the five faults of yoga, and sleep—that constitute the main causes for binding man to repeated births—and from the five objects of the senses and the traigunas. Ah, Parantapa, when will we succeed in forsaking sovereignty to adopt a life of sannyasa?’

Bhishma says, ‘Everything, O great monarch, has an end. Everything has bounds assigned to it. Even rebirth, it is well known, has an end. In this world, there is nothing that is immutable.

You consider, O king, your affluence to be a fault in you. In our present subject of disquisition, this is not untrue. Still, you know dharma, and you have zeal. Therefore, it is certain that, in time, your sorrows will end.

The embodied jiva is not the author of his punya and paapa. He is enveloped by the darkness of avidya that is born of his merits and demerits.

As the wind charged with the dust of antimony acquires its efflorescence and assumes its hues, it tinges the cardinal points of the horizon with these. Likewise, the embodied jiva, though himself colourless, assumes a hue from the darkness that envelops it, and dappled with the fruits of action, travels from body to body. When jiva is able to dispel the darkness of avidya, immutable Brahman becomes visible in all His glory.

The sages say that karma is not the means to merge with eternal Brahman. You, and the rest, as well as the Devas, should worship those who have achieved moksha. All the great Rishis never stray from the path of Brahman.

In this regard, long ago, there is mention of a discourse given by Sukracharya, the guru of the Daityas. Listen attentively, O monarch, to the course of conduct that the Daitya Vritra followed after he was divested of all his prosperity. Depending only upon his intelligence, he did not indulge in sorrow, O Bhaarata.

Unto Vritra, Guru Usanas said, “I hope, O Danava, that you do not harbour any grief because of your defeat.”

Vritra said, “Certainly, with the help of truth and penance, I have understood the circumstances of birth and death of all living creatures, and have ceased to indulge in either sorrow or joy. Compelled by time, creatures sink helplessly into naraka, or some, as the sages say, find swarga. All of them pass their allotted periods in contentment, in heaven and hell. Once again, impelled by time, with some portion of their paapa and punya unexhausted, they are born and die several times. Chained by the bonds of desire, jivas pass through myriad species of intermediate life and helplessly fall into hell. In this manner, I have seen many creatures appear and disappear.

The lesson that the scriptures teach is that one’s acquisitions correspond to one’s actions. Creatures are born as men, animals or as gods, and then move on to hell. All creatures live a life that they deserve and subject to the laws of the destroyer, they meet with either happiness or misery, the agreeable or the disagreeable. Once the beings have done with enjoying the weal or suffering the agony that corresponds with their deeds, they always return through the old path, which is appraised by the touchstone of karma.”

Thereupon, Usanas addressed Vritra, who was speaking of the highest refuge of the creation, saying, “O intelligent Daitya, why, O putra, do you indulge in such foolish raptures?”

Vritra said, “My severe tapasya for want of victory are well known to all of you. My swollen pride, over the conquests of the diverse scents and myriad tastes that other creatures enjoy, afflicted the three worlds. Because of my invincibility, I feared no one and adorned with countless effulgent rays I ranged through the skies. I achieved great prosperity through my tapasya and lost it again with my own doings. Even so, I rely on my fortitude, and do not grieve for this change.

I once wished to fight the great Indra, and in the battle, I saw the illustrious Hari, mighty Narayana, who is also known as Vaikuntha, Purusha, Ananta, Sukla, Vishnu, Sanatana, Munjakesa, Harismasru and the pita of all creatures. Surely, there is still a residue of the rewards attached to my tapasya by which I saw the great Hari. It is because of this unexhausted remnant that I wish to ask you, O divine one, about the fruits of karma.

On which order of men has high Brahmana prosperity been bestowed? In what manner, again, does profuse prosperity decline? From whom do creatures emerge and live? Through whom again are their actions? What is the lofty fruit by attaining which a creature succeeds in living eternally as Brahman? Through what action or knowledge can this reward be achieved? It befits you, O learned Sukracharya, to explain these to me.”’

Bhishma says, ‘O lion among kings, let me refresh for you and your brothers what the sage Usanas once said to the prince of Danavas. O bull among men, listen carefully.’

'Sukra Usanas said, "I bow to the divine, illustrious and puissant Being who holds this earth in the firmament in his arms. I will speak to you of the pre-eminence of Vishnu whose head, O best of the Danavas, is the infinite moksha."

While they were conversing with each other, Maharishi Sanatkumara arrived there to dispel their doubts. Worshipped by the prince of Asuras and by Usanas, the best of Rishis sat upon a bejewelled seat. After Sanatkumara was comfortably seated, Usanas said, "Discourse to this lord of the Danavas on the pre-eminence of Vishnu."

Hearing this, Sanatkumara spoke these words of grave import on the pre-eminence of Vishnu, to the king of the Danavas, "Listen, O Daitya, to everything about the greatness of Vishnu. Know this, O cremator of foes, that the entire universe rests upon Vishnu. O Mahabaho, it is he who creates all creatures, chala and achala. In course of time, it is he, again, who withdraws all things and it is he who once more casts them forth from himself.

Into Hari all things merge at the universal destruction and from Him everything emerges once again. Men possessed of scriptural lore cannot attain Him with such knowledge, nor can He be gained through penance, or sacrifices. The only means by which he can be attained is through controlling the senses. Not that yagnas are entirely useless towards such an end. For, he who relies on both external and internal karma, and on his mind, can purify them with his own intellect. And such a one succeeds in enjoying infinity in this world.

As a goldsmith purifies the dross of his metal by repeatedly casting it into fire, likewise the jiva sanctifies himself through hundreds of births. Some may even be purified in just one life, by mighty efforts.

As one carefully wipes the stains off his body, before they coagulate, similarly he must vigorously wipe away his faults. By mixing only a few flowers with them, grains of sesame cannot be made to shed their own odour. It is only when the sesame seeds are mixed and perfumed with the help of a large quantity of flowers that they cast off their own odour and imbibe the fragrance of the flowers. Similarly, one cannot behold the Soul through just a little cleansing of the heart.

So, through the course of many lives, faults such as attachments to all our environs, are dispelled through the intellect, with the help of abundant sattva, and fervent tapasya.

Listen attentively now, O Danava, as I recount the means through which creatures attached to karmas and those unattached to them achieve the causes that lead to their individual states of mind. I will tell you the order in which creatures perform karma and how they forgo them.

The Supreme Lord creates all beings, mobile and unmoving. He is without beginning and without end. Unladen with attributes of any kind, He assumes features at will. He is the Universal Destroyer, the refuge of all things, the Supreme Ordainer and pure Chitta. In all creatures, He dwells as the mutable and the immutable. He quaffs this universe through his consuming rays.

Know that for His feet he has bhumi; His head is swarga; His arms, O Daitya, are the diks, cardinal points of the horizon; for His ears, He has Akasa; the light of His eyes is Surya; His mind is Chandramas; His intellect dwells always in gyana, and His tongue is formed of apava, water. O best of Danavas, the planets, the grahas, are in the midst of His brows. The stars and constellations are made from the light of His eyes.

O Danava, know also that the traigunas of rajas, tamas and sattva are his. He is the goal of all the asramas of life, and he it is who should be known as the fruit of all japas and yagnas. The highest and immutable, he is also the blessing of abstention from all karma. The Chchandas are the hair on his body, and akshara is his word. The diverse varnas and asramas are his refuge. He has numberless mouths. Dharma is planted in his heart.

He is Brahman, he is the highest dharma, he is sat and he is asat; he is sruti, he is the shastras, he is the yagna patra, he is the sixteen Ritwijas. He is all the yagnas, he is Brahma, he is Vishnu, he is the Aswins, and he is Purandara; he is Mitra, he is Varuna, he is Yama and he is Kubera, the lord of treasures.

Although the Ritwijas deem him as being separate and apart, they still perceive him as one and the same. Know that this entire universe is under the control of this one Divine Being. The Vedas, O prince of Daityas, view the unity in all creatures. When a being realises this oneness through true knowledge, he then attains Brahman.

The period of time for which one creation exists or for which it ceases to exist is called a kalpa. Living creatures exist for a thousand millions of such kalpas. Immobile creatures also exist for an equal period.

The period for which a particular creation exists may be likened to many thousands of lakes, O Daitya! Conceive a lake that is one yojana in width, one krosa in depth, and five hundred yojanas in length. Imagine many thousands of such lakes. Try to dry up the lakes by taking from them, only once a day, as much water as may be taken up on the end of a single hair. The number of days it would take to dry them up completely is the period of one creation from its inception to the time of its destruction.

The highest sruti, revelation, says that creatures have six spirit colours, black, brown, blue, red, yellow and white. These colours proceed from blend in various proportions of the three qualities of rajas, tamas and sattva.

Where tamas predominates, sattva falls and rajas remains where it is, the resulting colour is black. When tamas reigns as before, but when the relations between sattva and rajas are reversed, it creates brown.

When rajas predominates, sattva recedes and tamas remains steady, it creates blue. While rajas prevails as before and the proportion is reversed between sattva and tamas, the result is red, which is a more agreeable colour.

When sattva predominates, rajas diminishes and tamas holds fast, it forms yellow, which produces happiness. Whereas while sattva holds sway and the proportion between rajas and tamas is reversed, it brings forth the colour white, which is productive of immense felicity.

White is the excellent colour. It is pure as it is free from attachment and aversion. It is without sorrow, and free from the travail involved in pravritti. Hence, white, O prince of Danavas, leads to mukti.

It takes thousands of years for the jiva to achieve success. This success is identical to the one that the divine Indra declared on completion of his study of many spiritual treatises. The objective that creatures gain depends on their colour, which, in turn, depends on the nature of the prevalent time. The stages of existence through which the jiva must pass are not unlimited. They are fourteen hundreds of thousands in number. In these, the jiva ascends, remains and diminishes.

The end that a jiva of dark hue meets is very low, for he becomes addicted to wild deeds and because of his iniquity, he leads a life in hell. The learned say that the life of a jiva in such a state is measured by many thousands of kalpas. After living many hundred thousands of years in this condition, the jiva acquires a tan colour and is born as an ordinary creature, and he lives long years in absolute helplessness. With all the accompanying wretchedness endured, at last, his sins are exhausted and his mind sheds all attachments, to cherish renunciation.

When the jiva is endued with sattva, with the help of his buddhi, he dispels everything connected with tamas, and strives for his own welfare, due to which he acquires a red hue. Still, if he is unable to gain the sattva guna, he then acquires a blue colour and travels in a circle of rebirths in a world of inertia.

When the jiva acquires a human birth and is afflicted for the duration of one creation through the bonds of his own actions, he gains a yellow colour and becomes a Deva. In this state, he lives for a hundred creations, and leaves it to become a manava. Thus, the jiva exists for thousands of kalpas, as a Deva, in the yellow colour. As he is not yet liberated, he remains in hell, to enjoy or endure the fruits of his actions of past kalpas and wanders through nineteen thousand rounds of birth and death.

Know that the jiva is freed from the hell of duties as comprised by swarga or godhood. He evades the births corresponding to the other colours. The jiva revels for many long kalpas in the world of Devas before he declines and once again becomes human and lives so for a hundred and eight kalpas, until he regains the prominence of a Deva.

If, again, while a human being, he falls through evil deeds as represented by Kaala in the form of Kali, he then sinks to the dark colour and occupies the very lowest of all stages of existence.

I will tell you now, O lord of Asuras, how the jiva succeeds in effecting his mukti, his emancipation.

Wishful of moksha, the jiva relies upon seven hundred kinds of karmas, each one characterised by a predominance of the sattva guna, as he gradually flows through red, yellow and finally—white.

Here, the jiva travels through several sacred and blissful worlds that have the eight well-known domains of felicity beneath them, and pursues the effulgent form of existence, which is moksha's self. Know that these eight are identical to the sixty hundreds, which are only creations of the mind.

The highest goal for the man, who has the white hue, is the state of turiya, which transcends the three other modes of consciousness—wakefulness, dream and dreamless sleep.

The yogin, who cannot abandon the felicities gained through yoga-shakti, must dwell for a century of kalpas in auspiciousness and later in the four regions of mahar, jana, tapas and satya. This is also the ultimate aim of he who belongs to the sixth colour, who, though endowed with success, and has transcended all attachments and passions, is yet a failure.

Also, the eminent yogin who forgoes yoga, dwells in swarga for a century of kalpas with the unexhausted remnant of his past karma, along with the five senses of knowledge, mind and intellect, purged of all their stains.

At the end of this period, such a being must re-enter the world of humans where he receives great eminence. Turning back from the world of men, he proceeds to gain new forms of existence that grow in prominence. So engaged, he travels through seven regions, seven times, and because of his samadhi and enlightenment, his energy continues to increase.

The yogin who yearns for mukti suppresses the seven, and moves ahead freed from attachments. He sees these seven as a sure means of sorrow, and casts them aside to attain indestructible and infinite moksha. Some call it the region of Mahadeva; others call it that of Vishnu; some say it is of Brahma; and some of Sesha; there are a few, who say it is the realm of Nara; while others call it that of the refulgent Chitta; and some say it is realm of the all-pervading Parabrahman.

When the Mahapralaya, universal destruction, comes, men who have succeeded in completely consuming their gross, subtle and causal bodies, always enter into Brahman. All their senses that have action for their essence and are different from Brahman, also merge into Brahman.

When the time of total annihilation draws nigh, jivas who have acquired the condition of Devas and have residual fruits of karmas yet to enjoy or endure, in the subsequent kalpa, revert to their previous stages of life. This is because of the similarity of each successive kalpa to the previous one.

At the time of obliteration, jivas whose karmas are exhausted through enjoyment or suffering, are born among men in the subsequent kalpa. For without gyana, man cannot destroy his actions in even a hundred kalpas.

When a new creation emerges, all superior beings invested with similar powers and forms, return to their individual destinies, ascending and descending in precisely the same manner, as during the dissolved creation.

Let us now turn to the man who realises Brahman. As long as he continues to enjoy and endure the residual fruits of his karmas of previous kalpas, so long do all creatures and the two pure vigyanas abide in him. When his Chitta is purified with yoga, and he practices samyama, restraint, this perceptible universe appears to him as only his own fivefold senses. Enquiring with a fresh mind, this jiva attains a high and chaste end. Thereupon he gains a position, which knows no decay, and further attains eternal Brahman.

Thus, O you of great might, I have discoursed to you on the eminence of Narayana!"

Vritra said, "I can see how your words resonate perfectly with dharma. Indeed, when this is so, I have no cause for anguish. Through these words, O Mahamuni, I am now free from sorrow and sin of every kind. O illustrious Rishi, O holy one, I see how this wheel of Kaala, endowed with the infinite tejas of the most effulgent and eternal Vishnu, is set in motion. Eternal is the station, from which all kinds of creation spring. Vishnu is the Supreme Soul. He is the lord of Beings. In him this entire universe rests."'

Bhishma continues, 'With these words, O son of Kunti, Vritra released his pranas; uniting his soul with the Supreme Soul, he attained the highest eminence.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, whether this Krishna is the illustrious and puissant lord of whom Sanatkumara spoke to Vritra in days of old.'

Bhishma says, 'The highest Deva, endued with the six attributes is at the root. Staying there, the Supreme Soul, with His own energy, creates all these diverse existences. Know that this Krishna, who knows no deterioration, is from His eighth amsa. Gifted with the highest intelligence, Kesava creates the three worlds with an eighth portion of His energy.

Coming immediately after Him who lies at the root, eternal Krishna changes at the end of each kalpa. Nevertheless, when the pralaya draws near, he who exists at the source, who is endowed with supreme might and puissance, rests on the primordial waters, the ekarnava, in the form of the potential seed of all things.

Kesava is the creator of the pure Soul who flows through all the worlds. Infinite and eternal, he fills all space and pervades all the universes. Limitless in every manner, he allows himself to be invested with avidya and awakened to Chitta—Kesava of the Supreme Soul creates all things. In him rests this wondrous universe in its entirety.'

Yudhishtira says, 'O you who knows the highest goal of knowledge, I think that Vritra saw beforehand the excellent end that awaited him. This is why he was happy and did not yield to sorrow.

He who is white of spiritual hue, born into a pure race, and a Sadhya, does not, O Anagha, return to the world in re-birth. Such a being, O Pitamaha, is freed from both hell and the condition of ordinary creatures.

Meanwhile, he who has acquired either the yellow or the red hue is at times overwhelmed by tamas and falls among the order of average beings. Whereas, we are exceedingly afflicted and attached to objects that produce sorrow, indifference or joy. Alas, what will be our end? Will it be the blue or the black, which is the lowest of all colours?'

Bhishma continues, 'You are Pandavas. Born into a flawless vamsa. You are of rigid vows. You have revelled in joy in the realms of the Devas—you will return to the world of men. You will live happily as long as this creation lasts, and at the next creation, you will all be admitted among the Devas. You will enjoy all kinds of felicities and at last be included among the Siddhas. Have no fears, and be of good cheer.'

Yudhishtira says, 'How deeply did Vritra, that great devotee of Vishnu, worship dharma? The status occupied by Vishnu of immeasurable energy is most difficult to understand. How, O tiger among Kshatriyas, could Vritra, an Asura, comprehend it so well?

Although I have faithfully listened to you speak of Vritra's deeds, still, there is a portion of your discourse, which is unintelligible to me. Hence, my curiosity to question you once again.

How, indeed, O best of men, was Vritra, knower of the Upanishads and Vedanta, vanquished by Indra? O lord of the Bharatas, give me an answer. Tell me truly how Sakra vanquished Vritra. O Mahabaho, recount details of the battle, for my curiosity knows no bounds.'

Bhishma says, 'Once, Indra was travelling in his chariot in the company of the celestial army, when he saw the Asura Vritra standing right before him, like a mountain. He was a full five hundred yojanas tall, O chastiser of foes, and three hundred yojanas in girth.

Seeing Vritra in this form, Indra knew that it would be impossible for even the three worlds, united together, to vanquish him. At this, the Deva was struck through with fear and anxiety. Indeed, O king, the sudden sight of this gigantic form of his antagonist, paralysed Indra.

On the eve of the great battle between the Devas and the Asuras, there arose loud shouts from both sides; drums and other musical instruments began to beat and blow. Beholding Sakra positioned before him, O you of Kuru's vamsa, Vritra felt neither awe nor fear, nor was he able to muster all his energies for the fight. Soon, the battle began between Indra, the lord of the Devas, and the exalted Vritra. The Trilokas trembled with terror. The entire sky was full of the swords, axes, lances, darts, spears and heavy clubs, rocks of diverse sizes, bows of loud twang, myriad celestial weapons, fires and burning brands, freely hurled by the warriors of both sides.

All the celestials led by Brahma, and all the highly blessed Rishis, arrived to witness the battle, seated on their best chariots. Even the Siddhas, O bull of Bharata's vamsa, and the Gandharvas, with the apsaras on their own beautiful rathas, gathered to see the epic war.

Vritra quickly overwhelmed the Lord of the Devas with a shower of rocks that darkened the sky. The enraged gods shattered this thick onslaught of rocks with a storm of their bright arrows. Next, Vritra stupefied Indra as he began to fight solely with maya, his astounding magical sorceries. When he of a hundred yagnas stood bewildered, Rishi Vasishta restored him to his senses by chanting somanas.

Vasishta said, "You are the Devapati, O slayer of Daityas and Asuras! The tejas of the Trilokas lives in you! Why, then, O Sakra, do you languish so? Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva, the lord of the universe, divine Soma, and all the Maharishis, are gathered, watching you. Do not, O Indra, yield to weakness, like an ordinary man. Stand firm in battle, and slay your foes, O king of the Devas!

See there, the master of all the worlds, the three-eyed Shiva, the adored of all the worlds, is watching you. Discard this stupor, O lord of the Devas. Look, the Devarishis, led by Brihaspati, praise you with divine hymns."

When Vasava was fetched out of his daze by Vasishta, his strength became greatly enhanced. The illustrious chastiser of Paka, took recourse to powerful yoga shakti, and with its help dispelled the illusions of Vritra.

Soon, Brihaspati, the son of Angiras, and the Maharishis, turned to Mahadeva, and for the benefit of the three worlds, urged him to destroy the great Asura. Thereupon, Shiva's tejas turned into a fierce jvara, a dire fever, and flared into Vritra of the Asuras.

Divine Vishnu next entered Indra's vajra. Brihaspati and Vasishta, and all the Maharishis, ran to Hara. Vasava, the bestower of boons, addressed him, saying, "Do not delay, O mighty one, slay Vritra at once!"

Maheswara said, “There, O Sakra, stands the illustrious Vritra, surrounded by a great force. He is the soul of the universe, and with his enormous powers of illusion, he can travel anywhere he wishes. This king of Asuras cannot be vanquished even by the three worlds united together.

With the help of yoga, slay him, O lord of the Devas. Do not underestimate him. For full sixty-thousand years, O Indra, Vritra practiced the severest tapasya to acquire prowess. Brahma gave him the boons he sought—the grandeur of yogins, extreme powers of maya, a surfeit of might, and superabundant energy. I impart to you my energy, O Vasava. The Danava has lost his composure. Kill him now with your vajra!”

Sakra said, “Before your eyes, and through your grace, O Mahadeva, I will slay this invincible son of Diti with my vajra.”

When the great Asura was overcome with the fever of Mahadeva’s tejas, the Devas and the Rishis were overjoyed and rent the air with loud cheers. Simultaneously, drums, deafening conches, kettle-drums and tabors began to beat and blow in their thousands. All the Asuras suddenly lost their memory. Gone, in a trice, were their magical powers. Seeing the enemy stricken, the Rishis and the Devas sang praises of Sakra and Isana, and urged Indra to destroy Vritra immediately.

Indra sat on his ratha, and the Rishis sang his glories. The form that Indra assumed was such that none could look at it without awe.’

Bhishma says, 'Listen, O king, to the symptoms that appeared on Vritra's form when he was struck with fever. The heroic Asura's mouth spewed flames of fire, and he became pale. As his breath became hard and heavy, his body began to tremble. His hair stood on end. His memory, O Bhaarata, sprang out of his mouth in the form of a fierce, dreadful and inauspicious jackal. Fiery meteors fell on his right and left. Gridhras, kanakas and bakas uttered harsh cries, as they wheeled over Vritra's head.

Armed with his vajra, O Rajan, Indra looked hard at the Daitya whose violent fever was such that he yawned awfully and screamed inhuman cries of agony. Seeing the Asura in this state, Indra at once hurled his vajra that was endowed with such tejas that it resembled the fires of the Pralaya, and in a trice, the gigantic form of Vritra toppled down lifeless. When the Devas saw Vritra slain, they rent the sky all around, with loud and triumphant shouts, O bull of Bharata's vamsa.

With Vritra fallen, Maghavat entered swarga with his vajra still infused by Vishnu's tejas.

Suddenly, from the body of Vritra emerged a fierce and horrific being that filled all the worlds with terror. She was the sin of Brahmahatya, personified. Of horrendous teeth, she was dark, tawny and grotesque, O Bhaarata. With hair dishevelled, dreadful eyes, a garland of skulls round her neck, she was the epitome of a dark Atharvan spell. As she emerged from Vritra's body, she was smeared with blood, and clad in rags and the bark of trees. In such a dreadful form, she sought the wielder of the thunderbolt.

Soon after, O you of Kuru's vamsa, Vritra's slayer, on a mission for the weal of the three worlds, was travelling again towards heaven. Seeing Indra, she seized the lord of the Devas and cleaved to him. With the sin of Brahmahatya fastened to his body, Indra was so filled with terror that he entered the fibres of a lotus-stalk and lived there for many long years. However, the Brahmahatya clung to him tighter, O son of Kuru, so that Indra lost all his lustre and energy. All his efforts to drive her away were in vain.

Devaspati at last presented himself before Brahma and worshipped him by bending his head low. Understanding that Sakra was possessed by the sin of Brahmahatya, Brahma began to reflect upon the means of freeing his supplicant.

Finally, Brahma turned to the Brahmahatya and, to pacify her, spoke to her in a sweet voice, "O amiable one, let the king of the Devas, who is a favourite of mine, be free from you. Tell me, what must I do for you to let him go? What wish of yours should I accomplish?'

Brahmahatya said, "When the creator of the trilokas is pleased with me, I regard my wishes already granted. Tell me where I shall dwell now. With a wish to preserve the worlds, it was you, O lord, who introduced this great law for the torment of the slayers of Brahmanas and Vritrasura was the son of a Brahmana and himself a Brahmana. Since you are happy with me, O Brahma, I will certainly leave Sakra. But grant me an abode to dwell in."

Brahma said, "So be it!" Indeed, Brahma found a way to release Indra from the clutches of the Brahmahatya. Next, Swayambhu summoned Agni, who appeared instantly and said, "O illustrious and divine lord, here I am. Tell me what needs to be done."

Brahma said, "I will divide this embodied sin of Brahmahatya into several portions. To free Sakra from her, you will take a fourth portion of the sin."

Agni said, "How will I be saved from her, O Brahma? You must show me the way. I wish to know the means of my own deliverance, O mighty lord."

Brahma said, "When the man who, under the sway of tamas, denies offering seeds, herbs and juices in your yagnas, your portion of Brahmahatya will instantly leave you to go and possess him. O bearer of oblations, let the fever of your heart subside."

So addressed by Brahma, the conveyor of sacrificial offerings accepted his command, and a fourth of the sin entered him, O king.

Brahma next summoned the trees, the herbs and all kinds of grass to him, and entreated them to carry a fourth of the sin. Like Agni, they too, were agitated with the request and said, "How will we, O creator of all the worlds, be saved from this sin? It becomes you not to afflict us who already suffer from our own fates. O Brahma, we forever endure heat, cold and the rain driven by the winds, in addition to cutting and tearing at the hands of men. We are willing, O lord of the three worlds, to obey your command and take a fourth of this sin of Brahmahatya. Even so, let the means of our salvation be pointed out to us."

Brahma said, "The portion of the sin that you accept will possess the man who through stupefaction of judgement will cut or tear any of you during the days of Parva, festivals."

Hearing the divine Brahma, the trees, herbs and grasses worshipped the creator and left without further delay.

The lord of all the worlds then summoned the apsaras, O Bhaarata, and charming them with sweet words, said, "This sin, most excellent of women, has come out of Indra's person. At my request, will you take a fourth portion of her unto yourselves?"'

The apsaras said, "O lord of all the gods, we are entirely willing to obey you and accept a portion of this sin. But, O Almighty, think of the means by which we may be freed from the effects of this covenant."

Brahma said, "Let the fever of your hearts be dispelled. The portion of the sin that you take upon yourselves will instantly leave you to possess men who will seek intercourse with women in their menstrual season."

Thus addressed by Brahma, the diverse tribes of the apsaras repaired to their homes and began to revel in delight.

The creator of the Trilokas next beckoned the waters, which immediately came to him. They stood before Brahma, bowed and said, "We are here, O chastiser of foes, at your command. O puissant master of all the worlds, tell us what needs be done."

Brahma said, "This dreadful sin has taken possession of Indra, because he killed Vritra. I want you to take a fourth part of this Brahmahatya."

The waters said, “Let it be as you command, O master of all the worlds. It befits you, still, O mighty lord, to think of the means of our deliverance from the outcome we will face. You are the lord of all the Devas, and the supreme refuge of the universe. Who else is there to whom we may pray for our salvation?”

Brahma said, “To the dim-witted, who will consider you lightly, and cast into you phlegm, urine and excreta, will this sin immediately go and reside in them. In this manner, your salvation will be accomplished.”

Finally, O Yudhishtira, the sin of Brahmahatya left the king of the Devas, and went to the abodes that the Almighty arranged for her. This is how, O ruler of men, Indra was afflicted by that dreadful sin, and how he was rid of her.

With Brahma’s leave, Indra then resolved to perform an Asvamedha yagna, a horse sacrifice. I hear, O monarch, that it was through this sacrifice that Indra was finally cleansed of the paapa of Brahmahatya. Great was Vasava’s joy, O lord of the earth, when he slew thousands of foes and regained his prosperity.

From the blood of Vritra, O son of Pritha, were born high-crested roosters. For this reason, such fowl are unclean as food for the twice-born classes, and for ascetics. Under all circumstances, O king, you must fulfil what is agreeable to the Brahmanas, for these, Yudhishtira, are known as gods on earth.

It was in this way that Sakra engaged a combination of subtle intelligence and might to kill the mighty Asura Vritra. You too, O son of Kunti, one day, will be another Indra and a slayer of all your foes. Men, who will recite this sacred narrative of Vritra in the midst of Brahmanas on every Parva day, will never be stained by any sin. I have now narrated one of the greatest and most wonderful feats of Indra, that of killing Vritrasura. What else do you wish to hear?’

Yudhishtira says, ‘O Pitamaha, you possess great wisdom and know every branch of learning. This very story of the downfall of Vritra, has given rise to a question in my mind. You say, O Rajan, that Vritra was first benumbed by fever, and subsequently slain by Vasava with the vajra. How did this fever, O wise one, arise? My lord, I wish to hear about the origin of this fever.’

Bhishma says, ‘Bhaarata, let me tell about the universally accepted cause of fever and also give you details of how it first came into existence.

In ancient times, the mountains of Meru had a summit named Savitri, which was endowed with great splendour and adorned with exquisite gemstones. The summit was immeasurable in extent and no one could reach it.

With the radiant daughter of the king of mountains by his side, the divine Mahadeva would luxuriate on this crest in all his magnificence, as if on a golden bed.

The great Devas, the Vasus, the Aswins, best of Vaidyas, and Vaisravana, lord of the Yakshas, with his abode on the summit of Kailasa and attended by many a Guhyaka, all waited upon Mahadeva. Maharishi Usanas, the best of Rishis with Sanatkumara as their leader, other celestial Devarishis headed by Angiras, the Gandharva Viswavasu, the Rishis Narada and Parvata, and the diverse tribes of apsaras arrived there to serve the master of the universe.

A pure and auspicious breeze, wafting various and heavenly fragrances, blew gently through the air and the trees were adorned with flowers of every season. A large number of Vidyadharas, Siddhas and Rishis, too, settled there to serve Mahadeva Pasupati, the lord of all creatures. Ghostly beings, dreadful Rakshasas and mighty Pisachas, mad with joy, and armed with countless weapons, trailed Shiva. Each one's tejas resembled a Pralaya fire.

Ablaze with his energy, armed with a fiery lance, glorious Nandiswara stood by at the will of Mahadeva. Even Ganga, born of all the sacred waters in the universe, waited in her embodied form, on the wondrous Devadeva. So adored by the Devarishis and the Devas, the magnificent Shiva of tejas, remained on the summit of Meru.

Soon, Prajapati Daksha began a yagna, which all the Devas agreed to attend with Indra at their head. I hear that, with Mahadeva's blessings, the sublime Devas mounted their chariots that matched the sun in splendour, and departed for Gangadvara, from where she issues.

Seeing the gods leave, the daughter of the king of mountains, addressed her divine lord, the lord of all creatures, and said, "O illustrious one, where is Sakra leading the Devas? O you who know the truth, answer me this for a strange pang grips my heart."

Maheswara said, "O divine Devi, Prajapati Daksha is worshipping the Devas with a Asva yagna, and these denizens of swarga are going there.'

Uma said, "Why, O Mahadeva, do you not attend that sacrifice?"

Umapati said, "Long ago, the Devas made a pact whereby no share of sacrificial offerings was assigned to me. In keeping with this covenant, the Devas follow the old custom, and do not offer a share of the yagnas to me."

Uma said, "O glorious one, among all beings you are the Almighty. In merit, in energy, in fame and in prosperity, you yield to none, and are indeed superior to all. This refusal to offer you a share of the havis fills me with sorrow, O Anagha, and a tremor comes over me from head to foot."

The Devi Parvati said these words to her divine lords, and fell silent for her heart was filled with anguish. Mahadeva realised the pain she was in, and he turned to Nandin, and said, "Wait here."

With his yoga-shakti, the lord of Mahayogins, the wielder of the Pinaka, Mahatejasvin Shiva flew instantly to Daksha's yagnashala, taking with him all his horrific Ganas, to destroy the yagna.

As they plundered the sacrifice, Rudra's followers gave horrible cries and shrieks, and roared with dreadful laughter. Some, with grotesque faces, pulled out the sacrificial stakes and whirled them about, while others began to devour those that were attending to the sacrifice. Then there were those who extinguished the yagna and its fire, with blood.

Beset from every side, the sacrifice suddenly assumed the form of a deer and tried to flee through the sky. Seeing this, the puissant Mahadeva gave chase with bow and arrow. Because the heart of the lord of all Devas, possessed of immeasurable energy, was filled with wrath, a dreadful drop of sweat appeared on his forehead. When this drop fell on earth, it instantly gave rise to a raging fire, which resembled the fire at the end of a yuga.

From this fire emerged a short, dreadful being, with blood-red eyes and a green beard. His body was covered entirely with feathers and hair like a hawk's and stood erect. Of dreadful aspect, his complexion was dark and his attire was scarlet. As a fire burns a heap of straw, this creature quickly consumed the flying deer, the embodied form of sacrifice. With this task done, he next rushed towards the gathered Devas and Rishis. The terrified gods fled in all directions, and the earth trembled. Exclamations of "Oh!" and "Alas!" rent the universe. Watching all this, Brahma appeared before Mahadeva, to speak with him.

Brahma said, "Almighty one, the Devas will henceforth yield you a share of the sacrificial offerings. O Devadeva, let your wrath abate. O cremator of foes, because of your anger, the Devas and Rishis are panic-stricken. A ghastly creature that has sprung from your sweat, O Parameswara, will wander among beings, and be known as jvara, fever. O Aja, if the dire energy of this being remains one and focused, the earth will not be able to bear him. Let him, therefore, be distributed into many parts."

Once his rightful share of sacrificial offerings was determined, Sambhu answered Brahma, saying, "Tathaastu. So be it." Indeed, Bhava, the wielder of Pinaka, was joyous and smiled a little as he accepted his share of the havis. Sarva, then, for the peace of all creatures, distributed fever into many portions.

Listen, O son, to how this was done. The heat seen on the heads of elephants, the bitumen of mountains, the moss that floats on water, the slough of snakes, the sores in the hooves of bulls, the salt-laden and sterile tracts of the earth, the dullness of vision of all animals, the diseases in the throats of horses, the crests on the heads of peacocks, the diseased eye of the koel—each of these was called jvara by Mahadeva. This is what I have heard. The liver-sickness of sheep, and the hiccup of parrots are also known as forms of fever. To this must be added the toil that tigers undergo, for that, too, is known as a form of fever. Besides these, O Bhaarata, jvara enters everybody at the time of birth, death and on other occasions of sickness as well.

Fever then is known to be the dreadful energy of Maheswara. He is invested with authority over all creatures and should, therefore, be held in reverence and worshipped by all. When Vritra yawned, it was through Ananta that he was overthrown. It was then that Sakra hurled his vajra, which split Vritra in two. Divided in this manner, the mighty Asura went to the domain of Vishnu of immeasurable tejas.

Because of his devotion to Vishnu, Vritra had conquered the whole universe, and this was why, upon his death, he gained the realm of Vishnu.

Thus, O son, Yudhishtira, in the context of the death of Vritra, I have told you about fever. Is there anything else that I can tell you? He who keenly reads this account of jvara with a joyous heart will be free from disease and forever enjoy happiness. In felicity, all his wishes will come true.'

Yudhishtira says, ‘O Pitamaha, in the epoch of Vaivaswata Manu, how was the son of Prachetas, Prajapati Daksha’s Asva yagna destroyed? At the sight of Devi Uma filled with rage and sorrow, the puissant Mahadeva, who is the soul of all things, gave way to wrath. How, again, through his grace, did Daksha again join the detached and dismembered limbs of the yagna? Tell me all this, O Bhishma, truly as it occurred.’

Bhishma says, ‘In days of yore, Daksha arranged to perform a great sacrifice on the breast of Himavat, in the sacred region inhabited by Rishis and Siddhas, where the Ganga flows from the mountains. Lush with countless trees and vines, the place abounded with Gandharvas and apsaras. Surrounded by Rishis, Daksha was waited upon by the denizens of the earth, the firmament and the heavens, with their hands joined together in reverence.

The Devas, the Danavas, the Gandharvas, the Pisachas, the Nagas, the Rakshasas, the two Gandharvas Haha and Huhu, Tumburu and Narada, Viswavasu, Viswaksena, the apsaras, the Adityas, the Vasus, the Rudras, the Sadhyas and the Maruts, all came there with Indra to share in the yagna.

The drinkers of soma, the carousers of Ajeya, the Rishis and the Pitris arrived with the Brahmanas. These, and many other beings of the four species, viviparous, oviparous, filth-born and vegetative, were invited to the sacrifice. The Devas, too, with their consorts, all dazzling, arrived on their celestial rathas.

Looking at them, the Rishi Dadhichi became filled with grief and wrath, and said, “This is neither a sacrifice nor a meritorious rite of religion, since Rudra is not adored in it. You are certainly exposing yourselves to bondage and death. Alas, how untoward is the course of time. Stupefied by ignorance you do not perceive the destruction that awaits you. A terrible calamity stands at your door and you are blind to it!”

Having said these words, that great seer meditated on the future. He saw Mahadeva, and his divine consort, the granter of excellent boons, seated atop Kailasa with Narada sitting beside the Devi.

Conversant with yoga, Dadhichi became gratified, for he had ascertained what was about to happen. All the Devas and others that had assembled at Daksha’s yagna were of one mind with regard to the omission to invite the Pasupati.

Dadhichi, alone, wanting fervidly to leave that place, said, “By worshipping one who should not be worshipped, and by refusing to worship him who should be worshipped, a man incurs forever the sin of murder. I have never before spoken a lie, and I never shall. Here, in the midst of the Devas and the Rishis, I speak the truth. Maheswara, protector of all creatures, creator of the universe, the lord of all, the puissant master, the receiver of sacrificial offerings, will soon come to this sacrifice and you all shall see him.”

Daksha said, “We have indeed Rudras armed with lances and bearing matted locks on their heads. They are eleven in number. I know them all, but I do not know who this Maheswara is.”

Dadhichi said, “This seems to be the counsel of all that are here—that Maheswara should not be invited. However, I do not see any Deva here that can be said to be superior to him. I am sure that destruction will certainly overtake this sacrifice of Daksha.”

Daksha said, “Here, in this vessel of gold, intended for the lord of all sacrifices, is the sacrificial offering sanctified by mantras according to the Niyama. I intend to make this offering to Vishnu who is beyond compare. He is mighty and the master of all, and to him should sacrifices be dedicated.” Meanwhile, the Devi Uma, seated beside her lord, said, “What are the gifts, the vows and what penances, that I should offer or undergo, by means of which my illustrious husband may be able to obtain a half or a third share of the offerings in sacrifices?"

To his wife who was agitated with grief and who repeated these words, the illustrious Mahadeva said with a joyous countenance, "You do not know me, O Divine Uma. You know not, O you of delicate limbs, what words should be addressed to the lord of sacrifices.

O Devi of the large eyes, I know that it is only sinners, who, bereft of tapasya, do not understand me. It is through your power of illusion that the Devas with Indra at their head, and indeed the three worlds, all become perplexed and fall into stupor.

It is to me that the chanters recite their praises in sacrifices. It is to me that the Saman-singers sing their Rathantaras. It is to me that Brahmanas conversant with the Vedas perform their yagnas. And it is to me that the Adhvaryus dedicate the shares of sacrificial offerings."

The Devi said, "There is no doubt that men of even meagre abilities praise themselves in the presence of their wives."

Holy Shiva said, "O Queen of all the Deities, I do not glorify myself. See now, O woman of the slender waist, what I do. Watch the being that I will create, O Gauri, to destroy this sacrifice that has displeased you, O my exquisite one."

Having said these words to his consort Uma, who was dearer to him than his own life, the Almighty Mahadeva created from his mouth a horrendous being whose very sight made one's hair stand on end. The blazing flames that emanated from his body made him awful to behold. His arms were many in number and in each was a weapon that struck the onlooker with fear.

The being, so created, stood before the great lord, with joined hands, and said, "What tasks will I have to accomplish?"

Maheswara answered him, saying, "Go and destroy the sacrifice of Daksha."

The being of leonine prowess, who had emerged from the mouth of Mahadeva, immediately wanted to destroy the sacrifice of Daksha, with ease and without the help of anyone, in order to appease the wrath of Uma.

Urged by her fury, Uma herself assumed the dreadful form of Mahakali, went forth in the company of the monstrous being, to see with her own eyes the destruction, which she desired.

The dreadful being then set out, having received the leave and blessings of Mahadeva.

In energy, prowess and form, he resembled Maheswara himself. Indeed, he was the living embodiment of Mahadeva's wrath.

Of immeasurable tejas and urjas, of boundless virya, he came to be called Virabhadra, he who was the dispeller of Kaali's wrath. From the pores of his body, he extruded a number of ghouls known as Raumyas.

Those fierce bands of spirits, themselves endued with terrible ferocity and prowess, and resembling Rudra himself, rushed with the force of thunder to the place where Daksha was making preparations for his sacrifice. Of dreadful and gigantic forms, they were hundreds of thousands in number. They filled the sky with their raging roars and cries and shrieks.

The clamour filled the denizens of heaven with fear. The very mountains were riven and the earth trembled. Whirlwinds began to blow. The ocean rose in great surges. The fires that were kindled would not blaze up in flames. The sun grew dim. The planets, the stars, the constellations and the moon no longer shone. The Rishis, the Devas and Manavas grew pale. A universal darkness spread over earth and sky.

The enraged Rudras ran amok and began to set fire to everything at Daksha's yagna. Some amongst them began to smite and strike all around them, wildly. Some tore up the sacrificial stakes. Some began to grind those present and others to crush with enormous hands and feet. Endowed with the speed of thought, they flew everywhere at will. Some broke the sacrificial vessels and stamped on the celestial ornaments. The scattered fragments of these were strewn on the ground like stars across the firmament.

The heaps of excellent viands, the piled bottles of drink looked like mountains. Rivers of milk ran on every side, with ghrita and payasa for their mire, creamy curds for their water and crystallised sugar for their sands. Those rivers contained food and drink to satisfy all the six tastes.

There were lakes of kshira that were beautiful to see. The wild and teeming host of Rudras began to gorge, with mouths great and small, wide and bizarre, on the meats of diverse kinds, of the best quality, and other delicacies of various sorts, and many excellent kinds of drink, and several other foods that could be licked and sucked. And as they gorged, they flung great handfuls of all that exquisite food in all directions.

Because of Shiva's wrath, every one of those gigantic beings looked like the all-consuming yuga-fire. Agitating the celestial troops, they made them tremble with fear and fly in all directions. Those fierce demons frolicked with one another, and seizing the apsaras, had their way with them and then flung them roughly aside.

Of fierce deeds, these beings, impelled by Rudra's fury, quickly burnt that yagna down, although it was protected by all the Devas. Deafening were the roars they uttered, which struck every living creature with dread. Having torn off the head of sacrifice embodied as a deer, they roared and yelled in glee.

Now, the Devas led by Brahma, and his son, Prajapati Daksha, folded their lustrous hands and said to the awful being who led the Raudra force, "Tell us, who are you?"

Virabhadra said, 'I am neither Rudra nor his consort, the Devi Uma. Nor have I come here for partaking of the fare provided in this sacrifice. Knowing Uma's rage, the puissant lord who is the soul of all creatures has given way to ire.

I have not come here to see these greatest of Brahmanas. I have not come here urged by curiosity. Beware, for I have come here to destroy this sacrifice of yours.

I am known by the name of Virabhadra and I have sprung from the fury of Rudra. This dark woman, who is my companion, is called Bhadrakali, and she has emerged from the wrath of the Devi. We have both been dispatched by the Devadeva, and we have come here to destroy. O lord of Brahmanas, seek the protection of that Mahadeva, the husband of Uma. It is preferable to incur the wrath of Shiva than to gain boons from any other deity!"

Hearing this from Virabhadra, Daksha bowed down to Maheswara and sought to gratify him by reciting the following hymn: "I throw myself at the feet of the effulgent Isana, who is Eternal, Immutable and Indestructible; who is the foremost of all Devas, who is endued with the highest Soul, who is the lord of all the universe."

His praises having been sung, the almighty Mahadeva, suspending both prana and apana by shutting his mouth tight, and casting glances on every side, presented himself there.

Possessed of many eyes, the vanquisher of all foes, the lord of lords, suddenly arose from within the pit, the agni kunda in which the sacrificial fire was housed. Endowed with the refulgence of a thousand suns, and looking like another Samvartaka, the Divine One smiled gently at Daksha and said, “What, O Brahmana, should I do for you?”

At this, Brihaspati, the guru of all the Devas adored Mahadeva with the Vedic hymns contained in the moksha samhitas. Next, Daksha, joining his hands in reverence, filled with dread, trembling, and with his eyes and face bathed in tears, addressed the Supreme Lord.

Daksha said, “If the Almighty has been gratified with me, if indeed, I have become an object of favour with him, if I have deserved his kindness, if the great lord of all creatures is disposed to grant me boons, then let all that was mine, which have been burnt, eaten, drunk, swallowed, destroyed, broken and polluted, again be of use to me. Such is the boon that I crave.”

So that the many long years Daksha had spent in preparing for his yagna, with great care and effort, were not wasted, the illustrious Hara, the remover of Bhaga’s eyes, said, “Let it be as you wish!”

These were the words of the illustrious progenitor of all creatures, the Deva of three eyes, the protector of dharma. Having obtained his boon from Bhava, Daksha knelt down before him and worshipped the deity with the bull for his mark, by reciting his thousand and eight names.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘It becomes you, O sire, to tell me those names with which Daksha adored the almighty Shiva. O sinless one, a fervent curiosity impels me to listen to them.’

Bhishma says, ‘Hear, O Bhaarata, what the names, both secret and proclaimed, are of the lord of the gods, the deity of extraordinary feats, the mahayogin of secret vows.[2, 3]

Daksha said, “I bow to you, O Supreme Lord, to the destroyer of the forces of the Asuras. You are the paralyser of the strength of the Deva king himself. Both Devas and Danavas adore you. You are thousand-eyed, you are fierce-eyed and you are three-eyed.

You are the friend of the ruler of the Yakshas. Your hands and feet extend in every direction. Your eyes, head and mouth face all sides. Your ears, too, are everywhere in the universe, and you are omnipresent, O lord!

You are shaft-eared, you are large-eared and you are pot-eared. You are the receptacle of the ocean. Your ears are like those of the elephant, or of the bull or like extended palms.

Salutations to you! You have a hundred stomachs, a hundred revolutions and a hundred tongues. I bow to you.

The Japis of the Gayatri sing your praises in reciting the Gayatri, and the worshippers of the sun revere you in glorifying the sun. The Rishis regard you as Brahma, as Indra and as the firmament above.

O you of mighty form, the ocean and the sky are your two forms. All the celestials dwell in your form even as kine inhabit meadows.

In your body, I perceive soma, and Agni, and the lord of the waters, and Aditya, and Vishnu, and Brahma, and Brihaspati. You, O illustrious one, are the cause and effect, and the action and instrument of everything unreal and real, and you are the creation and destruction.

I bow to you that are called Bhava and Sarva and Rudra. I offer obeisance to you, O giver of boons. I prostrate always to you who are the lord of all creatures.

Salutations to you that are the slayer of Andhaka. I bow to you who have three matted locks, with three heads, and are armed with an excellent trident; possessing three eyes and, hence, called Tryambaka and Trinetra. Obeisance, O destroyer of the Tripura. Salutations to you that are called Chanda, and Kunda; who are the universal nucleus and the bearer of the infinite embryo; to you who are the holder of the ascetic's staff, the one who has ears everywhere and are called Dandimunda.

Salutations to you whose teeth and hair are turned upwards, and are pure white, and stretched all over the universe; to you that are red, tawny with a blue throat. Salutations to you of incomparable form, and dreadful appearance, who are highly auspicious, You are Surya, with a garland of suns round your neck, and have standards and flags bearing the device of Surya. I bow to you, O lord of spirits and ghosts, which are bull-necked, and armed with the bow; you who crush all foes, are the personification of chastisement and are clad in leaves and rags.

Salutations to you that bear gold in your stomach, cased in golden mail, you are gold-crested, O lord of all the gold in the world. I prostrate before you who have been adored, that deserve to be worshipped, and are still being venerated; you that are all things, which devour all objects, and are the soul of all the elements. Salutations to you that are the hotri in sacrifices, the mantras, and own white flags and standards. Obeisance to you that are the navel of the universe, are both the cause and effect, and the refuge of all shelters.

Salutations O Krisanasa, of slender limbs, and slim frame. Salutations to you that are always cheerful and are the personification of confused sounds and voices. Salutations to you that are about to span the earth, that are already spread across, and standing upright. Salutations to you that are unshakeable, who are unceasing, smooth of skin with matted locks on your head.

I bow to you that are fond of dancing and who strike your puffed cheeks, making your mouth a dumara. Salutations to you that are fond of lotuses that blow in rivers and that are always fond of singing and playing on musical instruments. I prostate in front of you who are Adi, the first of all creatures, and are the crusher of the Asura Bala. Salutations to you that are the master of time, the personification of kalpa; and the embodiment of all kinds of destruction, great and small.

Salutations to you who laugh awfully and as loud as the beat of a drum, and observe dreadful vows. Obeisance forever to you that are fierce, and possess ten arms. Salutations to you who are armed with bones and are fond of the ashes of funeral pyres. Salutations to you that are awful, and terrible to witness, and an observer of dreadful vows and practices.

I prostrate before you who own an ugly mouth, with a tongue resembling a scimitar and large teeth. Salutations to you that are fond of both cooked and uncooked meat, and regard the gourded vina as priceless. Salutations to you who creates rain, and helps the cause of dharma, are identifiable with the form of Nandi, and are dharma personified. Salutations to you that are ever moving like wind and the other forces, are the controller of all things and always engaged in stirring all creatures in the cauldron of Time.

I bow to you, O lord of all creatures, who are superior, and the giver of boons. Salutations to you who have the best of garlands, most outstanding of scents, and the finest of robes, and who give the highest of boons to creatures, without parallel. Obeisance to you that are attached, and yet are free from all attachments, you of the form of yoga dhyana, adorned with a garland of akshas. Salutations to you that are united as cause and disunited as effects that are the form of shadow and of light.

Salutations to you that are amiable, and are frightful, and exceedingly so. Salutations to you that are auspicious, tranquil and most serene. My obeisance to you who are of one leg and many eyes, having only one head; you are fierce, you who are gratified with small offerings and are fond of equity. Salutations to you that are the artificer of the universe, and are ever united with the attribute of stillness.

Salutations to you that bears a foe-frightening bell, who are of the form of the peal made by a bell and are of the form of sound when it is not perceptible by the ear. I bow to you that are like a thousand bells rung together, who are fond of a garland of bells, and are like the sound that the life-breaths make, that are of the strain of all scents and of the confused noise of bubbling fluids. Salutations to you who are beyond three hums, and that are fond of two hums. I prostrate before you that are entirely tranquil, and have the shade of mountain trees for your habitation.

You are fond of the heart-flesh of all creatures, who purges all sins, and are of the form of sacrificial offerings. Salutations to you that are the soma of sacrifice, that are the sacrificer himself, who are the Brahma into whose mouth is poured the sacrificial butter, and are the agni into which is poured the ghrita inspired with mantras. Salutations to you that are of the form of Ritwijas, who have your senses under control, who are made of sattva, and have rajas also in your make.

I prostrate before you that are of the banks of rivers, of rivers themselves, and of the lord of all rivers, the ocean. Salutations to you, who are the giver of food, are the lord of all food and who are identical with him that takes food. I bow to you that has a thousand heads and a thousand feet, to you that has a thousand tridents raised in your hands, and a thousand eyes. Salutations to you that are of the form of the rising sun, and who are of the frame of a child, that are the protector of ganas all of whom have the build of children, and that are, besides, shaped like children's toys.

My obeisance to you that are old, that are covetous, that are already agitated and that are about to be agitated. Salutations to you who has locks of hair marked by the flow of the Ganga and resembling blades of munja grass. Salutations to you that are gratified with the six actions and that are devoted to the performance of the three deeds. Salutations to you that have assigned the duties of the respective asramas of life. Salutations to you that deserves to be praised in sounds that are a variant of sorrow, and constitute deep and confused noise.

Salutations to you who have eyes both white and tawny, as also dark and red. Salutations to you who have conquered your vital breaths, who are of the shape of weapons, that cleaves all things, and are exceedingly lean. Salutations to you who always speak of dharma, artha, kama and moksha. Salutations to you who are a Samkhya, who are the lord of Samkhyas, and are the introducer of the Samkhya Yoga.

I prostrate before you who have a chariot and who are without a chariot. Salutations to you that have the intersection of four roads for your chariot; to you that have the skin of a black deer for your upper garment, and a snake for your sacred thread. I bow to you who are Isana, who are of body as hard as a thunderbolt, and that are of green locks. Salutations to you that are of three eyes, who are the lord of Ambika, who are Manifest and Unmanifest.

Salutations to you that are desire, that are the giver of all desires, that are the slayer of all desires, and are the discriminator between the gratified and the ungratified. Salutations to you that are all things, the giver of all things, and the destroyer of all things. Salutations to you that are the colours that appear in the evening sky. Salutations to you that are of mighty strength, of mighty arms, are a mighty being and are of great effulgence.

Salutations to you who look like a mighty mass of clouds, and are the embodiment of eternity. Salutations to you that are of a well-developed body, who are of emaciated limbs, that bear matted locks on your head, and are clad in the bark of trees and skins of animals. Salutations to you that have jata as effulgent as the sun or the fire, and have tree-bark and skins for your attire. Salutations to you who are possessed of the effulgence of a thousand suns, and that are ever engaged in penances.

Obeisance to you that are the excitement of fever and that are endued with matted locks drenched with the waters of the Ganga, of hundreds of eddies. Salutations to you who repeatedly rotates the moon, the yugas and the clouds. You are food, you are he who eats that food, you are the giver of food, you are the grower of food and you are the creator of food. Salutations to you that cooks food and eats cooked food, and are both wind and fire.

O lord of all the lords of the deities, you are the four orders of living creatures. You are the creator of the mobile and immobile universe, and you are its destroyer. O highest of all those conversant with Brahman, they that are conversant with Brahman regard you as Brahman. The extollers of Brahman say that you are the supreme source of the mind, and the refuge upon which space, wind and light rest.

You are the Riks and the Samans, and the syllable AUM. O first of all deities, those proclaimers of Brahman that sing the Samans constantly sing of you when they speak the syllables Hayi-Hayi, Huva-Hayi, and Huva-Hoyi. You are made of the Yajuses, of the Riks and of the offerings poured on the sacrificial fire. The hymns contained in the Vedas and the Upanishads adore you.

You are the Brahmanas and the Kshatriyas, the Vaisyas and the Sudras, and the other castes formed by their intermixture. You are those masses of clouds that appear in the sky; you are lightning; and you are the roar of thunder.

You are the year, and the seasons; you are the month, and the fortnight. You are the yuga, the time represented by the twinkling of an eye, you are Kashtha, the Mandalas and the Grahas; you are Kaala.

You are the treetops, the crown of all mountains. Among animals, you are the tiger; among birds, you are Garuda, and among snakes, you are Ananta. Among oceans, you are the kshirasagara, the ocean of milk, and for all astras, you are the bow. You are the vajra among weapons, and truth among vows.

You are aversion and you are avarice; you are attachment and you are bewilderment; you are forgiveness and you are ruthless. You are exertion, and you are patience; you are cupidity, and you are wrath; you are victory and you are defeat.

You carry a mace, and you hold a spear; you carry a bow, and you bear the khatvanga and the jharjharas in your hands. You are he who slashes, pierces and strikes. You are he who leads and he who gives pain and sorrow. You are dharma with ten virtues; you are wealth of every kind, and you are pleasure.

You are the Ganga, the oceans, rivers, lakes and the pools. You are the slender vines, the thicker creepers; you are all kinds of grass, and deciduous herbs. You are all the animals and the birds. You are the origin of all objects and actions; you are the season that yields fruits and flowers.

You are the beginning and the end of the Vedas; you are Gayatri, and AUM.

You are green, you are red, you are blue, you are dark; you are of a bloody hue, you are of the colour of the sun, you are tawny, you are brown and you are dark blue. You are colourless, you are of the best colour, you are the maker of colours and you are without comparison. Your name is gold, and you are fond of gold.

You are Indra, you are Yama, you are the giver of boons, you are Kubera and you are Agni. You are the eclipse, you are the fire called Chitrabhanu; you are Rahu, and you are the sun.

You are the fire on which men pour sacrificial ghrita. You are he who pours the ghee. You are he in honour of whom men pour the ghrita, you are the butter itself and you are the puissant lord of all.

You are the samhitas called Trisuparna, you are all the Vedas; and you are the hymns known as Satarudriya. You are the holiest of holies, most auspicious of all auspicious things. You animate the breathless body. You are Chitta.

Endowed with gunas, you are subject to destruction. You are the indestructible Jivatman. As jiva's body, you are full, yet liable to decay and death. You are prana, you are sattva, you are rajas, you are tamas and you are faultless. You are the breaths—prana, apana, samana, udana and vyana.

You are the blink of the eye. You are the sneeze and the yawn. You are of red eyes that ever look inwards. You are of the great mouth and belly. The bristles on your body are like needles. Your beard is green. Your hair is erect. You are swifter than the swiftest. You adore and know the principles of music both vocal and instrumental.

You are a fish gliding in the waters, and you are a fish entangled in the net. You are full, you love sport, and you are quarrels and disputes incarnate. You are Kaala: you are the hard time, the premature time and the ripe time. You are the killing, you are the scimitar and you are the kill.

You are the ally and the adversary; you are the destroyer of both allies and adversaries. You are the moment when clouds appear; you have large teeth, and you are Samvartaka and Balahaka.

You are manifest as splendour. Maya conceals you. You are he who connects creatures with the fruits of their karma.

You have a bell in your hand. You play with all things, chala and achala, like toys. You are the cause of all causes. You are Brahman in the form of Pranava, and you are svaha. You carry the danda, you are clean-shaven, and you are the controller of your words, deeds and thoughts.

You are the four yugas, and the four Vedas; you are the source of the four sacrificial fires. You are the authority of all the duties of the four asramas. You are the maker of the four varnas.

You are always fond of dice. You are cunning. You are the lord and master of the Ganas. Red garlands and red robes adorn you. You sleep on the mountain-breast, and you are fond of the red hue.

You are the artisan, you are the supreme artist and all the arts flow from you. You are fierce; you plucked out Bhaga's eyes and broke Pusan's teeth.

You are svaha, you are svadha, you are vashat; you are salutation incarnate, and you are the words namas-namas. No one knows your observances and your penances. You are Pranava; you are the sky strewn with millions of stars. You are Dhatri, Vidhatri and Sandhatri. In the form of the Supreme Cause, you are the refuge of everything, and you are independent of all refuge.

You know Brahman. You are tapasya, you are dharma, you are the soul of Brahmacharya and you are simplicity. You are the Soul of creatures, you are the creator of all creatures; you are absolute existence, and you are the cause of the past, the present and the future.

You are Bhumi, you are Akasa and you are swarga. You are eternal, self-restrained and you are Almighty. You are an initiate, and not a novice. You are forgiving, unforgiving and you are the chastiser of heretics.

You are the lunar month, you are the Kalpa, you are destruction, and you are creation. You are lust, you are the vital seed; you are subtle, you are gross and you adore karnikara garlands. You have a face like Nandi; you have a terrible face, you have a handsome face, you have an ugly face and you are without a face. You have four faces, you have many faces and you have a fiery face in battles.

You are the golden-bellied Narayana Hiranyagarbha; you are unattached to everything; you are Ananta, and you are Virat. You are the destroyer of adharma, you are Mahaparswa, you are Chandradhara, and king of the spirit-clans. You low like a cow, you are the protector of kine and the lord of bulls is your attendant.

You are the protector of the Trilokas; you are Govinda; you are the controller of the senses, and the senses cannot seize you. You are the best of all creatures; you are fixed, you are immobile, you are steadfast and you are the incarnation of tremors.

You are irresistible, and you destroy poisons. Undefeatable in battle, you cannot be shaken, transcended or measured. You are victory. None can vanquish you.

You are swift; you are the moon, and you are Yama. Without flinching, you bear the cold, heat, hunger, weakness and disease. You are mental anguish, and physical disease. You are the disease and the cure for all diseases. You are the advent and departure of all diseases.

You are the destroyer of my sacrifice that tried to escape in the form of a deer. You have a lofty brow. You have eyes like lotus-petals. Your abode is in the midst of a lotus forest.

You hold the Rishi's staff. You have the three Vedas for your three eyes. Your chastisements are fierce and savage. You destroy the embryo from which the universe springs.

You drink poison and fire; you are the monarch of all Devas, you drink soma, and you are the lord of the Maruts. You are the amrita. You are the master of the universe. You shine in glory, and you are the lord of all the luminous ones.

You protect from poison and death, and you drink kshira and soma. You are the pre-eminent protector of those who have fallen from swarga, and you defend the best of the Devas.

Golden is your vital seed, your Hiranyaretas. You are male, you are female and you are without gender. You are an infant, you are a youth; you are aged with worn-out teeth; you are the supreme Naga, you are Sakra and you are the destroyer and creator of the universe.

You are Prajapati, and worshipped by the Prajapatis; you support the universe, and the universe is your form; you have the gift of great tejas, and have faces in every direction.

The sun and the moon are your eyes, and the Brahman is your heart. You are the ocean. Devi Saraswati is your speech. Fire and wind are your might. You are day and you are night. You are all actions including the blinking of the eye.

Neither Brahma, nor Govinda, nor the ancient Rishis, can know your greatness, O auspicious lord. Your subtle forms are invisible to us.

Rescue me and protect me like a father. I deserve your protection. I bow to you, O Anagha. You are merciful to your devotees, and I am ever devoted to you. Let him who lives alone on the other side of the ocean of samsara always protect me.

I bow to the very Soul of yoga, whom men of sattva see as an effulgent light. Obeisance to him who has matted locks, who bears the Rishi's staff; who has a body with a long torso, who has a dumaru tied to his back, and who is the Soul of Brahma.

I prostrate before him who is the Soul of water, in whose hair are the clouds, in the joints of whose body are the rivers and whose stomach holds the four oceans. I seek the protection of him who, at the end of the yuga, devours all creatures and reclines on the Ekarnava, the single expanse of water that covers the universe. He who entered Rahu's mouth to drink soma, and as Swarbhanu devoured Surya, may he protect me.

My obeisance to the Devas who enjoy their shares of sacrificial offerings. Let them enjoy the offerings made with svaha and svadha, and let them be pleased with the offerings.

Let the thumb-sized beings who dwell in all bodies, the linga sariras, always protect and gratify me. I always bow to the embodied beings who make creatures cry, and gladden them as well, without it affecting themselves.

I prostrate to the Rudras who live in rivers, oceans, hills, mountains and mountain caves; who abide in the roots of trees, cow-pens, remote jungles, crossroads, in-roads and open squares. Who dwell on riverbanks, lakes and oceans, elephant-shelters, and stables, in chariot-shacks, deserted gardens and houses, in the five primal elements and in the cardinal and subsidiary directions.

Repeated salutations to the ones that dwell in the space between the sun and the moon, as in their rays, and they that live in the nether regions, as also the ones that have taken to sannyasa and other superior practices for the sake of attaining the Supreme. I bow always to them that are unnumbered, unmeasured and formless, to the Rudras that have the gift of infinite gunas.

Because you are the creator and Soul of all creatures, O Hara, I did not invite you to my sacrifices. After all, you are the one adored in all sacrifices with plentiful offerings. Perhaps, stupefied by your subtle illusion I failed to invite you. Be appeased with me, O Bhava, my mind, intellect and consciousness all dwell in you."

Hearing these adorations, Mahadeva ceased inflicting further violence on Daksha. Indeed, he addressed the Prajapati, saying, "Daksha, I am pleased with your worship. You need not praise me more. You will have my friendship. Through my grace you will earn the fruit of a thousand Asvamedhas, and a hundred Vajapeyas.

"Be you the best of all creatures in the world. Feel no sorrow for the violence done to your sacrifice. Even in earlier Kalpas, I had to destroy your yagna.

O Mahavrata, once more will I grant you boons. Accept them. Dispel this sadness that spreads across your face, and listen to me attentively. With the help of sound debate, the Devas and Danavas have extracted a faith from the six Angas of the Vedas, and from Samkhya and yoga, because of which they practice austere tapasya.

Even so, the religion, which I have extracted, is without equal, and yields all felicity. It is open to practice for men in all asramas. It leads to moksha. It may take many years to acquire, through punya by those who have restrained their senses. Mystery shrouds it. The ignorant see it as censurable. It contradicts the dharma of the four varnas and four asramas, and agrees with them in only a few instances. Adept men in the science of conclusions understand its propriety, and those who transcend all the asramas are its worthy recipients.

Daksha, in days of old did I create this auspicious dharma called Pasupata; its proper observance confers immense benefits. Shed this fever of your heart and let those benefits be yours."

With these words, Mahadeva, Devi Uma and all his followers vanished from Daksha's view. He who recites this hymn, the Shiva Sahasranama stotra, first sung by Daksha, or hears it, will never meet with the smallest evil and will gain a long life. Indeed, as Shiva is the lord of all the Devas, so is this stotra, agreeable with the srutis, supreme among all stutis. Men covetous of fame, kingdom, happiness, pleasure, profit and wealth, as those yearning for vidya, must earnestly listen to this hymn.

He who suffers from illness, distressed by pain, plunged into gloom, afflicted by thieves or fear, or who has incurred the king's ire, is freed from fear by listening to or reciting this hymn. Indeed, even in this earthly body, it can help him attain equality with Mahadeva's Ganas. Verily, it enhances his energy and fame, and purifies his sins.

Neither Rakshasas nor Pisachas, not Bhutas or Vinayakas disturb the house where men recite this stotra. The woman, who piously listens to this hymn while practising Brahmacharya, wins worship as a goddess in the family of her father and her husband.

Every venture of the man, who hears or recites this hymn with rapt attention, meets with success. The singing of this stotra fulfils all one's silent and spoken wishes.

He who practices Samyama, makes offerings to Mahadeva, Guha, Uma, Nandi, and sincerely chants their names, gains all things of enjoyment, pleasure and his every wish comes true.

When such a being dies, he ascends into swarga, and never again takes birth among animals or birds. Even the puissant Vyasa, son of Parasara, affirms this.’

CANTO 286

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, what is Adhyatma with regard to man and where does it arise?'

Bhishma says, 'With the help of Adhyatma one may know everything. It is, again, superior to all things. To the extent of my knowledge, I will explain the Adhyatma about which you ask. Listen attentively.

The earth, wind, space, water and light are the Panchamahabhutas. These are the cause and the destruction of all creatures. The bodies of living beings, both subtle and physical, are the result of the combination of gunas of these five. These qualities repeatedly come into existence and unceasingly merge into the original cause of all things—the Paramatman.

The Panchamahabhutas create all creatures, and into these five elements, all beings eternally resolve themselves, like the endlessly rising and subsiding waves of the ocean. As a tortoise stretches out and withdraws its legs into itself, even so the infinite number of creatures emerge from and enter these five primal elements.

Verily, sound springs from space, and all touch, from earth. Life is from the wind. Taste is from water. Form is the property of fire. And so, the entire universe, mobile and unmoving, is the combination of the Panchamahabhutas in various proportions. When the Pralaya comes, the endless creatures resolve themselves into these five, and when creation begins anew, they re-emerge from them.

The creator places the same five elements in all the beings, in proportions that he thinks best. Sound, the ears and all the cavities, have space, Akasa, as their causal element. Taste, all liquids and the tongue, are the properties of Apah, water. Form, the eye and the digestive fire in the belly, partake of the nature of Agni, fire. Scent, the nose and the body, are the properties of Bhumi, earth. Life, touch and action are the properties of wind, Vayu.

Rajan, I have explained to you all the properties of the Panchamahabhutas. After Mahadeva created these, he united with them sattva, rajas, tamas, Kaala, Chitta and manas as the sixth.

The intellect dwells in the interior of what you see above the soles of the feet and below the crown of the head. Humans have five senses, and the mind is the sixth. The seventh is the intellect. The kshetrajna is the eighth.

Knowledge of their individual functions determine the senses and the doer. Sattva, rajas and tamas depend upon the senses for their formation. Chitta exists only to seize the impressions of objects. Manas has ambiguity for its function. Buddhi is for ascertainment. Kshetrajna is only an inactive witness of all activity.

Sattva, rajas, tamas, Kaala and karma, O Bhaarata, these are the qualities that direct the buddhi. The intellect is the senses and their five aspects. When intellect is wanting, the senses with the mind, and the five other attributes cease to be.

That with which the buddhi sees is the eye. When the intellect hears, it is the ear. When it smells, it is the nose, and when it tastes, it is the tongue. When it feels objects, it is the skin. In this manner, the intellect undergoes diverse and frequent modifications. When the intellect desires anything, it becomes the mind. The five senses, with the mind, are the creations of buddhi. They are the indriyas. To stain them is to taint buddhi as well.

While intellect dwells in the jiva, it exists in three gunas. Sometimes she is joyful, at times, she indulges in sorrow, and often she exists in a state that is neither pleasure nor pain. With these conditions for her essence, the intellect decides between the three gunas. As the surging ocean ever remains within its continents, likewise, the intellect exists in the mind.

When rajas increases, buddhi transforms into rajas. Felicity and satisfaction are the properties of sattva. Heartache, sorrow, discontentedness and damnation, are the result of rajas. Ignorance, attachment, error, heedlessness, stupefaction, terror, meanness, sleep and procrastination, are the properties of tamas.

Whenever the body and mind connect with joy or happiness, the state it gives rise to, is the result of sattva. Regard everything fraught with sorrow and disagreeable to oneself as rising from rajas. Therefore, before undertaking such actions of passion, one should reflect on them. See anything fraught with error or bewilderment, which is inconceivable and mysterious, as connected with tamas.

This then, is the explanation of how things in this world dwell in the intellect. Understand this and you will be wise. For, what else can be the sign of wisdom?

Let me tell you the difference between intellect and soul. The buddhi creates gunas, whereas the Atman does not. Although by nature they are distinct from each other, yet they always exist together. A fish is different from the water in which it dwells, but fish and water must exist together.

The gunas cannot know the Atman, but the Atman knows them. Ignorant men regard the Soul to always act together with the gunas, but this is not so. The Atman is truly only an inactive witness of everything.

The intellect has no refuge. Life arises because of the gunas coming together. Other causes create the knowledge that dwells in the body. No one can apprehend the gunas in their real nature or form of existence. The intellect creates the attributes, whereas the soul simply watches them. This union between buddhi and Atman is eternal.

The indwelling insight apprehends all things through the senses that are themselves inanimate and ignorant. Really, the senses are only like lamps that shed light for others without themselves being able to see. Such is the nature of the senses, intellect and the soul. With this knowledge, one should live cheerfully, without yielding to either sorrow or joy. Such a man is beyond the influence of pride.

Just as a spider weaves its web naturally, it is the nature of the intellect to create all the gunas on its own. Hence, one can call these attributes a spider's web. Upon their destruction, their essences do not cease to exist; they only become invisible. Although, when something is beyond the knowledge of the senses, its existence, or otherwise, is concluded through inference. This is the opinion of one school of philosophers. Others insist that with death, the gunas cease to be. One must resolve this difficult problem through reflection and the intellect, and dispel the confusion, before one can discard sorrow and live in happiness.

As men unacquainted with its mystery feel distress, when they are born into this earth, which is like a sea of bewilderment. Likewise is the anxiety of he who loses his intellect and so his discernment. Still, men who know Adhyatma possess fortitude, and they can reach the other shore of samsara. Indeed, gyana is an efficient raft, and intelligent men escape the terrors that alarm the ignorant.

As for men of dharma, none of them arrives at an end that is superior to that of any of their companions. Indeed, in this matter, the virtuous show an equality.

Through the sole means of knowledge, the gyani destroys whatever karma he does both in ignorance and knowingly, though these be replete with great iniquity. Moreover, when he receives true vidya, he naturally ceases to perpetrate both these. He censures the evil doings of others as well as any of his own sins committed under the influence of attachment.’

CANTO 287

Yudhishtira says, ‘Living creatures are always in fear of sorrow and death. Tell me, O Pitamaha, how the occurrence of these two may be prevented.’

Bhishma says, ‘Listen, O Bhaarata, to an old story of the conversation between Narada and Samanga.

Narada said, “While others respect their superiors with only a bow of the head, you honour them by prostrating before them on the ground. You seem to be crossing the river of life by yourself. You appear to be always free from sorrow and full of great joy. I do not see that you ever have the least anxiety. You are always content and happy and you revel in constant wonder like a child.”

Samanga said, “O bestower of honours, I know the truth about the past, the present and the future. Hence, I am never sad. I also know about the advent of deeds in this world, of the accession of their fruits and about the varied nature of these fruits. Therefore, I never yield to sorrow.

Watch the illiterate, the destitute, the prosperous, O Narada, the blind, fools, madmen, and us, as well. See how we all live by virtue of the karma of our past lives. The very Devas exist because of their past karma. The strong and the weak, all, live according to past actions. It is fitting, therefore, that you should hold us in esteem. The owners of thousands of karmas, live. The owners of hundreds also, live. They that are overwhelmed by sorrow, live. See, we too, are living!

When we, O Narada, do not give in to sorrow, how can the practice of dharma or performing rites and rituals affect us? Moreover, since all joys and sorrows are transient, they cannot agitate us at all. Indeed, the very root of wisdom is the freedom of the senses from ignorance. It is the senses that yield to errors and sadness. He whose faculties are subject to nescience, can never attain wisdom. The pride that a man indulges in out of ignorance, is only a form of the same ignorance. The man of delusion has neither this world nor the next.

Remember that sorrow and happiness cannot be eternal. With all its vicissitudes and tribulations, I would never adopt a worldly life. Neither would I care for desirable objects nor think of their attending pleasure. And, indeed, I would not dwell upon the sorrows that present themselves.

A self-reliant man would never covet the possessions of others; he would not think of undeserved gains; even immense wealth begotten without toil would bring him no joy. Furthermore, he would not be sorrowful at the loss of such wealth.

Neither friends nor wealth, nor high birth or scriptural learning, or mantras can save a man from sorrow in the next world. It is only through karma that he can attain felicity there. One cannot direct the intellect of the one inept in yoga towards moksha. He who is ignorant of yoga can never know happiness.

Patience, and the resolve to disown sorrow, are the two means to true bliss. Anything pleasant leads to pleasure. Pleasure induces pride. Pride fetches sorrow. Hence, I avoid them all.

Misery, fear and pride stupefy the heart; and to pleasure and pain, I am a mere spectator. Abandoning wealth and pleasure, craving and misdeeds, I range over the earth, free from sorrow and anxiety.

Like one who has drunk amrita, I do not fear death, here or in the hereafter. Nor am I afraid of iniquity, cupidity or any such thing. Through my severe tapasya, I have gained this knowledge. This is why, O Narada, even if sadness comes to me, it will not afflict me."

CANTO 288

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, what is good for he who is inexperienced with the dharma of the scriptures, who is always unsure, who has no self-restraint, and other practices that lead to Atmagyana, the knowledge of the Soul.'

Bhishma says, 'Worship of the guru, reverential care of elders and listening to Brahmanas recite the shastras are of supreme benefit to such a man.

For this, listen to another old tale of a conversation between Galava and the Devarishi Narada.

Long ago, Galava, for his weal, approached Narada, and said, "I see, O Muni, that the virtues through which a man gains respect in the world are permanently inherent in you. You have gyana and it befits you to clear the minds of men like us who are unacquainted with dharma. We are uncertain about what we should do, for simultaneously with a fiat to perform karmas, the revelations of the shastras exhort us to acquire gyana. Speak to us on this subject.

O Narada, the different asramas approve different courses of action. 'This is beneficial, and this other is beneficial': in this manner, do the scriptures command us.

Observing the followers of the four asramas, and seeing how we are equally content with our own teachings, we still fail to understand what is truly beneficial.

If the shastras were all uniform and one, then the truth would be easy to discern. Yet, because the scriptures are multifarious, it shrouds what is truly valuable with mystery. This, I feel, is what creates all the confusion about beneficial deeds. O Devarishi, speak to me on this subject. I await your guidance."

Narada said, "There are four asramas, O child. All of them serve their own purposes, and their duties differ from one another. Understand them first from competent gurus, and reflect on them, O Galava. Notice the variations in the proclamations of the merits of the asramas with regard to their form, their divergence with regard to their matter and the contradictions in the observances they embrace. Notice how all the asramas refuse to clearly yield their true intent of Atmagyana. Yet, men with the gift of subtle vision clearly perceive their highest goal.

Good offices to friends, suppression of enemies and the possession of the aggregate of three, dharma, artha and kama: these, the wise affirm, are certainly beneficial, and of supreme excellence. Abstention from sin, the inclination towards dharma and good conduct surely constitute excellence. Mildness towards all creatures, a sincere nature and sweet speech do indeed create greatness. A fair distribution of one's belongings, among the Devas, the Pitris and Athitis, and loyalty towards one's servants certainly establish virtue.

Truthfulness is the highest punya, but the knowledge of truth is difficult to acquire. I say, truth is exceedingly beneficial to all creatures. Renunciation of pride, the elimination of impulse, contentment and living in solitude, embody supreme purity. The study of the Vedas, and their Angas, with enquiry, and pursuits of gyana, are meritorious.

He who aims for perfection should never excessively enjoy sound, form, taste, touch and scent. Wandering at night, sleeping during the day, revelling in idleness, roguery, arrogance, extravagance—these are habits he must relinquish. To achieve success, he should pursue his goal with total abstention from all indulgence of the senses.

He should not seek to elevate himself by discrediting others. Indeed, through his merits alone should he seek distinction over eminent men, but never over the inferior. Men, who have no merit, and are full of pride, demean meritorious men by asserting their own virtues and affluence. They enlarge their own importance, and if left unchecked regard themselves superior to eminent and worthy men of prestige. The wise and the righteous acquire great fame by refraining from speaking ill of others and from never indulging in vanity.

Flowers spread their fragrance without proclaiming their own excellence. The sun silently casts his radiance through the sky. Similarly, eminent men discard their faults and calmly shine in the world, without any boastfulness. A fool can never sparkle in the world by singing his own praises—while, the one with real punya and gyana has splendour even if he is hidden in a pit.

Men may shout loud and evil words from the top of their lungs but, eventually, such words will die. Even so, good words, spoken ever so softly, will illuminate the world. As the sun only appears to shine in the Suryakantam gem, the frivolous words of vain fools display only the meanness of their hearts. Hence, men seek gyana. I think that of all possessions, that of wisdom is the most valuable.

One should not speak until spoken to, nor reply if someone questions one impolitely. Even if one is intelligent and wise, one should remain silent, even like a fool, until one is questioned in a respectful and appropriate manner.

One should live among men of dharma and liberality, who observe the duties of their own varna. He who wishes for excellence, should never dwell in a place where there is a conflict of the duties of the several orders. A person may abide abstaining from all works, and be content with whatever he receives without exertion. By living amid men of dharma, one succeeds in acquiring dharma oneself. Likewise, by living amid sinners, he taints himself with sin.

As the touch of water, fire or the moon's rays, instantly convey their sensations, the impressions of dharma and adharma produce sukha or dukha.

Men who eat vighasa do not care for the flavours of food. Men who minutely judge the tastes of the dishes are still bound by the bonds of karma.

There are places where a Brahmana discourses on duties regarding Atmagyana. However, the disciples listen without any reverence. A man of dharma should immediately leave such a place. On the other hand, who would wish to leave the place where perfect decorum exists between the guru and sishya?

What self-respecting gyani will stay in the place where people spread false rumours about the wise? Who is there that will not forsake such a place where greedy men seek to break down the barriers of dharma?

One should live among pious men who humbly practice dharma without fear. Nevertheless, one must avoid the place where men do so just to acquire wealth and other temporal benefits—for, such people are sinful. One should instantly flee from there, as if from a room full of snakes.

At the outset, he who seeks his own weal should relinquish any action that causes strain or duress, and invests him with sinful karmas.

Virtuous men should leave the kingdom where the king and his officers exercise equal authority and where they habitually eat before feeding visiting relatives. One should live in a country where Brahmanas eat first; where they devote themselves to dharma, teach and officiate at sacrifices. One should surely dwell in a country where there is constant recitation of the sounds svaha, svadha and vashat.

Like poisoned meat, one should avoid a kingdom where Brahmanas perform unholy practices, for a livelihood. With a contented heart, a noble man should live in a country whose inhabitants joyfully offer before anyone even asks. One should befriend righteous men devoted to good deeds, in a country where chastisement falls upon the wicked and where respect and good offices are the rewards for men of subdued and cleansed souls.

One should gladly reside in the country, which is ruled by a just king who is devoted to dharma, where severe punishment awaits those who befriend vain, choleric men, who behave evilly towards the upright, and who are greedy and practice himsa. When affluence is about to abandon his subjects, kings invested with character bring prosperity to them.

I have answered your questions about what is beneficial. Due to its exceptionally high and hermetic nature, no one can describe that which is beneficial for the Soul.

The man of dharma who, for his livelihood, conducts himself with dharma, and devotes himself to the good of all creatures, will achieve numerous lofty qualities and rewards.’

CANTO 289

Yudhishtira says, 'Keeping the ultimate goal in mind, O Pitamaha, how should a king behave in this world? What qualities should he possess to free himself from attachments?'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to the old story that was told by Arishtanemi to Sagara.

Sagara said, "What is the dharma, O Brahmana, by which to enjoy felicity here? How, indeed, may one avoid sorrow and turmoil? I want to know this!"

Arishtanemi of Tarkshya's vamsa realised Sagara deserved his instruction, and said, "The bliss of mukti is true felicity in the world. The ignorant man who is wealthy, and attached to children, and his animals, does not know this. The mind that attaches itself to worldly objects and the intellect that suffers from thirst, baffle all remedy. The ignorant man, bound in the chains of affection, cannot acquire moksha.

Listen closely as I tell you about all the bonds that spring from affections and attachments. Indeed, they can benefit the gyani.

Once your children are grown and able to earn their livelihood, you should arrange for their marriage and be free to travel in happiness. With the highest goal of mukti in mind, leave your wife when she is older and attached to her son. Whether you have a son or not, having indulged your senses in the early years of your life, indulge no more. Free yourself from attachments, and range the world carefree in natural joy. Satisfied with your effortless and unsought-after gains, and perceiving all creatures and objects equally, you must travel in felicity.

This is briefly the way to free yourself from attachments. Listen now, to the details of the attraction of moksha.

Men, who live free from attachments and fear, gain happiness. While, men who are attached to worldly objects, meet with death. Worms and ants engage in procuring food, and die in the pursuit.

If you wish to attain mukti you must never worry about your relatives, by thinking, 'How will they live without me?' A living being is born alone, grows by himself, gains joy, sorrow and death, all by himself.

People enjoy food, raiment and other acquisitions, earned either by their parents, or by themselves. This is solely the result of past karma. All creatures live governed by their own doings, and receive their fruits as ordained by Him.

A being is but a lump of clay, and ever dependent on outside forces. In such a position, what rational consideration can a man have to protect and feed his relatives? In spite of your utmost efforts to save them, Mrityu carries away your relatives, in your very presence. This should be enough to awaken you. While your relatives are alive, you may yourself die, before your duty to feed and protect them is over. After your kin have died, you cannot know what becomes of them—whether they are happy or sorrowful. This ought to awaken you.

Whether you live or die, your kith and kin maintain themselves because of the fruits of their own karma. Reflect on this and do what is for your own good. When this is the case, to whom do we connect with in the world? Therefore, set your heart on the attainment of moksha. Listen still, for I need to say something more.

The man of resolve, who has conquered hunger, thirst, anger, avarice and the rest, is certainly liberated. He who does not forget himself, through the folly of gambling, drinking and chasing courtesans, is ever a Jivanmukta.

One whom sorrow touches because of the needs of daily sustenance, knows the flaws of life. He who regards his repeated births to be due only to sexual congress with women, is free from attachments.

He is certainly a Jivanmukta who knows the true nature of janma, mrityu and karma. He who takes just a handful of corn for his sustenance, from millions of carts loaded with grain, and who ignores the difference between a bamboo shed and a palatial mansion, is certainly a jivanmukta.

He is surely free who observes that death, disease and famine afflict the world. Indeed, such a man is content, while he who fails to see the world in such a light, meets with destruction. The one who is content with basic needs is a Jivanmukta.

One who perceives the world to consist of consumers and the consumed, while not being part of either, whom pleasure and pain cannot affect, is liberated. He who sees no difference between a soft mattress and the hard ground, and views fine rice and thick rice equally, is liberated. The one who regards soft linen and rough cloth made of grass as equal, and in whose appreciation fabrics of silk and the bark of trees are the same, who sees no difference between clean sheep-skin and unclean leather, is a Jivanmukta.

He who considers this world as the result of the combination of the Panchamahabhutas, attains mukti. A person who regards pleasure and pain as equal, and gain and loss at par, in whose appraisal victory and defeat differ not, to whom like and dislike are the same, and whom fear and anxiety do not change, is wholly liberated.

The one who regards his imperfect body as only a mass of blood, urine and excreta, and also a home of all manner of disorders and diseases, finds emancipation. He who always remembers that decrepitude, wrinkles, white hair, gauntness, paleness will eventually overcome and bend his body, is liberated. He who remembers his body is liable to loss of virility, weakness of sight, loss of hearing and strength, attains moksha. He, who knows that the Rishis, the Devas and the Asuras too must depart from their individual realms, is a Jivanmukta. The one who knows that thousands of powerful kings have left this earth, gains emancipation.

He who knows that the acquisition of objects is always difficult, that pain is abundant, and that tending to relatives is fraught with pain, becomes liberated. Witnessing the copious faults of children and adults, is there anybody who would not worship moksha? One who awakens through the scriptures and worldly experience, and perceives every human concern to be unsubstantial, is a Jivanmukta.

Whether you choose to be a grihastha or pursue mukti, remember my words, and act like a Jivanmukta."

Sagara heard these virtuous words that lead one towards moksha, and with their help he continued to rule his subjects.’

CANTO 290

Yudhishtira says, 'There is another thing that I wish to know all about from you, Pitamaha; tell me everything about it. Why did the Devarishi Usanas, also known as Kavi, favour the Asuras and oppose the Devas? Why did he diminish the tejas of the Devas? Why did the Danavas always engage in enmity with the Devas?

Having the splendour of an immortal, why did Usanas gain the name of Sukra? How also did he acquire such superior powers? Tell me, even though he has awesome energy, why does he not travel to the centre of the firmament? Pitamaha, I wish to know everything about this.'

Bhishma says, 'Rajan, listen closely to the actual events, as I heard and understand them. For a good reason, Usanas engaged in doing what is disagreeable to the Devas. The royal Kubera, lord of the Yakshas and the Rakshasas, is the lord of the treasury of Indra. With his yoga-shakti, Maharishi Usanas entered Kubera's body, to overpower him and rob him of his wealth. Great anguish overcame Kubera at the loss of his wealth. Full of anxiety and wrath, he approached Mahadeva, the greatest of gods.

Kubera represented the matter to the fierce and amiable Shiva of various forms. He said, "By entering my body through his yoga, Usanas deprives me of liberty, and all my wealth, and in the same way, leaves me as he pleases."

Hearing these words, Maheswara was enraged. His eyes turned red, and with his mighty trident, he was eager to strike Usanas down, and he shouted, “Where is he? Where is he?”

Meanwhile, from a distance, Usanas determined Mahadeva’s intent, and waited in silence. Indeed, Usanas gauged Shiva’s wrath, and reflected whether he should approach Maheswara, flee or remain where he was.

Meditating on the Divine Mahadeva, Usanas set himself on the point of Mahadeva’s spear. Rudra realised he could not cast the spear now, so he bent the weapon into a bow, which is now known as pinaka.

Umapati saw Sukra Bhargava on the palm of his hand. He opened his mouth and quickly swallowed Usanas, who went down into his stomach and began to wander there.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘How could Usanas wander within the belly of the Highest? What did the illustrious lord do while the Brahmana was within his stomach?’

Bhishma says, ‘In days of old, after swallowing Usanas, Mahadeva entered the waters and, like a wooden stake, remained there in yoga-dhyana for millions of years. He completed his great tapasya and emerged from the mighty lake. Brahma approached him and enquired after his tapasya and well-being.

The lord with Nandi for his emblem answered, “My tapasya is successful.”

Sankara, of inconceivable soul, saw that Usanas within his stomach had become greater because of his penance. The greatest of yogins, Usanas, rich with the wealth of his penances and Kubera’s wealth, shone brightly in the Triloka.

After this, with the Pinaka by his side, Mahadeva once again sat down in dhyana, while Usanas anxiously continued to wander in Maheswara’s belly. Seeking to escape, the Maharishi began to sing the praises of the lord, but Rudra blocked all his apertures.

From within Mahadeva’s stomach, Usanas repeatedly addressed the Mahadeva, saying, “Show me your mercy!” Since all his other orifices were shut, Mahadeva said, “Come out through my linga.”

Confined on every side and unable to locate this orifice, the ascetic began to run here and there, burning all the while with Mahadeva’s tejas. At last, he found the opening and emerged through it. This is why his name is Sukra, or semen, and why he is unable to attain the core of the firmament.

The sight of Sukra emerging from his stomach, shining with bright energy, filled Bhava with anger, and he stood with the trisula in his hand.

Devi Uma quickly intervened and forbade her angry lord from killing the Brahmana. Because of Uma's intervention, Usanas became the son of the Devi.'

Uma said, "Since he is now my son, you can no longer kill this Brahmana. O Lord, he who emerges from your stomach does not deserve death at your hands."

Devi Uma's words pacified Bhava, and he smiled and said, "Let this one go wherever he likes."

Bowing to Mahadeva and to Goddess Uma, Usanas went away where he wished.

This, O king of the Bharatas, is the story of Sukra Bhargava, the Asuraguru.'

CANTO 291

Yudhishtira says, 'O Mahabaho, now tell me about what is beneficial for our weal. Your words are like amrita, with which I am never satiated. What are the good deeds, which help a man acquire what is for his highest benefit both here and in the hereafter?'

Bhishma says, 'Let me tell you what King Janaka once asked the peerless Parasara Muni. That king of Mithila said, "What is beneficial for all creatures, in this world and the next? Teach me about these things."

Parasara, who knew the precepts of every religion, said, "Dharma earned through karma is of supreme benefit in this world and the next. Ancient Rishis say there is nothing higher than dharma. By accomplishing the duties of dharma, a man receives honour in swarga. The dharma, again, of embodied creatures, lies in the tenets of karma.

All good men from the different asramas establish their faith in dharma, and accomplish their respective svadharmas. The shastras advise four methods of living in this world. These are the acceptance of gifts for Brahmanas, the realisation of taxes for Kshatriyas, farming for Vaisyas and service to the three other classes for the Sudras.

Wherever men live, the means of support come by themselves. After concluding various virtuous or sinful deeds, when living beings die and merge into their constituent elements, they attain diverse ends. If you steep vessels of white brass in liquid gold or silver, they catch the hue of these metals. Even so, a living being takes diverse portions of his past karma.

Nothing sprouts without a seed. None can gain happiness without performing karma that leads to happiness. When one's body disintegrates into its elements, one attains felicity only because of the righteous deeds of previous lives.

The sceptics argue, saying, "I do not see that anything in this world is the result of destiny or the virtuous and sinful deeds of past lives. Inference cannot establish the existence or operation of destiny. The Devas, the Gandharvas and the Danavas have become what they are due to their own nature and not because of past karmas. Men never remember in their next lives, actions of previous ones. They seldom credit the four kinds of karma of past lives with the rewards of their present life. The declarations in the authoritative Vedas mean to regulate the conduct of men, and keep their minds calm. These, the sceptics say, cannot represent the utterances of men possessed of true wisdom."

This opinion is wrong. In reality, one gains the fruits of whichever of the four kinds of acts one does, with the eye, the mind, the tongue and the muscles. As to the fruit of his deeds, O king, a person sometimes gains happiness wholly, utter misery at other times, and yet again, a blend of happiness and misery. Whether of punya or paapa, karmas remain.

There are times when, in the case of the man who is sinking in life's ocean of samsara, happiness remains concealed in such a way that it does not manifest until all his sorrows disappear. Know this, O king, that upon the exhaustion of the fruits of good deeds, the sinful ones begin to manifest themselves.

Self-restraint, forgiveness, patience, energy, contentment, honesty, modesty, non-violence, freedom from evil vasanas and intelligence—these produce happiness.

No creature is eternally subject to the fruits of his good or bad actions. The wise should always strive to remain composed. One never has to enjoy or endure the good and bad karmas of another. Indeed, one enjoys and endures the rewards of only what one does oneself. The man who shuns both happiness and sorrow walks along a special path—that of gyana. While men who choose to adhere to worldly objects, tread an entirely different path.

He who behaves in a manner that he would chastise in another, should rot in hell. Indeed, by doing something that one censures in others, one incurs ridicule. A Kshatriya bereft of courage, a Brahmana who eats every kind of impure food, a Vaisya incapacitated in pursuit of a livelihood, a Sudra that is idle and averse to labour; a scholar without good conduct, a man of high birth destitute of dharma, a Brahmana fallen away from truth, a wicked and impure woman, a yogin invested with attachments, one who cooks just for himself, a fool who preaches, a kingdom without a king and a king that cherishes no affection for his subjects—all these are pitiful.”

Parasara said, "The man, who reins in the steeds of his senses through his knowledge, is certainly intelligent. The homage paid to an enlightened sannyasin is worthy of high praise. Such reverence, O Dvija, is the result of instructions he receives from one who transcends karma and not from conversations with men engaged in karma. Given that the allotted period of life is rife with difficulties, one should not diminish its worth with self-indulgence. On the other hand, through virtuous means, one should always strive for one's spiritual progress.

Among the six different colours that the jiva attains at various stages in his life, he who falls away from a superior colour deserves censure. Hence, he who receives the result of good karma should avoid the guna of rajas so that it may not stain him. Man gains a superior colour through deeds of dharma. Unable to acquire a superior hue, he who sins, only kills himself.

Tapasya destroys all sinful acts done in ignorance. While a sinful deed, done knowingly, produces profound sorrow. Hence, one should never wilfully commit any sin. The gyani never does anything sinful even if it leads to the greatest benefit, just as a chaste man would never touch a Chandala. How miserable is the fruit of sin! Through sin, the very vision of the sinner becomes perverse, and he confounds his body, and its unstable elements, along with the soul. The fool who fails to take sannyasa in this world, afflicts himself with untold sorrow when he departs for the next world.

A soiled white cloth can be made white again with one wash, but not a black one. Beware, likewise is the case with sin. The one who sins knowingly, and performs appropriate penance to expiate the sin, must enjoy and suffer the fruits of his good and bad deeds, separately.

The Brahmavadis claim that acts of dharma negate all injuries that one inflicts in ignorance. Nevertheless, dharma never erases a sin that a man commits consciously.

In my opinion, whatever actions, be they righteous or sinful, be they done knowingly or otherwise, remain until their fruition. Whatever deeds done by the mind with full deliberation, produce fruits, according to their physicality or subtlety. Still, ignorant deeds that are fraught with grave himsa unfailingly produce results and reactions that lead to hell. The difference is that such outcomes are disproportionate in severity to the actions that produce them. As to the deeds of a dubious nature done by the Devas or Rishis, a man of dharma should never imitate or censure them.

He who reflects, ascertains his own ability and accomplishes deeds of dharma, certainly gains what is for his weal. Pour water into an unbaked vessel and it will gradually evaporate. Nevertheless, store it in a baked vessel, and it remains without diminishing. Likewise, actions done without reflection are not beneficial, while ones made with judgement yield happiness. Furthermore, even as water added to a vessel already containing water increases the quantity, all actions, equitable or otherwise, done with awareness, only add to one's store of dharma.

A king should properly rule and protect his kingdom by subjugating his foes and all who seek to assert their superiority. He must tend to his sacred fires and pour libations on them during sacrifices. In his mid-life or old age, he must retire into the forest to practice the duties of the last two asramas. With self-restraint, and noble conduct, he should look upon all creatures as he does on his own self. One should always revere one's superiors. By the practice of truth and of good conduct, O king, one is sure to gain joy."

Parasara said, "No one selflessly does good for another, nor makes gifts to others, selflessly. Everyone does things for their own selves. People abandon their very parents and brothers when these are no longer affectionate. What need be said then of relatives of other degrees? Gifts to a distinguished person and acceptance of the gifts made by a distinguished person both lead to equal merit. Of these two, however, the giving of a gift is superior to the acceptance of a gift. In order to receive virtue, one must carefully protect the wealth that one acquires and augments through proper means. This is an accepted truth. He who wishes to acquire dharma should never earn wealth through means involving himsa to others. Without zealously pursuing wealth, he should finish his tasks within his abilities.

Offering water with devotion to a guest amounts to earning the punya of feeding a hungry man. The enlightened Rantideva received success in all the worlds through the worship of Rishis through offerings of just leaves, roots and fruits. When the royal son of Sibi pleased Surya and his friends with offerings of the same kind, he too, won the highest regions of felicity.

Every human that is born incurs a debt to the Devas, Athitis, Dasas, Pitris and themselves. Everyone should do his best to free himself from these debts. One repays his debts to Maharishis by studying the Vedas, to the Devas by performing yagnas. By conducting the rites of sraddha, one frees oneself from one's debts to the Pitris. One pays one's debt to one's fellowmen by serving them well. One pays debts to oneself by listening to Vedic recitations and reflecting on their import, by eating the remnants of sacrifices, and by sustaining one's body.

From the beginning, one should discharge all the duties that one owes to one's servants. Even if destitute of wealth, men attain success through great exertions. Munis reach their goal by adoring the Devas and by pouring libations of clarified butter on the sacred fire.

Richika's son became the son of Viswamitra. He attained success in the afterlife by worshipping the Devas with Riks. Usanas gratified Mahadeva and became Sukra. Indeed, by singing the praises of Uma, he revels in the firmament, in great splendour.

Asita and Devala, Narada and Parvata, Kakshivat, and Jamadagni's son Rama, the chaste Tandya, Vasishta, Jamadagni, Viswamitra and Atri, Bharadwaja, Harismasru, Kundadhara and Srutasravas—all these Maharishis attained their goals by adoring Vishnu with the help of Riks, and with tapasya.

Many undeserving men, too, gain great distinction by venerating Lord Narayana. A man should not seek his progress through any evil or condemnable means. True wealth is what he earns through the ways of dharma. Fie on the wealth he earns with ignoble means. Dharma is eternal. No one should ever abandon it from a thirst for wealth. The man of dharma who kindles his sacred fire and offers daily homage to the Devas is the best of virtuous men.

Great king, the three sacred fires—Dakshina, Garhapatya and Ahavaniya—are the foundation of all the Vedas. A Brahmana, whose karmas and kriyas exist in their entirety, possesses the sacred fire. While abstaining from all karma, it is better to abandon the sacred fire than to keep it.

One should wait upon and humbly serve the sacred fire, the mother, the father and the teacher. The one who discards pride, and merely serves the aged, who is knowledgeable and bereft of lust, who looks upon all creatures with love, who has no wealth, does noble actions and lacks the desire of himsa, is truly a venerable one whom men of dharma adore."

Parasara said, “It is proper that the lowest varna should derive their sustenance from the other three varnas, by serving them. Performing such service with affection and reverence makes them honourable. Even if his ancestors did not serve anyone, a Sudra should not engage himself in any other occupation than service. It is proper for Sudras to associate with righteous men of dharma, but never with the sinful.

As in the eastern hills, jewels and metals blaze with greater splendour because of their proximity to the sun, so does the lowest varna shine with splendour because of its association with Dvijas. A piece of white cloth assumes the colour of its dye. Likewise is the case with Sudras. All men should embrace all virtuous qualities but never those that are evil. The life of human beings in this world is fleeting and transitory.

The sage who, in happiness and in misery, does only what is good, is a true observer of the scriptures. An intelligent man would never do anything that is discordant with dharma, however high the immediate benefits may seem by doing so. Deeds of adharma are never truly beneficial. A lawless king who snatches thousands of kine from their lawful owners, and donates them in charity, acquires no fruit beyond a hollow fame. In fact, he incurs the sin of theft.

Svayambhu first created Dhatri, who has universal respect. Dhatri created a son who engaged in upholding all the worlds. The Vaisya who engages in farming and the rearing of cattle, worships this Deva.

The Kshatriyas should occupy themselves in protecting all the other varnas. The Brahmanas should only enjoy whatever they receive. While the Sudras should humbly and honestly gather sacrificial articles, clean vedis and other places for worship and yagnas.

If each varna performs his svadharma in this manner, the sanatana dharma would not suffer any diminution. All creatures inhabiting the earth would be joyful through the preservation of dharma in its entirety. Seeing the happiness of all creatures on earth will bring joy to the Devas in swarga. Hence, the king who abides by his duties to protect the other castes, the Brahmana who studies the shastras, the Vaisya who engages in earning wealth and the Sudra who serves the other three other varnas, all become equally worthy of respect.

While, a contrary conduct, in evil, makes each order fall from dharma. Leave alone gifts by thousands, even twenty cowries that a man earns honestly, and offers grudgingly, will earn great benefit.

He, who reverentially makes gifts to Brahmanas, reaps great rewards. A gift that the donor makes after seeking out and honouring the recipient is invaluable. A gift that the donor makes upon solicitation is mediocre, whereas the gift which is made contemptuously and without any reverence, is the most inferior.

This is what the glorifiers of dharma, the holy Rishis, say. While sinking in this ocean of life, man should always seek to cross it by various means. Indeed, he should so exert himself so that he may free himself from the bonds of samsara.

The Brahmana shines with samyama, restraint, the Kshatriya by jaya, victory, the Vaisya through artha, wealth, while the Sudra always shines in glory through skilful service rendered to the three other varnas."

Parasara said, “Irrelevant of its quantity, the wealth that the Brahmana acquires through gifts, the Kshatriya through victory in battle, the Vaisya by following the duties of his varna, and which the Sudra earns through service of the three other varnas, is worthy of praise. Additionally, when a man spends the wealth to acquire dharma, it produces great benefits.

The Sudra is the constant servitor of the three other classes. If, out of a need for survival, the Brahmana takes to the duties of either the Kshatriya or the Vaisya, he does not decline from dharma. If however, he performs the tasks of the lowest varna, he certainly falls from his status.

When the Sudra is unable to earn his living by serving the three other orders, then trade, rearing of cattle and the practice of the mechanical arts are lawful for him.

Appearing on the boards of a theatre and disguising oneself in various forms, exhibition of puppets, the sale of spirits and meat and trading in iron and leather works should never be taken up as a livelihood by one who is a novice in these professions. Furthermore, each one of these occupations is censurable in the world. I even hear that if anyone working in any of these trades, leaves it, he acquires great merit.

When, out of arrogance, a successful person acts sinfully, what he so does can never pass for authority.

I also hear, from the Puranas of old, when dharma was held in great esteem among reasonable men and their livelihood was consistent with propriety and the shastras, the only punishment, enough to chastise their faults, was to cry fie on them.

At the time of which we speak, O king, men were full of praise for dharma, and nothing else. Men with remarkable evolution in dharma only worshipped good qualities. However, the Asuras could not bear to see dharma being prevalent in the world. Multiplying in number and energy, they entered into the bodies of men, followed by pride. From pride came arrogance, with wrath on its heels.

When wrath overwhelmed men, modesty and shame left them. They became careless and could no longer see clearly, as before, and they began to oppress one another to acquire wealth without any compunction. Then, the punishment of just crying fie on offenders was no longer effective. Men showed no reverence for either the Devas or Brahmanas, and began to indulge their senses to vile and vulgar surfeit.

Thereafter, the Devas approached Shiva in swarga to seek his protection from the three Asuras, Lobha, Krodha and Kama, now ruling in swarga. The Devas combined their tejas and imparted it to Mahadeva, who, with a single stroke of his trisula, felled the three Asuras down to Bhumi.

Rudra also killed the fierce king of the Asuras who terrorised the Devas. When the Asuras were dead, men regained their normal demeanour, and once again studied the Vedas and the other shastras.

The Saptarishis arrived and installed Vasava as the lord of the Devas and ruler of swarga. Moreover, they took upon themselves the duty of holding the rod of chastisement over mankind. In the wake of the Saptarishis, came Rajarishi Viprithu, and many other kings, all of the Kshatriya varna, to separately rule various clans and kingdoms of Manavas.

However, in those ancient times, there were certain elder men in whom evil vasanas were still awake, because of which there appeared many kings of terrible prowess who indulged in only such deeds as were fit for Asuras. Even to this day, exceptionally foolish men adhere to such evil ways, and establish them as authorities to follow and practice. This is why I say, O king, reflect properly upon the shastras, abstain from all actions fraught with himsa or malice, and seek Atmagyana.

The wise do not seek wealth to perform religious rites by ways of adharma that involve an abandonment of righteousness. Wealth gained from such means can never be beneficial. Become such a Kshatriya, O Rajan. Restrain your senses, be agreeable to your friends, and cherish your subjects, servants and children. The union of prosperity and adversity give rise to friendships and animosities. Thousands and thousands of existences continually revolve, and in every kind of jiva's life, these must of necessity occur. Therefore, embrace virtuous qualities, but never faults. Such is the nature of dharma, that it brings joy to even the most foolish person, bereft of every honour, who hears praise of any of his good qualities.

Virtue and sin exist only among men, and not among other creatures. Hence, whether in need of food and other essentials, or transcending them, one must cultivate a righteous disposition, acquire knowledge, always look upon all creatures as one's own self, and abstain from himsa. A man should divest his mind of yearnings and dispel its ignorance so as to succeed in gaining what is auspicious."

Parasara continued, “I have spoken to you on the precepts of the grihastasrama. I will now tell you about the way of tapasya. Listen to what I say.

Because of sentiments fraught with rajas and tamas, one sees the sense of possession spring up in the heart of the grihasta. In this asrama, one acquires kine, fields, wealth, wives, children and servants. One’s attachments and aversions increase, and one begins to regard one’s possessions as eternal and indestructible. When attachment and aversion overcome a man, and he yields to the acquisition of earthly objects, the reckless craving for enjoyment, kama, seizes him.

Considering the man with the largest share of enjoyments in this world to be fortunate, an indulgent man does not recognise any other happiness besides the gratification of the senses. As lust and greed flood him, he seeks to increase his relatives and attendants, and for their satisfaction strives to augment his wealth through every possible means. By now, he is replete with affection and attachment for his children, hence, for the sake of wealth, does all manner of base things that he knows to be evil, and gives way to sorrow if his wealth is lost. He earns honours and, ever on guard against the defeat of his plans, he uses any means that will satisfy his craving for power and pleasure. Finally, as the inevitable result of the path he pursues, he meets with destruction and death.

True felicity belongs to the intelligent, to the ones who chant of the eternal Brahman, who seek to accomplish only auspicious tasks, and who abstain from all karma that springs from desire.

The loss of persons we love, the loss of wealth, and physical diseases and mental anguish, all cause great despair. This pain gives rise to the awakening of the soul, which in turn creates an interest in the study of the shastras. From the contemplation of the scriptures, O king, one sees the value of tapasya.

A man who discerns between the essential and the trivial is rare. Indeed, the truth that the happiness he derives from wives and children ultimately leads to misery, is enough to make him take to tapasya. Tapasya, O child, is for all. Even the lowest order of men may undertake penance. Tapasya sets the man of self-restraint on the path to swarga.

It is through tapasya that the puissant lord of all creatures creates all existence. The Adityas, the Vasus, the Rudras, Agni, the Aswins, the Maruts, the Viswedevas, the Saddhyas, the Pitris, the Yakshas, the Rakshasas, the Gandharvas, the Siddhas and other Swargavasis—indeed, every other Deva—achieve success through tapasya. The Brahmanas whom Brahma created in the beginning succeeded through their tapasya in honouring not Bhumi alone, but swarga as well.

In this world of mortals, kings and grihastas of high families, owe their positions to tapasya. Their silken robes, their exquisite ornaments, the animals and chariots they ride and the fine seats they use are all because of tapasya.

The thousands of charming and beautiful women that they enjoy, and their palatial mansions, are all because of tapasya. Expensive beds and diverse kinds of delicious foods await men of dharma. There is nothing in the Triloka, O scorcher of foes, that tapasya cannot attain. Even men, destitute of true knowledge, win renunciation because of tapasya.

Whether rich or poor, a man should reject greed, and with the help of his intellect, he must ponder upon the scriptures.

Discontent produces sorrow, which is the result of lust and greed, which further leads to the bewilderment of the senses. Once a man confuses his senses, his wisdom disappears, and he fails to distinguish between right and wrong. All this leads to anguish. And so, one must practice austere tapasya to gain happiness. The failure to do so results in sorrow.

Notice the benefits between practising and abstaining from tapasya. Through exemplary penances, men always receive auspicious returns. Conversely, he who takes to penance to earn a reward, meets with many unpleasant results, disgrace and sorrow. Despite the joy of practising dharma, tapasya and dana, he wishes to indulge in all kinds of illicit acts. Through such sinful actions, he goes to hell. Still, O Rajan, he who remains firm in dharma, in happiness and sorrow, does not lose his regard for the scriptures.

I hear that the pleasure from sensual gratification lasts only so long as the flight of an arrow, and on its cessation, one experiences the utmost pain. Only the insane do not praise the felicity of moksha. Witnessing the anguish that attends gratification of the senses, the wise cultivate the virtues of santi and dama, peace and self-restraint, to attain mukti. Because of their righteous pravritti, wealth and pleasure, artha and kama, cannot affect them. Grihastas, without any compunction, may enjoy wealth and other possessions that they gain without effort. However, they should make an effort to discharge the duties of their varna.

Sinful men cannot imitate the practice of honourable men whose attention is fixed upon the shastras. Every vain act that a man commits meets with destruction. Hence, men who are noble and follow dharma, need make no other effort, other than tapasya. While grihastas, whose addiction lies in actions, must wholeheartedly devote themselves to karmas. Additionally, they must attend to their duties and perform sacrifices and other religious rites with dexterity and attention. Indeed, as all rivers have their refuge in the ocean, men from all the varnas have their sanctuary in the grihastasrama."

Janaka said, "Maharishi, from where does this difference of colour arise among men of different varnas? Tell me this, O best among speakers. The srutis say that our children are our own self. Since all inhabitants of the earth originate from Brahma, they should all be Brahmanas. Born from Brahma, why do men take to practices that differ from those of Brahmanas?"

Parasara said, "You are right, O king. The children of the creator are none else than the creator himself. However, because of their decline from tapasya, this distribution into classes of different hues has occurred. When the soil and the seed are fertile, the offspring can only be exceptional. But if the soil and seed are less than immaculate, the progeny will be inferior.

Men who know the scriptures are aware that when Iswara sets himself to create the worlds, some creatures spring from his mouth, some from his arms, others from his thighs and a few from his feet. They who emerge from his mouth are Brahmanas. The ones born from his arms are Kshatriyas. Those born from his thighs are Vaisyas. Lastly, the ones born of his feet are the Sudras. He creates only these four varnas, O Rajan. Those who belong to classes other than these are an admixture of these.

The Atirathas, Ambashtas, Ugras, Vaidehas, Swapakas, Pukkasas, Tenas, Nishadas, Sutas, Magadhas, Ayogas, Karanas, Vratyas and Chandalas, are all Kshatriyas born of the four original orders by intermixture with one another."

Janaka said, “When all are born from Brahma alone, how do Manavas have diversity in race? O Maharishi, we see an infinite diversity of races in this world. How can men of indiscriminate origin, who devote themselves to tapasya, become Brahmanas? Indeed, those born of pure wombs and those of impure, all tapasvins became Brahmanas.”

Parasara said, “We cannot judge Jivanmuktas in light of their low births. Maharishis, with their shakti, confer the status of Rishis on the children they father in impure wombs.

My grandfather Vasishta, with Rishyasringa, Kasyapa, Veda, Tandya, Kripa, Kakshivat, Kamatha, Yavakrita, and Drona, Ayu, Matanga, Datta, Drupada and Matsya: all these, O ruler of the Videhas, have become what they are because of their tapasya.

Originally, there were only four gotras—those of Angiras, Kasyapa, Vasishta and Bhrigu. In time, because of karma and pravritti, many more gotras came into existence. The names of these gotras originate in their founders. Righteous men use them.”

Janaka said, “Tell me, O holy one, the particular duties of the various varnas. Tell me also what their common duties are. You know everything.”

Parasara said, “Acceptance of gifts, presiding over the sacrifices of others, and teaching disciples, are the special duties of the Brahmanas. The protection of the other varnas is the svadharma of the Kshatriyas. Agriculture, cattle rearing and trade are the occupations of the Vaisyas—while, servicing the twice-born castes is the vocation of the Sudras. These are the special duties of the four orders. Listen now, O child, as I tell you of the common duties for all the four varnas.

Compassion, ahimsa, heedfulness, charity, sraddhas in honour of the Pitris, hospitality, truthfulness, subjugation of anger, contentedness with one’s wives, purity, freedom from malice, knowledge of the Atman, and renunciation—these, O king, are common to all the varnas. Brahmanas, Kshatriyas and Vaisyas are the three pre-eminent castes. All of them have an equal right to perform these karmas. Even as they acquire great merit by drawing inspiration from a man of dharma among their order, these three varnas meet with sorrow if they perform karmas beyond what is ordained for them.

The Sudra never falls down from not performing Vedic rites, nor is he worthy of any of the rites of redemption. The course of duties that flow from the Veda is not for him. Nevertheless, he has the sanction to practice the thirteen duties common to all the orders.

O Janaka, Brahmanas regard a virtuous Sudra as equal to Brahma himself. Yet, I perceive such a Sudra as the effulgent Vishnu, the First One in all the worlds.

Persons of the lowest varna, who wish to extinguish their evil passions, may follow the conduct of the higher-born orders. Furthermore, they may earn great punya by performing all rites, other than the chanting of mantras, which are only for the other orders. Wherever Sudras adopt the behaviour of the higher castes, they attain happiness because of which they are able to abide in felicity both here and in the hereafter."

Janaka said, "O Maharishi, is it the man's karma or is it his varna that makes him impure?"

Parasara said, "Certainly, O king, karma and janma, are two sources of impurity. Listen to their difference. Irrespective of birth and actions, the criterion to remain pure is abstention from sin. If a high-born man sins, what he does stains him despite his superior birth. Hence, between actions and birth, karma stains man more than janma.

Janaka said, "What are the acts of dharma that do not inflict himsa upon other creatures?"

Parasara said, "Let me tell you about ahimsa that is the saviour of mankind. Men who dissociate themselves from all worldly attachments are free from all anxieties. Gradually ascending the path of yoga, they finally see moksha before them. Through faith, humility, self-restraint, keen intelligence and abstinence from all activity, they attain eternal bliss.

There is no question that all classes of men, who properly discharge dharma, and abstain from adharma, ascend to swarga."

Parasara said, “The fathers, friends, preceptor, even the spouses of gurus, of men who are bereft of bhakti, cannot give them the punya that accompanies devotion. Only men who are firm in their devotion to elders, who speak pleasantly to them, who seek their welfare, and are humble in behaviour to them, can gain the merit of bhakti.

The father is the highest of Devas for his children. He is superior to the mother. The highest acquisition is that of knowledge. Men who subdue the objects of the senses acquire mukti.

The Kshatriya prince who goes to battle, receives wounds from fiery arrows, and burns therewith, certainly finds realms to which even the Devas cannot attain, where he enjoys the joys of swarga.

When a Kshatriya meets a warrior who is overcome with fatigue, fear and tears, who has no further will left to fight, has no weapons, nor armour, nor horse, nor chariot, nor infantry for support, then, O king, the Kshatriya should spare such a warrior. Neither should he strike one who surrenders, one who is ill, one who cries for mercy, one of tender years or one who is old.

A Kshatriya should fight another Kshatriya who bears armour, has chariots, horse and foot-soldiers, and who besides is ready for battle and is an equal. Death at the hands of one who is equal or superior is laudable, but not at the hands of one who is low, a coward or any other kind of wretch. This is well known. Death at the hands of one who is sinful, or of low birth and evil ways is inglorious and leads to hell. No one can rescue the man whose time has run out and whose life is over. Similarly, no one can kill the man whose time has not yet come and whose life is not yet over.

One should prevent one’s loving elders from doing menial work, and acts fraught with himsa. One should never wish to extend one’s own life by taking the lives of others. When they die, it is laudable for grihastas who live in sacred places to lay down their lives on the banks of sacred rivers.

When one dies, one dissolves into the Panchamahabhutas. Sometimes, death occurs suddenly through accidents, and at times gradually, from natural causes. He, who treads the path of moksha but accidentally meets with death, acquires a similar body and remains a traveller like a person going from one room to another. The only cause for such a man to acquire another body is his accidental death in a sacred place. There is no second cause. Such a body comes into being and attaches itself to Rudras and Pisachas.

Men who know Adhyatma say that the body is an agglomerate of arteries, sinews, bones and a great deal of repulsive and impure matter besides. They say that it is a compound of gunas, along with the senses and objects of the senses born of yearning, all of which have an outer sheath to clothe them. Bereft of beauty and other skills, this combination, through the force of cravings of a previous life, assumes a human form.

The body that the soul abandons becomes inanimate and motionless. Indeed, when the primal ingredients return to their individual nature, the body blends with dust and ashes. Because of its association with actions, the jiva’s past karmas determine the circumstances under which it reappears. Verily, O Janaka, under whatever circumstances that this body meets with dissolution, its next birth enjoys and endures the fruits of all its past actions.

When the jiva parts from the body, it is not immediately born in a different form. Like a large cloud, it roves through the sky for some time until it assumes a new body.

The soul is above the mind. The mind is above the senses. Animate creatures are the most outstanding beings of all creation. Of all mobile beings, those that have two legs are superior. Among the bipeds, the Dvijas, the twice-born, are foremost. Amidst them, the wise ones are the best. Beyond them, are the ones who acquire knowledge of the Soul. Finally, there are the ones who have the gift of humility; these are superior even to the Atmagyanis.

Indubitably, death follows birth. Creatures, under the influence of sattva, rajas and tamas, pursue actions that meet with an end.

He is a man of dharma who dies under a sacred constellation, at an auspicious time when the sun is in the northern declension, during Uttarayana. He is a man of dharma, who purifies himself of all sins and completes all his tasks. He is a man of dharma who abstains from himsa to any man, and meets Mrityu serenely, when she comes.

Death by taking poison, or hanging, or burning, or at the hands of robbers or by the jaws of animals, is inglorious. Men of dharma never incur such deaths even if mental and physical diseases of the most agonising kind afflict them. The lives of the men of dharma, O king, pierce through the sun, and ascend into the world of Brahma. The lives of those who follow dharma, who are yet sinful, range in the middle regions. While the spirits of the sinful sink into the lowest depths.

There is only one foe and not another. That enemy is ignorance, O king. Under its spell, one perpetrates frightful and cruel deeds. To resist such an adversary one should use one's energy by serving elders in accord with the srutis. Only through steady attempts with the help of wisdom can one destroy the curse that follows one's sins.

He who wants to acquire punya should first become a brahmacharin, study the Vedas and observe tapasya. He should then enter grihastasrama to perform yagnas. Once he establishes his vamsa, he should enter the jungle as a vanaprastha, restrain his senses, and seek moksha.

One should never emasculate oneself by abstaining from any enjoyment. Of all births, to be born as a human is best, even if as a Chandala. Indeed, amidst all orders of birth, humanity is the best, because it offers an avenue to save one's self through punya karmas.

So that they do not fall from humanity, men, with the guidance of the srutis, always perform deeds of dharma. As a Manava, he who disregards dharma, indulges in malice, and succumbs to greed and lust, certainly meets with betrayal by his desires.

He who loves all creatures, cherishes them, consoles and feeds them, addresses them with respect, who rejoices in their happiness and grieves in their sorrows, and disregards all kinds of wealth, will never suffer misery in the next world.

Repairing to the Saraswati river, the Naimisa jungles, the Pushkara lakes and other places of Tirtha, one should give gifts, practice renunciation, render one's form amiable, O king, and purify one's body with baths and tapasya.

Of those who die at home, one should perform their last rites, carry their bodies to the smasana on a ratha, and assign them to the flames according to scriptural rites.

Religious rites, ceremonies, charity, the performance of sacrifices, presiding at yagnas, performing other meritorious deeds, fulfilling sraddhas beneficial to one's ancestors: all these one does for one's own weal. The Vedas with their six Angas, and the other shastras, O king, are made for the welfare of the chaste."

CANTO 299

Bhishma says, 'Once again the ruler of Mithila, Janaka, questions Parasara.'

Janaka asked, "What yields punya? What is the best path? Which is the accomplishment that cannot meet with destruction? What is the place from where one does not have to return? Tell me all this, O sage."

Parasara said, "Dissociation from attachments is the root of all that is beneficial. Knowledge is the highest path. Penances never meet with destruction, gifts made to deserving persons are not lost. A man achieves success when he breaks the bonds of sin, revels in dharma, makes the highest of all gifts and pledges ahimsa to all creatures.

He who gives away thousands of kine, hundreds of horses and promises ahimsa, receives in return the same pledge from all.

One may abide in the midst of all kinds of wealth and enjoyment, yet, because of gyana, remain impervious to their influence. Whereas the ignorant man steeps himself in objects of enjoyment that are not even substantial.

Sin cannot cling to a wise man, just as water cannot drench the leaves of the lotus. Sin adheres more firmly to him who has ties, even as lac and wood cleave to each other. Sin never abandons the sinner, only the endurance of its fruits can smother it. Verily, the sinner must face its consequences, when the time comes.

Fruits of karma never afflict pure men who realise the existence of Brahman. While immense fear afflicts ignorant men who, unaware of their evil doings, attach themselves to good and evil. But sin never stains the man who is entirely free from attachments and anger, even if he lives in the lap of luxury.

As a dam across a river causes its waters to swell, the man without attachments creates the levee of dharma, which protects him from suffering. In fact, his punya and tapasya increase.

As the Suryakantam gem attracts and absorbs the rays of the sun, so does dhyana help in the advancement of yoga.

As the frequent blending of sesame seeds with fragrant flowers, increases the quality of the seeds, even so the nature of sattva in men arises in proportion to the measure of their association with men of dharma.

He who wishes to live in swarga, leaves his wife, wealth, rank, chariots and various karmas and kriyas. Indeed, when one reaches such a frame of mind, one's mind dissociates from the objects of the senses. Whereas, he who fixes his heart on objects of the senses becomes blind to his welfare, and his own heart, like a fish drawn to bait, drags him to his ruin.

Just as different limbs and organs form the body, all mortals depend upon each other for existence. They are as weak as the pith of the banana plant. Left to themselves, like a fragile boat, they sink in the ocean of samsara.

There is no fixed time to acquire dharma. Death waits for no man. When man is constantly flying to meet his end, the accomplishment of good karma is paramount at all times. Like a blind man, who moves about his house by instinct, the wise man who focuses on yoga successfully advances along his chosen path.

Death emerges from birth. Birth is subject to the sway of death. He who is unfamiliar with the moksha dharma spins like a wheel between birth and death, unable to free himself from that fate. He who walks along the true path with buddhi for his guide, earns happiness both here and in the hereafter.

In indulging in diversity lies misery, while in discernment abides happiness. Fruits of karma, which the Jivatma represents, constitute the diverse. Whereas, tyaga, sacrifice, constitutes the select.

As the lotus stalk quickly sheds the mire that attaches to it, even so the Soul can speedily disown the mind. The mind initially inclines the Atman to yoga, and then merges the mind into itself. When the Atman achieves yoga, communion, it sees itself free of all attributes.

When a man occupies himself with sensory pleasures, and believes this to be his vocation, he fails from his true mission. Through its deeds of dharma, the wise man's Soul attains a state of high felicity in swarga, while that of the ignorant one sinks low or finds birth among intermediate creatures.

Just as water will not evaporate from a baked earthen vessel, a man of severe tapasya remains full of joy. The one who steeps himself in worldly trappings can never know mukti. He who shuns mundane things succeeds in enjoying great bliss hereafter.

When a man suffers from congenital blindness, he is unable to find his way anywhere. Similarly, the sensualist who confines his soul in an opaque cage feels as if a mist surrounds him and fails to see the true objective of life.

As seafaring merchants make profits in proportion to their investment, even so mortal beings appropriate ends according to their actions. Like a snake breathing air, Mrityu wanders in this world in the guise of decrepitude and devours all creatures.

A being enjoys or suffers the fruits of karmas from previous lives. There is nothing pleasant or disagreeable, which one experiences, without it being the result of past actions. Whether resting or moving, idle or working, whatever state a man may be in, his past deeds always overtake him. One who reaches the other shore of samsara has no wish to return to where he set sail from.

As with the help of a rope, the fisherman draws in his net sunk in the water, so does the mind, through yoga-dhyana, save the jiva from drowning in samsara. As rivers flow towards the ocean to merge with it, even so the mind, through yoga, becomes one with Purusha.

When affection traps the minds of men and ignorance envelops them in darkness, men crumble like castles made of sand. He who views his body as only a vessel and purity as its holy water, and walks along the path of wisdom, gains happiness both here and hereafter.

Friends that we acquire with our affluence, kinsmen of selfish motives, one's wives, sons and servants—each one devours one's wealth. In the next world, neither the mother nor the father can confer the slightest benefit upon one.

Charity creates the fare on which one can subsist. Indeed, one must enjoy the fruits of one's own actions. The mother, son, father, brother, wife and friends, are like lines that one merely traces with gold, but in reality are not gold itself.

From the moment of conception, a creature acquires all the karmas, good and bad, of his past lives. Through actions of his past lives, man gains wealth, animals, wives, children, honour of birth and other valuable possessions. Knowing that everything one enjoys or endures is the result of the actions of past lives, the Soul urges the intellect in different ways to avoid dark fruits.

Relying on earnest efforts, through proper means, he who sets forth to accomplish his tasks meets with success. As his rays of light never abandon the sun, even so prosperity never abandons the faithful. The work that a man does without pride, and with intelligence, is never lost.

Like wind that scatters sawdust, Mrityu, with the help of Kaala, leads all beings to their deaths."

Bhishma continues, 'Janaka derives immense joy, O king, from these words of Rishi Parasara, words so consistent with dharma.'

CANTO 300

Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, wise men praise truth, self-restraint, forgiveness and wisdom. What is your opinion of these virtues?'

Bhishma says, 'Here, I will recite an old account, O Yudhishtira, of the discourse between the Sadhyas and a swan. Once upon a time, the unborn and eternal Brahman assumed the form of a golden swan, and ranged through the Trilokas until he came across the Sadhyas.

The Sadhyas said, "O Lord, we are the Devas called the Sadhyas. We have a question for you. Indeed, we ask about the moksha dharma. You know it well. We hear, O bird, that you possess great learning, and are eloquent of speech. O hamsa, what do you think is the highest of all objects? O divine one, what gives you pleasure? Lord of all birds, instruct us in what you regard as the best of actions to free oneself from all bonds."

The swan said, "You who have drunk amrita, I hear that one should take recourse to penances, self-restraint, truth and the subjugation of the mind. Untying all the knots of the heart, one should also bring dvesha and advesha, the agreeable and the abhorrent, under one's control. One should not wound the very hearts of others with harsh, cruel words. One should never receive scriptural learning from an unkind person. One should never use words that inflict pain on others, or cause misery, and so find hell for oneself.

When wordy barbs pierce a man, he burns incessantly. Such arrows strike straight at his heart. Hence, wise men must never aim them at others.

If a man of wisdom is deeply hurt by sharp words, he should remain calm. When someone tries to anger him, and he rejoices instead of yielding to ire, the provoker loses all his merits. The joyous man of dharma, who subdues his wrath instead of indulging in it, whereby it would lead him to speak ill of others and become their enemy, takes away the punya of others.

I, for one, never respond, when others speak ill of me. If it happens, I always forgive the abuser. Dharma teaches that forgiveness, truth, sincerity and compassion are the best of all virtues.

Satya is the Arcanum of the Vedas. The secret of truth is Dama. The deep mystery of Samyama is moksha. This is the teaching of all the shastras.

I view him as a Brahmana and a Muni, who subdues the rising impulse of rash speech, the urge of ire, the greed for unworthy things, and the cravings of the stomach and the organ of pleasure.

One who does not yield to anger is superior to one who does. The one who practices renunciation is superior to one who does not. He who possesses the virtues of manhood is superior to the one bereft of them. One who has knowledge is superior to the one who is without it.

A man should not respond in manner or kind to harsh words. Indeed, by desisting, he succeeds in foiling his assailant and takes away all his punya. He who does not retaliate with coarse speech, he who does not return praise with applause, he who has the fortitude to forbear from striking back in return to any provocation, and eschew ill wishes on the attacker, finds that even the Devas covet his friendship.

One should forgive the sinful man who insults, injures and calumniates, even while pretending to be a man of dharma. Through such poise, one attains success.

Although I have nothing left to accomplish, I always wait reverentially on men of dharma. I have no thirst. I have no anger. If greed attempts to seduce me, I do not slip away from the path of dharma. I do not approach anyone for wealth. If someone curses me, I do not retaliate. I know that self-restraint is the door to immortality.

I disclose unto you a great mystery. There is no condition superior to that of humanity. Like the emerging moon from behind murky clouds, the pure, wise man shines in resplendence, and attains success by patiently biding his time.

The man who restrains his soul, and becomes an outstanding pillar of the very universe, of whom men speak only pleasant words, becomes a friend of the Devas.

Revilers never speak of the merits of a man as they speak of his faults. He who restrains his speech and mind, and devotes himself to the Supreme, acquires the fruits of the Vedas, tapasya and of yagna.

The wise man should never villify men of no merit with criticism or insults. He should not extol others and nor should he hurt them. The gyani perceives revilement of himself as nectar. In damnation, he sleeps without anxiety. The reviler, on the other hand, meets with destruction.

The sacrifices that one performs in anger, the gifts one makes in ire, the penance one performs in rage, and the offerings and libations one makes to the sacred fire in pique, are such that Yama himself robs their punya. Hence, the efforts of an angry man becomes entirely fruitless.

O Sadhyas, he who conquers his four portals of desire and rage, the organ of pleasure, the stomach, his two arms, and speech, realises dharma. One, who always practices truth, self-restraint, sincerity, compassion, patience and renunciation, and devotes himself to the study of the Vedas, does not covet what belongs to others, and pursues what is good with a singleness of intent, succeeds in reaching swarga.

As a calf sucks all the four teats of its dam's udders, one should devote oneself to the practice of all these virtues. I do not know of anything more sacred than dharma. I move among the Manavas and the Devas, and I proclaim that dharma is the only means to gain swarga.

A man becomes like those he lives with, like those whom he admires and what he wishes to be. If a man waits with respect on a man of dharma, or him who is otherwise, if he serves with devotion a sage or a thief, he absorbs their characters.

The Devas always commune with those who possess wisdom and goodness. They never entertain the wish to even watch the enjoyments that men indulge in. The person, who knows that all objects of earthly pleasure bear the stamp of vicissitudes, has few rivals, and is superior to the moon and the wind.

When the Purusha that dwells in one's heart is free from blemish, and walks in the path of dharma, the Devas take delight in him. Even if men expiate their offences with appropriate rites, the Devas distance themselves from such men, who worship sense gratification, indulge in harsh words and who are habitual thieves.

Men who have a mean soul, who keep no restrictions on what they eat, and whose deeds are sinful, never please the gods. On the other hand, the Devas associate with men who keep the vow of truth, are grateful and engage in the practice of dharma.

Silence is better than speech. To speak the truth is better than silence. Truth, together with dharma, is even better. In addition to being words of satya and dharma, words that one can depend upon are the best."

The Sadhyas said, "What is it that covers this world? Why does one fail to shine? What causes people to discard their friends? Why do people fail to attain swarga?"

The swan said, "Ignorance envelops the world. Men fail to shine because of malice. Greed is the cause for people to shun friends. Men fail to gain swarga due to attachment."

The Sadhyas said, "Who alone among the Brahmanas is always happy? Who alone amongst them can observe the vow of silence though he dwells in the midst of many? Who alone amongst them, albeit weak, remains strong? And who alone amongst them does not quarrel?"

The swan said, "Only the Brahmana who has wisdom is ever happy. In the midst of many, only the wise Brahmana succeeds in keeping the vow of silence. Only the wise Brahmana remains strong in weakness. He alone amidst them who has wisdom avoids quarrels."

The Sadhyas said, "Where can we find such holy Brahmanas? Wherein does their purity lie? And where their impurity? In what lies their condition of being human?"

The Swan said, "In the study of the Vedas lies the divinity of the Brahmanas. In their vows and observances, is their purity. In censure is their impurity. In death lies their mortality."

Bhishma continues, 'This is the wonderful story of the discourse between the Sadhyas and the swan. The body, both physical and subtle, sthula and sukshma, is the origin of karmas, and the Jivatman is dharma.'

CANTO 301

Yudhishtira says, 'O Pitamaha, you know everything, explain to me the difference between the Samkhya and the yoga systems of philosophy.'

Bhishma says, 'The followers of Samkhya praise the Samkhya system and the yogins laud the yoga system. To establish the superiority of their individual faiths, each claims his own system to be the better.

Wise yogins assign proper and valid reasons to show that one who does not believe in the existence of God cannot attain moksha.

Whereas, sages who believe in the Samkhya doctrines advance good reasons to prove that one who acquires the highest knowledge, and dissociates himself from all worldly objects, attains mukti when he dies, and that it cannot be otherwise. This is how men of great wisdom explain the Samkhya philosophy of moksha.

When logic is thus equal on both sides, one should accept the reasons that one is otherwise likely to adopt as one's own. Indeed, one must acknowledge such teachings as being beneficial. Good men abound on both sides. Men like you may adopt either opinion.

The ways of yoga directly address the ken of the senses, while the shastras are the basis of the Samkhya testimonies. I approve of both the systems of philosophy, O Yudhishtira. Furthermore, even the good and wise concur with both practices. If one employs them properly, O king, then either tradition is adequate for a person to attain the highest end.

Both teachings equally recommend purity and compassion towards all creatures. Both lay equal emphasis on the observance of vows. It is only the shastras that explicate their paths that are different.'

Yudhishtira says, 'If the vows, the purity, the compassion and the fruits that both methods recommend are the same, tell me, O Pitamaha, why then are their scriptures different?'

Bhishma says, 'By discarding the five faults, attachment, heedlessness, affection, lust and wrath, one attains moksha. Even as large fish break through the net and pass into their own element, yogins who transcend lust, wrath and the rest, purify their sins and gain the eternal bliss of moksha. As powerful animals tear through the hunter's snares, and escape into the exuberance of freedom, likewise, yogins, freed from all bonds, attain the sinless path that leads to mukti.

Truly, O Anagha, strong yogins who sever the bonds of desire, attain the sinless, auspicious and high path of moksha. Feeble animals, caught in nets, surely die. Likewise is the case with persons destitute of the power of yoga.

As the fisherman's net snares fishes, and the weak ones die, even so, men bereft of yoga shakti, encounter death amidst the bonds of samsara.

The fowler's net captures the weak birds, while the strong ones escape. So too with yogins. Bound by the bonds of karma, the weak meet with destruction, while the strong break free.

As large logs of wood extinguish a small and weak fire, even so the weak yogin meets with ruin in the world of attachments. Nevertheless, when the same fire burns strongly, it could consume the very earth. Even so, the strong and powerful yogin, ablaze with his tejas, can scorch the entire universe, like the sun that rises at the time of the Pralaya.

As a strong current sweeps away a weak man, so do objects of the senses carry away a weak yogin. As an elephant withstands a mighty current, a mighty yogin withstands all objects of the senses. Independent of all things, great yogins enter into the hearts of the lords of creation, the Rishis, the Devas and the Mahatmans.

Neither Yama, nor Ugra, nor Mrityu can overcome the yogin who has immeasurable tejas. Through his yoga shakti, he can assume thousands of forms and range over the earth. A few among them enjoy objects of the senses and then once again return to stern tapasya, and just as the sun withdraws his rays, these yogins withdraw themselves from their tapasya. The powerful yogin certainly attains moksha.

O Rajan, you are now aware of yoga. Let me tell you of the subtle powers of yoga, along with their traits. Listen, O lord of Bharata's vamsa, to the subtle signs of the dharana and the samadhi of the Soul.

As the archer whose aim is true succeeds in striking his mark, so does the yogin who merges into his Atman attain mukti. As a man with a pot of water on his head carefully climbs a flight of stairs, even so is the yogin, who meditates, enters into his soul, purifies it and makes it as radiant as the sun.

As in rough waters, an expert sailor guides his boat to the other shore, likewise, O monarch, the wise man fixes his soul in samadhi, and attains moksha. Like a skilful charioteer steers the Kshatriya to an advantageous position, similarly the yogin, alert and absorbed in dhyana, swiftly attains mukti.

The yogin, who remains immovable after he absorbs himself in samadhi, destroys his sins and gains the indestructible condition of men of enlightenment.

The yogin, who observes high vows, unites his Jivatman with the Paramatman, in the navel, throat, head, heart, chest, sides, eyes, ears and the nose, burns all his good and bad karma, and with yoga, communion, attains moksha.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, about the kinds of food a yogin must eat, and the things that he must conquer, for him to acquire yoga shakti.'

Bhishma says, 'O Bhaarata, subsisting upon broken grains of rice and sodden cakes of sesame, abstaining from oil and butter, the yogin acquires yoga tejas. Eating just dry barley powder, and confining himself to one meal a day, the yogin acquires yoga shakti.

Drinking just a blend of water and milk, at first, once during the day, then once in a fortnight, then once in a month, then once in three months, and then just once in a whole year, the yogin acquires yoga tejas.

By abstaining from meat, subduing lust, wrath, heat, cold, rain, fear, grief and the vital breath, the purified yogin acquires yoga shakti. By overcoming the desire for delightful sounds, and other fine objects of the senses, and the frustration born of abstention from sexual congress; conquering extreme thirst, and the pleasures of touch, sleep and idleness that is almost impossible to defeat, Mahayogins, with the help of their intellect, meditation and study, cause the most subtle Atman to reveal itself in all its glory.

This lofty path of yoga is exceptionally difficult to follow. No one can tread this path with ease. The trail is like a terrible forest, teeming with innumerable snakes and vermin. It has pitfalls everywhere, without water to slake one's thirst and, dense with thorns, it is virtually inaccessible.

Indeed, the way of yoga is like a road along which nothing to eat grows, which runs through a desert with all its trees burnt down, where bands of savage bandits rule. Very few young men can traverse it safely. Only a few evolved Brahmanas can tread such a path, with any ease and comfort. He who stops and turns his back on this path is guilty of many faults. Pure men easily persist with the razor sharp yoga-dhyana, while sinful men do not last on it for long.

If there is any disturbance or obstruction to dhyana, it can never lead the yogin to an auspicious goal. The man, O son of Kunti, who practices dhyana in accord with the precepts, successfully discards birth, death, happiness and sorrow.

All this that I tell you is from the diverse treatises upon yoga. One sees the highest benefit of yoga—the identification with Brahman, in twice-born men.

The excellence that the exalted yogin acquires is such that, at his will, he can enter into and come out of Brahma, and Vishnu, and Bhava, and Dharma, and the six-faced Kartikeya, and the sons of Brahma. Therefore, he can enter and leave tamas, rajas, sattva, and even Prakriti.

At his volition, he can enter and leave the Devi Siddhi, who is the consort of Varuna. He can do the same with all kinds of energies, the bright lord of the stars in the firmament, the Viswas, the Nagas, the Pitris, the mountains and hills, the vast and terrible oceans, all the rivers, and the clouds, the trees, Yakshas, the cardinal and subsidiary points of the horizon, the Gandharvas and all male and female beings.

This discourse, O king, which is in accord with the Supreme Being of infinite lustre, is auspicious beyond description. The yogin has Narayana for his soul. Prevailing over all things, such a yogin can create all things.'

3. There are possibly four different and unique sets of Shiva Sahasranama stotras—two in the Mahabharata (later found repeated in many Puranas with minor variations), one unique set in the Shiva Purana and one unique set in the Rudrayamala Tantra. The version found in the Linga Purana is essentially from the Mahabharata.

The version here is from the Shiva Purana. As with the Linga Purana version, in the Shiva Purana, Shiva is eulogised by Vishnu.

Shiva Sahasranama Stotram
Shiva Purana, Kotirudra Samhita
(Book IV), Chapter 35, 1-133

Suta said:

May this be heard, O great sages, I shall now recount the hymn of a thousand names of Shiva, whereby Shiva was pleased.

Sahasranama Stotra

- the hymn of a thousand names -

Sahasranama means thousand (sahasra) names (nama), and Sahasranama Stotra is a hymn eulogising the lord by recounting one thousand of His names. As the various sects of Hindu-tradition (Shaivism, Shaktism and Vaishnavism) grew and spread, it must have become extremely popular to write hymns of a thousand names for the primary deity of worship. There are various Sahasranama Stotras, but obviously here, we concentrate on the Shiva Sahasranama Stotra.

What makes the Shiva Sahasranama Stotra unique is the number of times and variations of the hymn, that are found in ancient texts. The appearance of the Shiva Sahasranama Stotra in at least eighteen different texts is a testament to the fact that Shaivism in various forms was once immensely popular throughout the Indian subcontinent. In fact, Shaivism was the most widespread and influential form of Hinduism prior to 1200 CE (before the beginning of the Islamic era and the pan-Indian Vaishnava devotional movements).

Below is a list of the texts in which Shiva Sahasranama Stotras are found.

1. Mahabharata (Anushasanaparva version)
2. Mahabharata (Shantiparva version)
3. Linga Purana (version 1; chapter 65)
4. Linga Purana (version 2; chapter 97)
5. Shiva Purana (Kotirudra Samhita)
6. Vayu Purana
7. Brahmanda Purana
8. Devi Mahabhagavata Upapurana
9. Padma Purana
10. Skanda Purana
11. Vamana Purana
12. Markandeya Purana
13. Saura Purana
14. Bhairava Tantra
15. Bhringiridi Samhita
16. Rudrayamala Tantra
17. Shiva Rahasya Itihasa
18. Akasa Kalpa Tantra

Using the reductionist approach, we arrive at four different major variants of the Shiva Sahasranama:

1. Mahabharata (Anushasanaparva version)
2. Mahabharata (Shantiparva version)
3. Shiva Purana
4. Rudrayamala Tantra

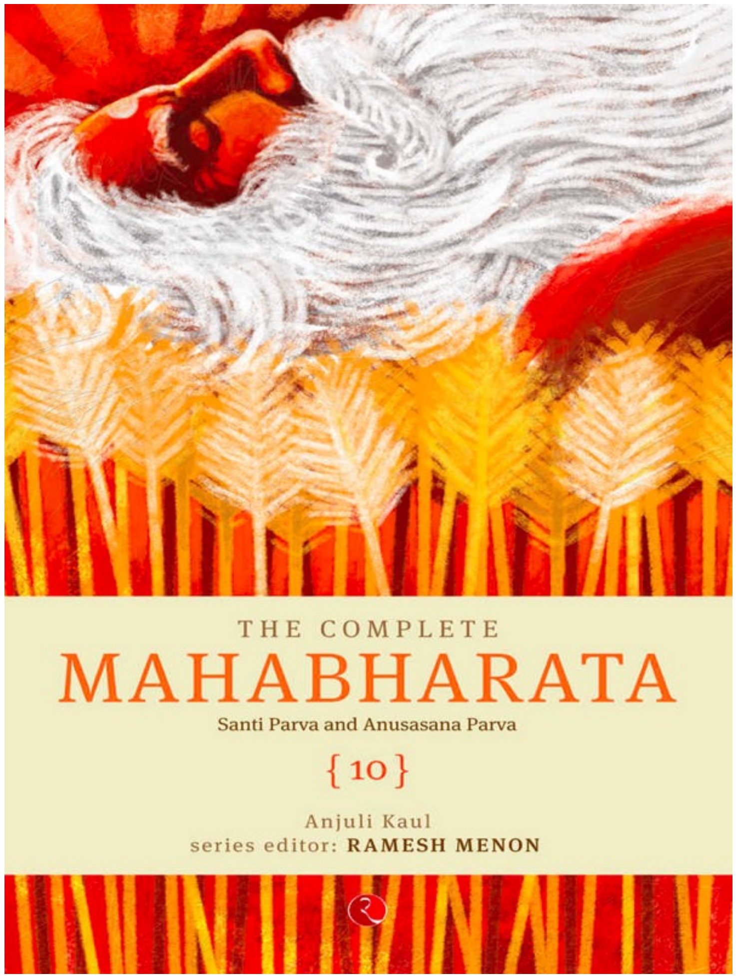
The two Mahabharata versions were copied into most of the Puranas, including the Linga Purana, with minor variations. An exception is the Shiva Purana version which appears to be original. Another original version is found in the Rudrayamala Tantra, which was later copied into the Shiva Rahasya Itihasa. If we were to hazard a guess as to which school the Shiva Sahasranama Stotras came from, it would be fairly reasonable to say that the Mahabharata (and most Purana) versions belong to the Smartas, the Shiva Purana version belongs to the Pashupatas, and the Rudrayamala Tantra version belongs to the Tantrik Shaivas.

The most ancient form of the Shiva Sahasranama Stotra is found in the Anushasanaparva book of the Mahabharata, wherein Shiva is eulogised by Krishna. The next most ancient version is likely the one found in the Shanti Parva book of the Mahabharata, which is thought to have been inserted later into the book, and not found in standard critical editions of the Mahabharata. The 1000 names given below are from the Linga Purana and are probably based on the Shanti Parva book of the Mahabharata with some variations. In the Linga Purana, it is not Krishna, but Vishnu who eulogises Shiva.

It is important to remember that in any given Sahasranama, several names are repeated more than once, and in most there are actually more than 1000 names. Given here are only the first 1000 names as found in the Linga Purana.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The divine grace of my spiritual masters, Guruji B.K. Subiah and Sri Ramana Maharishi.



In loving memory of Yamuna Y. Kakodkar, Bharati C. Shah, Kusum B. Maniar, Jagdish Shah, Suhasini Phatarpekar, Rajendra Y. Kakodkar, Ravindra Hudalikar, Prince Varghese and Mona Saigal.

I am deeply indebted to Bina Om Prakash for taking me much further in my quests, spiritual and otherwise, for standing by me through hard times and for planting the seed in me to write.

A special thanks to Jyoti Bhargava, who saw me through a critical time during the early stages of this book when I had almost quit after my mother's sudden demise. Also, for the daily infusion with black tea that kept me alert. And thank you Tania for always telling me, you should one day sit down and write.

My sincere gratitude to Ramesh Menon for all his experienced guidance, encouragement and for the valuable criticism, which kept me from going astray. This book would not have been written if he hadn't, out of the blue, invited me on this arduous but enchanting and profound journey.

Last and by no means least, much love and gratitude to my sister Neeta and my nephew Karan for enduring the full force and array of my moods during the year-and-a-half that it took for me to write this book.

"Yudhishtira says, 'Rajan, you have recommended to me the judicious path of yoga as a loving guru does for his sishya. I now ask about the principles of the Samkhya yoga. Speak to me about those doctrines, in their entirety. You are erudite about all the knowledge that exists in the three worlds!'

Bhishma says, 'Listen now to the subtle teachings of the followers of the Samkhya yoga established by all the great and puissant Yatis beginning with Kapila. There are no errors in that philosophy. Its merits are many. Truly, it is flawless. I understand that all things are imperfect. Manavas, Pisachas, Rakshasas, and Yakshas, Nagas, Gandharvas and Pitris, intermediate orders of beings like birds and animals, great avians like Garuda, the Maruts, royal and enlightened sages, Asuras and Viswadevas, divine Rishis and yogins, the Prajapatis and Brahma himself are all enmeshed with these objects that are difficult to discard, and they all strive to free themselves.

The Samkhyas understand the limits of one's time in this world. Aware of the highest, transcendent truth as well, they also know the truth about what is called happiness in this world, and the sorrows that befall those concerned with transient objects of desire. Aware of the grief of those who have fallen into the intermediate orders of being and of those who have sunk into hell, they see the merits and shortcomings of swarga, O Bhaarata, and all the merits and flaws of the Vedas, and the yoga and the Samkhya systems of philosophy. They realise also that the sattva guna has ten properties, that rajas has nine, and that tamas has eight, that the intellect, Buddhi, has seven properties, Manas, the mind, has six, and Akasa, space, has five; they discern that the understanding has four properties and tamas has three, and the rajas has two and sattva has one.

Knowing the path that is followed by all creatures when death overtakes them and the course of Atmagyana, self-knowledge, the wise and experienced Samkhyas, exalted by their discernment and awareness of causes, and acquiring true wisdom thorough auspicious living, attain the bliss of moksha like the rays of the sun or the wind taking refuge in Akasa.

Vision is attached to form, the sense of scent to smell, the ear to sound, the tongue to taste, and the skin to touch. The wind is housed in space. Dark stupor harbours in tamas. Greed takes refuge in the objects of the senses.

Vishnu is the Lord of the organs of motion; Indra that of the organs of strength; Agni of the stomach, and Bhumi of the waters.

The waters have heat for their haven. Agni has Vayu; and the wind has Akasa; Akasa has Mahat for its refuge, and Mahat has the understanding. The understanding is housed in tamas, tamas in rajas; rajas is founded in sattva and sattva is attached to Atman.

Atman has the glorious and puissant Narayana for its refuge. Narayana resides in moksha. Moksha has no need for any dwelling. The followers of the Samkhya yoga know that this body, imbued with sixteen attributes, is the outcome of sattva. Fully understanding the nature of the physical organism and the character of the Chetana that dwells within it, they recognise the one existent Being that lives in the body, the Atman, detached and sinless, and realising the nature of the actions of persons attached to the objects of their senses, they also know the character of the senses and the sensual objects which have their refuge in the Atman.

The Samkhyas appreciate the difficulty of moksha and the sacred texts that describe it, and recognise the nature of the vital breaths called Prana, Apana, Samana, Vyana and Udana, as also the two other breaths: the one going downward and the other moving up. Indeed, they know those seven breaths ordained to carry out seven different functions.

Parantapa, establishing the nature of the Prajapatis and the Rishis and the many high paths of righteousness, and the Saptarishis and the countless Rajarishis, the great Devarishis and the other Maharishis radiant like the sun, they see all these falling away from their power in the course of many long ages.

Hearing of the destruction of all the mighty beings in the universe, the Samkhyas understand the inauspicious end of sinful creatures, and the miseries of those that fall into the river of hell, Vaitarani in Yamaloka.

They grasp the ill-fated wanderings of beings through diverse wombs, housed in the unholy uterus in the midst of blood and water and phlegm and foul-smelling urine and faeces, and then in bodies, resulting from the union of blood and the vital seed, of marrow and sinews, supplied by hundreds of nerves and arteries, forming an execrable abode of nine doors.

O Lord of the Bharata vamsa, the followers of the Samkhya yoga, fully conversant with the Soul, know what produces good, and they clearly see the vile conduct of those whose natures are characterised by tamas, rajas or sattva—darkness, passion or goodness—and their sins that prevent them from attaining moksha.

They see the eclipse of the moon and the sun by Rahu, the falling of stars from their fixed positions and the deflection of constellations from their orbits, and recognise the sad division of all that was once united, the diabolical behaviour of creatures in devouring one another, the absence of all intelligence in the infancy of human beings, and the deterioration and destruction of the body.

The Samkhyas observe how little men value the sattva guna because they are overcome by anger and confusion. They see that only one among thousands of human beings struggles to achieve moksha; indeed they understand the difficulty of attaining moksha in accordance with the shastras, the scriptures.

They recognise the great anxiety that creatures have for unattained objects and unfulfilled desires and their comparative indifference to those that have been attained and gratified; son of Kunti, they mark the sins that result from the pursuit of the senses, the lifeless repulsive bodies of those who live miserably even in the midst of spouses and children.

The Samkhyas know the end of terrible dissolute men who are guilty of killing Brahmanas, and of evil Brahmanas addicted to intoxicants; they are also aware of the equally wretched death of those who lust after the wives of their acharyas, and of those who do not revere their mothers and the Devas.

After studying the diverse declarations of the Vedas, their knowledge helps them to understand how evil men will die; and also what will befall those who are born in the intermediate varnas.

Establishing the recurrent pattern of seasons, the passing of years, months, fortnights, and of days, they see the waxing and the waning of the moon, the rise and ebb of the seas, the increase and diminution of wealth, and the separation of unified objects, the end of yugas, the destruction of mountains, the drying up of rivers, and the degeneration of the purity of the varnas and also the end of that deterioration, repeating endlessly.

Beholding the birth, decay, death and sorrows of creatures, knowing truly the weaknesses of the body and the anguish of human beings, and their vicissitudes, the followers of the Samkhya philosophy, understand all the flaws of their own souls and bodies, and attain moksha.'

Yudhishtira says, 'O you of immeasurable tejas, what are those faults that you ascribe to one's body? Dispel all my doubts on this matter.'

Bhishma says, 'Listen, O Parantapa! The Samkhyas, followers of Kapila, who are wise and conversant with all paths, say that there are five faults in the human body. They are desire, anger, fear, sleep and breath. All mortals have these faults, which are found in their bodies.

The wise cut the root of wrath with the help of forgiveness. Desire is destroyed by giving up all goals. By cultivating sattva sleep is defeated, and fear is conquered by honing mindfulness. Breath is vanquished by an abstemious diet, Rajan.

They truly understand gunas aided by hundreds of gunas, hundreds of flaws, and diverse causes through hundreds of causes. They realise that the world is like the foam of water, cloaked in hundreds of illusions flowing from Vishnu, like a painted edifice, and as fragile as a reed, and they see it as a terrible dark abyss, as unreal and as short-lived as bubbles on water when compared to the duration of eternity.

The sagacious Samkhyas discard even tenderness towards their own children, knowing the world to be devoid of permanence and joy, with inescapable destruction for its end, sunk in rajas and tamas, and helpless like an elephant stuck in mire.

With their comprehensive yoga of knowledge, and the power of their penances, these Yatis sever and bludgeon all inauspicious vasanas born of rajas and those from tamas, and indeed all auspicious vasanas arising from sattva, and all pleasures of touch and the other bodily senses arising from the same three gunas, and in doing so, these Yatis cross samsara, the illusory ocean of life.

That terrifying ocean has sorrow for its waters. Anxiety and grief constitute its deep lakes. Disease and death are its colossal crocodiles. The great fears that pierce the heart at every step are its massive serpents.

The deeds inspired by tamas are its tortoises. Those inspired by rajas are its fish. Wisdom is the raft for crossing it. Sensual desires are its marshes. Decay constitutes its region of sorrow and turmoil.

Parantapa, knowledge is its island. Deeds make up its great depth. Truth is its shores. Pious practices form the lush weeds floating on its breast. Envy constitutes its swift tide. The emotions of the heart make up its mines. The diverse kinds of gratification are its precious jewels. Grief and fever are its winds. Misery and thirst form its mighty eddies. Agonising and fatal diseases are its colossal tuskers.

The collections of bones are its flights of steps, and phlegm is its froth. Gifts form its pearly banks. The lakes of blood are its corals.

Deafening laughter constitutes its roars. Diverse sciences make it impenetrable. Tears are its brine. Solitude is the high refuge of those that seek to cross it.

Children and wives are its countless leeches. Friends and kinsmen are the cities and towns on its shores. Non-violence and truth are its shorelines. Death is its last tempest.

The knowledge of Vedanta is its island that can harbour those tossed upon its waters. Compassion towards all creatures constitute its buoys, and moksha the priceless treasure offered to those voyaging on its waters seeking merchandise.

Like a horse spewing flames of fire, this ocean too, has its fiery terrors. Having transcended the limitations of dwelling within the gross body, so difficult to transcend, the Samkhyas enter into Akasa.

With his rays, Surya then bears those righteous men, followers of the Samkhya yoga. Like the fibres of the lotus-stalk sending water to the flower into which they all converge, Surya imbibes all things from the universe, and delivers them to those good and wise men.

Son of Kunti, these Yatis are carried by a gentle, cooling, fragrant wind, their attachments destroyed, animated with tejas, filled with the treasures of penances and crowned with success. That wind, the best of the seven winds, and which blows in blissful lands of great felicity, bears them, son of Kunti, to that which is the highest end in Akasa.

Then Akasa conveys them to the highest end of rajas. Rajas then bears them to the highest end of sattva. Sattva then lifts them to the Supreme Narayana.

Through himself, the puissant and pure-souled Narayana at last bears them to the Paramatman. Having reached this, Rajan, those pure ones attain immortality, and they never have to return from that condition.

That is the highest goal, O son of Pritha, which is achieved by those Mahatmans who have transcended the influence of all the contradictions and pairs of opposites.'

Yudhishtira says, 'O sinless one, after attaining this puissance and bliss, do these men of firm vows have any recollection of their lives including birth and death? O you of the Kuru vamsa, it is fitting that you tell me the truth about this, even as it is appropriate for me to ask none other but you this question.

On the subject of moksha, the scriptures are inconsistent and seem flawed, for some declare that consciousness disappears in the emancipated state, while others hold the very opposite.

If in this exalted condition the Yatis continue to live in consciousness, it would seem that the religion of Pravritti is superior. If, again, consciousness disappears from this state and the liberated one only resembles a person sunk in dreamless slumber, then it is wrong to say that there is no consciousness in moksha for of all that happens in dreamless sleep is that one's consciousness is temporarily eclipsed and suspended, but never lost, for it returns when one awakes.'

Bhishma says, 'However difficult to answer, your question, my son, is proper. Bharatarishabha, this kind of question unsettles even the most learned. For all that, hear the truth about this as I tell it to you.

The high-souled followers of Kapila have set their lofty intellects to this subject. The senses of knowledge, planted in the bodies of embodied creatures, are used for perception. They are the instruments of the Soul, for it is through them that subtle Being perceives.

Separated from the Atman, the senses are like bits of wood, quickly consumed, vanishing like the froth on the ocean's breast. When the Jiva, the embodied creature, along with his senses, sinks into sleep, the subtle Atman roams among all the realms of perception like the wind through ethereal space.

During its slumber, it continues to perceive all the fields of the senses just as well as it does when awake. However, without their ability to act during sleep, the senses are stilled in their places, losing their powers like snakes deprived of poison.

At such times, the Atman moves into the respective place of all the senses and fulfils all their functions.

All the qualities of sattva, all the attributes of the intellect, as also those of mind, and space, and wind, and all the characteristics of water, and of earth, the senses with these qualities, Yudhishtira, which adhere to Jivatman, along with the Jivatman itself, are engulfed in Brahman, the Paramatman.

Pious and evil karma, deeds, also overwhelm that Jivatman. Like sishyas waiting upon their guru with reverence, the senses too, wait upon the Jivatman; it reaches Brahman, which is Narayana, the highest, changeless, beyond all the pairs of opposites, and transcends Prakriti.

Freed from both punya and paapa, the Jivatman enters the Paramatman which is nirguna, without all attributes; from this abode of all auspiciousness, it does not return, O Bhaarata. What remains, O son, is the mind with the senses. These have to come back once more at the appointed time to do the bidding of their great master.

Soon after the sloughing off of this body, the Yati striving for moksha, endowed with knowledge and wishing for freedom, succeeds in achieving that eternal peace of mukti, which is his who becomes bodiless.

The Samkhyas, Rajan, are exceedingly wise. They succeed in attaining to the highest end through this kind of knowledge. There is no knowledge that is equal to this gyana. Do not doubt this.

The knowledge described in the system of the Samkhyas is regarded as the highest. That gyana is immutable and is everlasting. It is eternal Brahman in fullness. It has no beginning, middle and end. It transcends all contradictions.

It is the cause of the creation of the universe. It is complete and stands in fullness. It is without any kind of change or decay. It is uniform and perpetual. Thus the wise sing its praises.

From it flow creation and destruction, and all change. The great Rishis speak of it and laud it in the scriptures. All learned Brahmanas and all righteous men regard it to flow from Brahman, supreme, divine, infinite, immutable and undiminishing.

All Brahmanas that are attached to sensual objects adore and praise it by ascribing illusory attributes to it. The same is the view of yogins so observant of tapasya and dhyana, and of the Samkhyas of fathomless insight.

Son of Kunti, the Srutis declare that the Samkhya yoga is the very form of that Formless One. According to it, all cognitive knowledge is the knowledge of Brahman.

There are two kinds of creatures on Bhumi, Lord of the earth—the moving and the immobile, of which the mobile are superior. That supreme gyana which exists in persons conversant with Brahman and that which is contained in the Vedas, that which is found in other scriptures and that in yoga, that which is seen in the diverse Puranas, is all found in Samkhya philosophy.

Whatever knowledge exists in the itihasas and in vigyana, pertaining to the acquisition of wealth as approved by the wise; whatever other knowledge exists in this world—all flows from the lofty gyana of the Samkhyas.

Serenity, puissance, all subtle scriptural knowledge, tapasya of spiritual force, and all kinds of felicity, Rajan, have all been duly ordained in the Samkhya yoga. If they fail to achieve that complete knowledge recommended in their system, the Samkhyas attain the status of deities and pass many years in pleasure and happiness. Reigning over the celestials at will, at the end of the allotted time of their punya, they fall among learned Brahmanas and Yatis.

Like the Devas who ascend into the sky, the truly regenerate Samkhyas cast off this body and enter into the superior state of Brahman by devoting themselves entirely to their philosophy which is revered by all wise men. Faithful to the acquisition of Samkhya gyana, even if they fail to reach that eminence, they never fall among intermediate creatures, or sink to the status of sinful men.

That Mahatman who is fully conversant with the ancient, vast, ocean-like and profound Samkhya doctrines that are pure and tolerant and agreeable, becomes equal to Narayana. I have now told you the truth about the Samkhya yoga. It is the embodiment of Narayana, of the universe as it exists from the earliest time.

When the time of creation arrives, He causes the generation of life, and when the time comes for destruction, he swallows everything. Having withdrawn everything into his own body he falls into sleep, that inner Atman, Soul of the universe.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'What is that state known as Akshaya, the immutable, attaining which no one has to return? What, again, is that which is called Kshaya, decaying, from which one has to return once more? O Mahabaho, tell me the distinction between the two so that I may truly understand them both.

Delighter of the Kurus, Brahmanas who know the Vedas speak of you as an ocean of knowledge. Highly blessed and Mahatman Rishis and Yatis do the same. You now have but very few days to live.

When the sun turns from Dakshinayana, the southern path, to enter Uttarayana, the northern, you will attain to your high end. When you have left us, from whom shall we hear of all that benefits us? You are the lamp of Kuru's race. You shine with the light of knowledge. Perpetuator of the Kuru vamsa, I want to hear all this from you. Listening to your discourses, sweet as amrita, my curiosity in never satisfied but only increases!'

Bhishma says, 'In this regard, I will tell you the ancient story of the conversation that took place between Vasishta and King Karala of Janaka's race.

Once upon a time when that foremost of Rishis, Vasishta, effulgent like the sun, was seated undisturbed, King Janaka asked him about that highest knowledge which is for our supreme good.

Erudite in the domain of Atmagyana and having vast learning in all branches of that science, as Maitravaruni Vasishta was seated at his ease, the king approached him with folded hands; in humble words, sweet and well-spoken and lacking in all contentiousness he asked, "Holy one, I want to know about the Supreme and Eternal Brahman by attaining to which men of wisdom do not have to return.

I also wish to know that which is called Kshaya, destructible, and that into which this universe enters when destroyed. Indeed, what is that which is said to be indestructible, mysterious, beneficial and free from all evil?"

Vasishta said, "Lord of the earth, listen to how this universe is destroyed, and about that which was never and can never be destroyed. According to the measure of the Devas, twelve thousand years make a yuga; four such yugas taken a thousand times, make a kalpa which measures one day of Brahma. Brahma's night, also, Rajan, is of the same duration.

When Brahma himself is destroyed, Sambhu of formless soul, in whom the attributes of Anima and Laghima are inherent awakens, and once more creates that First, most primeval of all creatures, having vast proportions, of infinite deeds, imbued with form, and identifiable with the universe. That Sambhu is also called Isana, the Lord of everything.

He is pure effulgence, and transcends all decay, his hands and feet stretching in all directions, with eyes and head and mouth everywhere, and with ears also in every place. That Being exists, pervading the entire universe.

The eldest-born Being is called Hiranyagarbha. In the Vedanta this Holy One has been called the Buddhi. In the yoga scriptures he is called Mahat, Virinchi, and Aja, the unborn. In the Samkhya scriptures, he is indicated by diverse names, and regarded as having Infinity for his Soul.

With many forms, constituting the soul of the universe, he is regarded as One and immutable. The three infinite worlds have been created by him alone and filled also only by him. In all these forms, he is said to be of Viswarupa, universal form.

In all these variations he creates himself by himself. Filled with great energy, he first creates Consciousness and that Great Being Prajapati endowed with Chit, Consciousness. The manifest, Hiranyagarbha, is created from the unmanifest. This the wise refer to as the creation of knowledge. The creation of Mahat or Virat, and Chetana, by Hiranyagarbha, is the creation of ignorance.

This gives rise to the assigning of attributes worthy of worship and their destruction, what interpreters of the Srutis call avidya and vidya, ignorance and knowledge; after these two, arose, the other of the three—known as Akshara, Hiranyagarbha, or Virat.

Rajan, know, then, that the creation of the subtle elements from consciousness is the third. In all kinds of consciousness, the fourth creation flows from the modification of the third. This fourth creation comprises wind and light, space and water and earth, with their properties of sound, touch, form, taste and smell. This aggregate of ten arises simultaneously.

The fifth creation arises from the combination of these primal elements. This comprises the ear, the skin, the eyes, the tongue, the nose, and speech, and the two hands, the two legs, the anus and the organs of generation.

The first five make up the organs of knowledge, and the last five the organs of action. All these, with the mind, arose simultaneously. These twenty-four exist in the bodies of all living creatures.

By understanding these properly, Brahmanas with insight into the truth never have to yield to sorrow. In the three worlds a combination of these, called the sarira, body, is possessed by all embodied creatures.

Indeed, Rajan, this combination is known as such in Devas and Manavas and Danavas, and Yakshas and Gandharvas and Kinnaras, and Nagas, and Charanas and Pisachas, in divine Rishis and Rakshasas, in biting flies, and worms, and gnats, and vermin born of filth, rats and dogs, and Swapakas and Chaineyas, and Chandalas and Pukkasas, in elephants and horses, donkeys and tigers, and trees and cows.

All creatures that exist in water or space or on earth, for there is no other place in which creatures exist as we have heard, have this combination. All these, the manifest, are destroyed every day, and day after day. Hence, all creatures produced by a union of these twenty-four are said to be Kshaya, destructible.

This then is the Akshaya. And since the universe, made up of Vyakta and Avyakta, decays, it is said to be destructible. The very Being called Mahat who is the eldest-born is always spoken of as Kshaya.

I have now told you, O king, all that you asked me. Beyond these twenty-four, is the twenty-fifth called Vishnu. That Vishnu, because he is nirguna, is not a subject of gyana though, as he pervades all the tattvas, he has been called so by the wise. Since that which is destructible has created all that is manifest, all this has form.

The twenty-fourth, Prakriti, is said to preside over all that has sprung from her variations. The twenty-fifth, which is Vishnu, is formless and, therefore, cannot be said to activate or enliven the universe.

That unmanifest Prakriti, which, in union with Chit, is endowed with a body dwells in the hearts of all creatures with bodies. Eternal Chetana, the Akshaya, although he is without attributes and without form, assumes all variations as a consequence of a union with Prakriti.

When he unites with Prakriti, which has the attributes of birth and death, he, the Purusha, also assumes these qualities. From such a union he becomes an object of perception even though in reality he is without all attributes.

It is in this way that the Mahat, Hiranyagarbha, fuses with Prakriti and suffused with avidya, ignorance, undergoes changes and becomes conscious of selfhood, ahamkara. As a result of his forgetfulness and becoming involved in ignorance, uniting with the gunas of sattva, rajas and tamas, He becomes identified with diverse creatures belonging to diverse orders of being.

As a result of his birth and death arising from the fact of his dwelling with Prakriti, he thinks himself to be what he seemingly appears to be. Regarding himself as this or that, he assumes and follows the attributes of sattva, rajas and tamas.

Under the influence of tamas, he attains those states that are shaped by tamas. Under the influence of rajas and sattva, he similarly acquires the conditions influenced by rajas and sattva.

There are three colours in all—white, red and black. All these colours pertain to Prakriti; according to the nature of Prakriti he is identified with for the time, he becomes white or red or black.

Through tamas one goes to hell. Through rajas one acquires and remains in the state of humanity. Through sattva, people ascend to Devaloka and share in great felicity. By sinning continuously one sinks into the intermediate order of beings. By acting both righteously and immorally, one attains the status of the gods.

Thus, the wise say, Akshara, the indestructible, by union with Prakriti, the unmanifest, is transformed into Kshara, destructible. By means of gyana, knowledge, however, the indestructible is once more apparent in his true nature."'

Bhishma continues, ‘Vasishta said, “As a result of his forgetfulness, the Atman pursues ignorance and obtains thousands of bodies one after another. He attains thousands of births among the intermediate orders and sometimes even among the Devas because of his union with particular gunas and the power of those attributes.

From the state of humanity he goes to Swargaloka, and from heaven he returns to humanity, and again from humanity he sinks into Yamaloka for many long years. Just as the worm that spins the cocoon shuts itself completely within the very threads it weaves, the Soul, too, though nirguna, free of all attributes, in reality, acquires these gunas and deprives himself of freedom.

Though in his real nature he transcends both joy and sorrow, in this way he subjects himself to pleasure and despair. Thus, although he is beyond all disease, the Soul regards himself to be afflicted by pain in the head, eyes and teeth, suffering in the throat and abdomen, and by burning thirst, and enlargement of glands, and cholera, and vitiligo, and leprosy, and burns, and asthma and phthisis, and epilepsy, and all other diseases that afflict the bodies of living creatures.

He considers himself to be born wrongly among thousands of beings in the intermediate orders, and sometimes among the Devas; he bears suffering and also enjoys the fruits of his good deeds.

Steeped in ignorance, he regards himself as robed sometimes in white cloth and sometimes in a full dress of four pieces, or as lying on floors instead of on beds, or with hands and feet contracted like those of frogs, or as seated upright in the yogic posture of dhyana.

At other times, he sees himself as covered in rags or lying or sitting under the canopy of the sky, or within mansions built of bricks and stone or on rugged stones or on ashes, or on the bare earth or on beds or on battlefields, or in water or in swamps, or on wooden planks or on diverse kinds of beds.

Goaded on by desire of benefits, he sees himself as clad in a kaupina made of grass or totally naked, or robed in silk or in the skin of the black antelope, or in cloth made of flax, or in sheep-skin or in tiger-skin, or in lion-skin or in fabric of hemp, or in barks of trees or in cloths made from the skins of prickly plants, or in attire made of threads woven by worms, or in torn rags or in other countless kinds of garments, too many to describe.

The Soul regards himself also as wearing a variety of ornaments and jewels, or as eating diverse kinds of food. He regards himself as sometimes eating at intervals of one night, or once at the same hour every day, or at the fourth, the sixth and the eighth hour every day, or once in six or seven or eight nights, or once in ten or twelve days, or once in a month.

He also sees himself as eating only roots, or fruits, or surviving on air or water alone, or on cakes of sesame husk, or curds or cowdung, or the urine of the cow, or herbs or flowers or moss, or raw food, or just on leaves fallen from trees or fruits that lie on the ground, or other kinds of food—driven by the desire of achieving ascetic success.

The Soul regards himself as observing Chandrayana according to the scriptural rites, or other vows and ceremonies, and the duties prescribed for the four asramas of life, and even derelictions of duty, and the duties of other subsidiary modes of life included in the four principal ones, and the many kinds of practices that are signs of the wicked and sinful.

The Soul regards himself as enjoying secluded places and delightful shades of mountains, and the cool banks of streams and fountains, and solitary riversides and sheltered forests, and sacred groves of the gods, and lakes and waters withdrawn from the busy haunts of men, and isolated mountain caves providing the shelter that houses and mansions do.

The Soul regards himself as employed in the recitation of different kinds of hidden mantras or as observing various vows and laws and different kinds of penances, and a variety of sacrifices and rituals.

The Soul sees himself as sometimes assuming the ways of traders and merchants, sometimes the practices of Brahmanas and Kshatriyas and Vaisyas and Sudras, and also making many kinds of gifts made to those that are destitute, blind or helpless.

As an outcome of being affected by ignorance, the Soul adopts the attributes of sattva, rajas and tamas, and dharma, artha and kama. Influenced by Prakriti, the Soul himself undergoes modification, observes, adopts and practises all these myriad forms and changes, and regards himself as being them all.

Indeed, the Soul recites the sacred mantras Svaha and Svadha and Vashat, and bows to his superiors; he considers himself as officiating at the sacrifices of others, as teaching sishyas, making gifts and accepting them, performing sacrifices and studying the scriptures, and engaging himself in all other karmas and kriyas of this kind.

The Soul regards himself as concerned with birth and death, disputes and killing. All these, the learned say, constitute the paths of dharma and adharma. It is the Goddess Prakriti who causes birth and death.

When the time for the Pralaya, universal destruction, approaches, all existing objects and attributes are withdrawn by the Paramatman which then exists alone like the sun withdrawing his rays at dusk; when the time for creation arrives, he once again creates and sends them forth as the sun his rays at dawn. Thus the Atman at play repeatedly regards himself invested with all these conditions, which are his own infinite forms and aspects, his maya, his leela, so pleasing to himself.

In this way the Soul, though really transcending the three gunas, becomes attached to the path of karma and creates Prakriti invested with the attributes of birth and death and identical with all deeds and works characterised by the three gunas of sattva, rajas and tamas.

Once on the path of karma, the Atman knows that particular acts have special characteristics and produce specific results. Rajan, the whole of this universe, with all things in it, has been blinded by Prakriti and overwhelmed by rajas and tamas.

The Soul, being invested by Prakriti, repeatedly gives rise to these gunas that produce all the pairs of opposites, dvesha and advesha, joy and suffering, pleasure and pain, and the rest. In consequence of this ignorance, the Jiva considers these sorrows to be his and imagines them as pursuing him.

Through that ignorance the Jiva imagines he should somehow move beyond those sorrows, and, finding Devaloka, enjoy the felicity that awaits all his good deeds. It is through ignorance that he thinks he should enjoy these delights of heaven and endure the woes here in samsara, this world.

Through ignorance the Jiva thinks: I should secure my happiness. By continually doing good deeds, I may have happiness till the end of this life and I shall be happy in all my future lives. My sins, though, may earn me unending anguish.

The human condition is fraught with great misery, for from it one sinks into naraka. From naraka, it will take many long years before I can return to a human condition. From being human I shall once more rise to attain to swarga. From that superior state I will have to come back again to being human only to sink again into hell.

One who always regards this combination of the primal elements and the senses, with the reflection of Chit in it, to be thus invested with the characteristics of the Soul, repeatedly wanders among the gods and men and sinks into demonic tenures in hell. Filled with the ideas of me and mine, the Jiva is forced to make an interminable round of such births.

The Jiva must endure millions upon millions of births in the successive forms he assumes, all of which are mortal. He who lives and acts in this manner, the way fraught with good and evil consequences, has to take successive births, forms and deaths in the three worlds, and to enjoy and endure the fruits of his good deeds and his sins.

It is Prakriti that generates good and evil karma; and it is Prakriti that enjoys and suffers their consequences in the three worlds. Indeed, Prakriti follows the course of karma.

The state of the intermediate beings, of humans, and of the gods as well, originate in Prakriti, she who is regarded as nirguna, without attributes. Her existence is affirmed only because of her doings, beginning with Mahat.

In the same manner, the existence of Purusha, the Soul, though without qualities himself, is affirmed by his reflection in the acts of the body. Although the Soul is not subject to any kind of change and is the active principle setting Prakriti into motion, yet he enters a body with all its senses of cognition and action, and regards all these as his own.

The five senses of knowledge begin with the ear, and those of action begin with speech—these unite with the attributes of sattva, rajas and tamas to become engaged and embroiled in their numerous objects. The Jiva imagines that it is he who is the doer, and that the senses belong to him, though in reality he has no senses.

Without form, he imagines he has a body. Though bereft of gunas, he thinks he is imbued with them, and though transcending time, envisions himself to be under time's control.

Though lacking in cognisance, he regards himself as filled with it, and though transcending the twenty-four subjects of the senses and the mind, he considers that he is one among them. Though immortal, he deems himself mortal, and though motionless believes himself to be an active being.

Without a material body, he still thinks he possesses one, and though unborn he regards himself as endowed with birth. Though transcending tapasya, he sees himself engaged in penances, and though he has no goals to strive for, he still thinks that he must achieve a variety of ends.

Without birth and movement, he deems himself to have both, and though beyond fear, believes that he is subject to it. Though indestructible, he sees himself as mortal. Invested with ignorance, the Soul thinks thus of himself."'

CANTO 305

Bhishma says, 'Vasishta said, "Thus, as a result of his ignorance and his association with others who are shrouded by ignorance, the Jiva has to take millions and millions of births, each one ending in dissolution. The consequence of his transformation into Chit invested with ignorance is that the Jiva is born into millions of bodies, among intermediate beings and men and the gods, all of which will end in being destroyed.

On account of avidya, ignorance, the Jiva, like Chandramas, the moon, has to wax and wane thousands and thousands of times. This is truly the nature of the Jiva when invested with ignorance.

Know that Chandramas has in reality sixteen parts. Of these only fifteen increase and decrease. The sixteenth, that portion which remains invisible and appears on the night of the new moon, remains unchanging, constant.

Like Chandramas, the Jiva too has sixteen parts. Only fifteen of these, namely, Prakriti with Chetana's reflection, the ten senses of knowledge and action, and the four inner faculties, appear and disappear. The sixteenth, that is, Chit in its purity is not subject to any change.

Endowed with ignorance, the Jiva is repeatedly and continually born into these fifteen portions. With these births, the eternal and immutable portion in the Jiva, the primal essence, becomes united with the fifteen, and this union takes place repeatedly. That sixteenth portion is subtle. It is also known as Soma, eternal and immutable. It is never upheld by the senses. On the other hand, the senses are sustained by it. Rajan, since those sixteen are the cause of the birth of creatures, no creature can be born without them. They are called Prakriti. The final end of the Jiva's propensity to be united with Prakriti is called moksha mukti.

The Mahat-Soul, which is the twenty-fifth part the unmanifest, must repeatedly assume bodies of the sixteen divisions. The Soul, which is pure, becomes sullied since it is embroiled in avidya, dark unknowing that which is in reality pristine and untainted, becomes impure from being involved with what is both pure and unclean…

Devoted thus to ignorance, the Jiva, though essentially characterised by knowledge, becomes repeatedly associated with ignorance. Though free from every kind of flaw, yet in consequence of its bonding with the three gunas of Prakriti, it becomes itself steeped in them.'"

'Janaka said, "O holy one, it has been said that the relation between the male and the female is like that which exists between Purusha, the indestructible, and Prakriti, the destructible.

Without a male, a female of any species cannot conceive. Without a female, a male also cannot create form. The forms of living creatures flow out of their union with each other. This is so with all orders of living beings.

Living creatures are born through sexual union, each depending upon the attributes of the other, and in their fertile seasons. I shall tell you about these. Listen to which are the traits that belong to the sire and which to the mother.

Bones, muscles, sinews and marrow, O regenerate one, we know to be derived from the man. Skin, flesh and blood, we know are drawn from the mother. We read about this in the Vedas and other scriptures.

What can be read as stated in the Vedas and other scriptures can be taken on authority. The authority of the Vedas and other consistent scriptures is eternal. Moksha cannot exist if Prakriti and Purusha are always joined in this way by both opposing and depending on the other's attributes.

Holy One, you have a spiritual vision that enables you to see all things as if they are present before your very eyes. If you know of any direct evidence of the existence of moksha, speak to me about it. We desire to attain it. Indeed, we wish to realise that which is auspicious, formless, not subject to decay, eternal beyond the reach of the senses, indeed, supreme."

Vasishta said, "What you say about what the Vedas and the other scriptures say in this matter is true. You have understood as they should be.

However, you are only familiar with the texts of the Vedas and the other shastras. You are not, Rajan, truly conversant with the real meaning of those scriptures.

One who understands merely the texts without knowing with their inner meaning, knows them in vain. Indeed, he who memorises the contents of a work without comprehending their meaning bears a useless burden.

On the other hand, he who gleans the true meaning of a treatise is said to have studied it with actual purpose. Questioned about the meaning of a text, it is fitting for him to explain that meaning acquired by careful study.

It is an unintelligent man who refuses to elucidate the meanings of texts in an assembly of the learned; indeed such a man never succeeds in expounding them properly. An ignorant person trying to explain the true meaning of treatises incurs ridicule. Even those who have knowledge of the Atman are mocked on such occasions if they try to explain something that has not been acquired through proper study.

Listen now to me, Rajan, on the subject of mukti that has been expounded by gurus to sishyas since the most ancient times among Mahatmans with the gyana of the Samkhya and the yoga systems of philosophy.

What the yogin beholds is that which the Samkhyas attain. He who knows the Samkhya and the yoga systems to be one and the same is deemed wise. Skin, flesh, blood, fat, bile, marrow, and muscles, and the senses of both knowledge and action, about which you speak, do exist. Objects flow from objects; the senses from the senses. From the body one acquires a body, as a seed is obtained from a seed.

When the Paramatman, the Supreme Being, is without senses, without seed, without matter, without body, He must be without all attributes, nirguna.

Akasa and the other elements arise from the gunas of sattva and rajas and tamas, and disappear ultimately into them. Thus they are born from Prakriti. Skin, flesh, blood, fat, bile, marrow, bones and muscles, these eight arisen from Prakriti, may sometimes be produced by the vital seed of the male alone.

The Jiva and the universe both partake of Prakriti characterised by the three gunas. The Paramatman, the Supreme Soul, is apart from both the Jiva and the universe. Just like the passing seasons may be inferred from the appearance of certain fruits and flowers, Prakriti, too, though formless, can be inferred from the attributes of Mahat and the rest that spring from it.

The existence of Chaitanya in the body allows the Paramatman, without any gunas and perfectly pristine, to be inferred. Without beginning and without end, the foremost and most auspicious, that Paramatman is endowed with these elements as a result of its apparently identifying itself with the body and other gunas, as if in play.

Those who truly know these gunas recognise that only the ephemeral objects can be invested with sattva, rajas and tamas. That which transcends all attributes can have none. When the Jiva overcomes all the gunas born of Prakriti, only then does it gaze upon the Supreme Soul.

Only the highest Rishis conversant with the Samkhya, and true yogins know the Paramatman, which all the diverse philosophies and their adherents agree is beyond the Buddhi, the intellect which is regarded as the knower. He is endowed with the highest wisdom for he has cast off all consciousness of identification with Prakriti.

He transcends ignorance, is unmanifest, is nirguna beyond all attributes, and is called the Supreme. Dissociated from all gunas, he ordains all things, and is eternal and immutable. He surpasses Prakriti and all that is born of Prakriti; indeed transcending the twenty-four subjects that constitute enquiry, he forms the twenty-fifth.

When the wise, who stand in fear of birth, of the many conditions of living consciousness and of death, succeed in knowing the unmanifest, they gain understanding of the Supreme Soul at the same time. An intelligent man regards the union of the Jiva with the Paramatman as due and fitting, and consistent with the scriptures; the foolish man regards the two as being distinct from each other. This is the difference between the man of intelligence and he who lacks it.

The indications of both Kshara, the destructible, and Akshara, the indestructible, have now been expounded to you. Akshara is Oneness or unity, while Kshara denotes multiplicity, diversity. When one studies and properly understands the twenty-five subjects of enquiry, only then does one comprehend that the Oneness of the Atman is in accord with the scriptures, while its multiplicity is in opposition to them.

These are the many signs of what is included in the account of the created and what transcends that account. The wise have stated that there are only twenty-five themes to the entire tale of creation. Transcending these, and beyond those, forms the twenty-sixth.

The comprehension of these twenty-five created subjects, according to their aggregates of five, is the study of material elements. Transcending these is that which is eternal.'"

CANTO 307

'Janaka said, "O foremost of Rishis, you have said that unity is the attribute of Akshara, the indestructible, and variety or multiplicity is the attribute of Kshara, the destructible. I have not yet clearly understood the nature of these two. Doubts still lurk in my mind.

Ignorant men look upon the Atman, the Soul, as imbued with the phenomenon of multiplicity. Wise men know it to be one and undivided. My intellect is dull, and so I am bewildered and unable to comprehend all this. My restless intellect has made me almost forget the causes you assigned for the unity of Akshara and the multiplicity of Kshara. I want you to once more instruct me on unity and multiplicity, on him who is knowing, on what is without knowledge, on the Jiva, vidya, avidya, Akshara, Kshara, and on the systems of Samkhya and yoga, in detail, individually and frankly."

'Vasishta said, "I will tell you what you ask. Listen to me, Rajan, as I expound to you the practices of yoga separately. An obligatory practice with yogins, dhyana, contemplation, is their highest power. Those conversant with yoga say that contemplation is of two kinds. One is the concentration of the mind, and the other is pranayama, the regulation of breath. Pranayama is said to have physicality while the pure concentration of mind is without it.

Except for the three times when a man urinates, defecates and eats, he should devote all his time to dhyana. Withdrawing the senses from the objects of their perception, through the mind, an intelligent man, having purified himself with the twenty-two ways of pranayama, unites the Jivatma with that which transcends the twenty-fourth subject, namely Prakriti, which is also ignorance, the Paramatman which, according to the wise, dwells in every part of the body, and thereby transcends decay and death.

We have heard that it is through those twenty-two methods that the Soul may always be known. Only one whose mind is free of sinful passions can engage in this practice of yoga. No other may.

Detached, abstemious in diet, and controlling all the senses, one should fix one's mind on the Atman; O king of Mithila, during the first and the last part of the night, having subdued the senses, quieted the mind by Buddhi, the understanding, one should assume a posture as still as a stone.

When men of knowledge, who know the laws of yoga, become as fixed as a post of wood, and as immovable as a mountain, they are said to be in yoga, communion. When one does not hear, or smell, or taste, or see, when one is not conscious of any touch, when one's mind becomes perfectly free from every purpose, when one is not conscious of anything, when one cherishes no thought, when one becomes like a block of wood, then one is in perfect yoga.

In this state one burns like a lamp where there is no wind, steadily; at such a time one is freed even from one's sukshma sarira, one's subtle form, and perfectly united with Brahman. When one has achieved this, one no longer ascends or falls among intermediate beings.

When we say that there has been a complete identification of the knower, the known, and knowledge, then is the yogin said to behold the Supreme Soul. While in yoga, the Paramatman reveals itself in the yogin's heart like a blazing fire, or like the irradiant sun, or like dazzling lightning in the sky.

That Supreme Soul which is unborn and which is the essence of amrita, nectar, that is seen by Mahatman Brahmanas, endowed with wisdom and knowers of the Vedas, is subtler than the subtle and greater than the great. Though dwelling in all creatures, that Atman is not perceived by them.

The Creator of the worlds is seen only by one who is rich in the intelligence guided by the lamp of the mind. He dwells beyond tamas, darkness, and transcends even Iswara. Those acquainted with the Vedas and imbued with omniscience call him the dispeller of darkness, transcending darkness, pure, and nirguna.

This is what is called the yoga of yogins. What else marks yoga? Such practices allow yogins to glimpse the Supreme Soul that transcends death and decay.

I have told you about the science of yoga in detail. I will now discourse upon that Samkhya philosophy by which the Paramatman is seen through the gradual destruction of darkness, ignorance and faults.

The Samkhyas, whose system is built on Prakriti, say that Prakriti, which is unmanifest, is foremost. The second principle, Mahat, arises from Prakriti.

We have heard that from Mahat flows the third principle called Chit, Consciousness. The Samkhyas blessed with vision of the Soul say that the five senses of sound, sight, touch, taste and smell flow from Consciousness. All these eight, together, they refer to as Prakriti.

The modifications of these eight are sixteen in number. They are the five gross or material essences, of Akasa, Agni, Bhumi, Jala and Vayu—space, light, earth, water and wind—and the ten senses of action and of knowledge including the mind. Wise men devoted to the path of Samkhya, and who know all its laws and dispensations, regard these twenty-four subjects as encompassing the whole range of Samkhya enquiry.

That which is created is merged into the creating. Created by the Paramatman, one after another, these principles are destroyed in reverse. With every new creation, the gunas come into existence in the order I have told you, and with destruction they merge, each into its Creator, in a reverse order, like the waves of the ocean vanishing into the very ocean that gives them birth. Rajan, this is the manner in which Prakriti is created and destroyed.

The Supreme Being is all that remains at the time of Pralaya, and it is he that assumes multifarious forms when creation breaks into life. This is what men of knowledge have established.

It is Prakriti that causes Purusha to assume diversity and then revert to unity. Prakriti herself also has the same indications. Those who know the nature of the themes of enquiry know that Prakriti also assumes the same kind of diversity and unity; when destruction is at hand she reverts into unity and when creation flows she assumes diversity of form.

The Atman makes Prakriti, which contains the principles of creation or growth, and acquires manifold forms. Prakriti is called Kshetra, the field in which karma is sown, also identified as the body. Transcending the twenty-four principles of nature is the Atman, Soul, which is great. It, the Kshetrajna or knower of the field, presides over Prakriti or Kshetra.

Thus, the foremost of Yatis say that the Soul is the controller. He is so regarded as he presides over all kshetras. Aware of that unmanifest Kshetra, he is also called Kshetrajna, the Knower of Kshetra. And because the Atman enters into unmanifest Kshetra, the body, he is called Purusha. Kshetra is distinct from Kshetrajna. Kshetra is unmanifest.

The Soul, which transcends the twenty-four subjects, is called the Knower. Knowledge and the object known are discrete. Knowledge has been said to be unmanifest, while the object of knowledge is the Soul which transcends these principles.

The unmanifest is called Kshetra, sattva, Mahat, and also Iswara, the Supreme One, while Purusha is the twenty-fifth, unsurpassed, principle; though regarded a subject, it is not one, for it transcends them all. This, Rajan, is an account of the Samkhya philosophy.

The Samkhyas see the cause of the universe, and merging all the grosser principles into the Chit, gaze upon the Paramatman, the Supreme Soul. Studying the twenty-four subjects properly, along with Prakriti, and determining their true nature, the Samkhyas succeed in beholding that which transcends these twenty-four principles.

In reality the Jivatma is that very Soul which transcends Prakriti and is beyond the twenty-four principles. When he succeeds in knowing that Paramatman by dissociating himself from Prakriti, he then merges into that, the Supreme Soul.

I have now told you everything about the Samkhya yoga, in all its aspects. Those who know these doctrines succeed in attaining direct cognisance of Brahman. They achieve peace and tranquillity.

Indeed, as men whose understanding have direct awareness of Brahman, reach that state from which they do not have to return to this world after the dissolution of their bodies, those that are said to be emancipated in this life, they attain the great power and ineffable felicity of Samadhi, and immutability, through attaining the nature of Akshara, the indestructible.

They who perceive this universe as many instead of as one and unified are said to see falsely. These men are blind to Brahman. O Parantapa, such men have repeatedly to return to the world and assume bodies in the diverse orders of being. Those who realise the Brahman become omniscient, and when they pass from this body they are free forever of all physical forms.

All things, the entire universe, are said to be the result of the unmanifest. The Atman, which is the twenty-fifth tattva, transcends all things. They who know it, the Soul, have no fear of returning to the world.'"

'Vasishta said, "I have discoursed to you thus far on the Samkhya philosophy. Now I will tell you what is vidya, knowledge, and what is avidya, ignorance. The learned say that that Prakriti, which is fraught with the attributes of creation and destruction, is called avidya; while Purusha, who is free from these and who transcends the twenty-four tattvas, is called vidya.

Listen to me first as I speak to you on the nature of vidya among the other successive concepts in the Samkhya philosophy.

Among the senses of knowledge and those of action, the senses of knowledge are said to constitute vidya. We have heard that vidya comprises the senses of knowledge and the objects of their perception. The wise say that of the objects of the senses and the mind, the mind constitutes vidya. Between the mind and the five subtle essences, the latter make up vidya. Of the five subtle essences and Consciousness, consciousness is vidya. Of Chit and Mahat, the latter, O king, is vidya. Of all the principles beginning with Mahat and Prakriti, it is Prakriti, unmanifest and supreme, that is regarded as vidya.

Of Prakriti, and that called Vidhi which is Supreme, Vidhi should be known as vidya. Transcending Prakriti is the twenty-fifth principle, called Purusha, who should be known as vidya. Of all knowledge that which is the object of knowledge has been said to be the unmanifest, Rajan.

Again, knowledge has been said to be unmanifest and the object of knowledge to be that which transcends the twenty-four. I repeat, knowledge is unmanifest, and the Knower is that which transcends the twenty-four.

I have now told you the true significance of vidya and avidya. Listen now as I tell you about the indestructible and the destructible. Both the Jiva and Prakriti have been said to be indestructible, and both of them have been said to be destructible. I will tell you why this is so, as I have understood it.

Both Prakriti and the Jiva are without beginning and without end, without birth and without death. With regards to creation, both are regarded as supreme. As a consequence of its attributes of repeated creation and destruction, the unmanifest Prakriti, is called Akshara, indestructible. That unmanifest is continually modified, in order to create the evolutes. And because the principles beginning with Mahat are produced by Purusha as well, and also because Purusha and the Avyakta are mutually dependent upon each other, therefore is Purusha also, the twenty-fifth, called Kshetra, Akshara, indestructible.

When the yogin withdraws and merges all the principles into the unmanifest Brahman, then along with all the others, the twenty-fifth evolute, the Jiva or Purusha, also dissolves into it. When the principles merge, each into its Creator, then the one that remains is Prakriti.

When Kshetrajna too, O son, vanishes into what produces him, all that remains is Brahman; thus, Prakriti along with all its evolutes becomes Kshara, is destroyed, and becomes nirguna, and attains to the condition of being without attributes, from becoming detached from all the tattvas.

We have heard that Kshetrajna, when his knowledge of Kshetra disappears, becomes devoid of gunas, attributes. When he becomes Kshara he takes on gunas.

When, however, he attains to his own real nature, he succeeds in understanding his own condition of truly being nirguna. By casting off Prakriti and beginning to realise that he is different from her, the intelligent Kshetrajna comes to be regarded as pristine and taintless.

When the Jiva no longer exists in a state of union with Prakriti, then he becomes identifiable with Brahman. While he remains united with Prakriti, he remains distinct from Brahman. Indeed, when the Jivatman shows no attachment for Prakriti and her tattvas, he then succeeds in beholding the Supreme; having once beheld him he wishes that he not fall away from that felicity.

When the knowledge of truth dawns upon him, the Jiva begins to lament: Alas, my ignorance and foolishness have made me fall into this mesh of Prakriti, like a fish entangled in a net.

Through ignorance I have migrated from body to body like a fish from water to water thinking that this in the only element in which it can live. Just as a fish does not know anything other than water to be its natural element, I also have never known anything other than my own family, my children and wives. Shame on me that through ignorance I have been repeatedly wandering from body to body forgetful of the Paramatman.

The Paramatman alone is my friend. I have the capacity for friendship with him. Whatever be my nature and whoever I may be, I am able to be like him and to merge with him. I see my similarity with him. I am indeed, like him. He is pure, untainted. It is clear that I am of the same nature.

Through ignorance and torpor, I have become associated with inanimate Prakriti. Though really detached, I have passed this long time in a state of attachment with Prakriti. Alas, without being aware of it, I have so long been subdued by her.

Prakriti assumes various forms: high, middling and low. Oh, how will I dwell in those forms? How will I live conjointly with her? It is on account of my ignorance that I repair to her companionship.

I will now immerse myself in Samkhya or yoga. I will no longer keep her companionship. When I consider how long I have been with her, I think that I have been too long deceived by her, for being really unchanging and free myself, how could I keep company with one that is subject to constant change?

But she cannot be held responsible for this. The blame is mine, since turning away from the Paramatman I freely became attached to her. In consequence of that attachment, though in reality formless I have had to live in multifarious forms.

Though formless by nature I am endowed with forms because of my sense of me and mine, and thereby disturbed and agitated. As a result of my false sense of selfhood in Prakriti, I am forced to take birth in diverse orders of being.

Alas, though without any true sense of ego, yet in consequence of affecting it, I have sinned in a myriad of ways in those orders in which I took birth while I remained in them as a Jivatman who had lost all true knowledge. I will no longer have anything to do with her whose essence is consciousness, who divides herself into many and who seeks to bind me with these many.

Only now have I been awakened and have understood that I am by nature without any sense of ego and without that consciousness which creates the forms of Prakriti that appear all around. Discarding that ego, with respect to her and whose essence is made up of consciousness, and casting off Prakriti herself, I shall take refuge in him who is auspicious.

I shall be united with him, and not with Prakriti which is essentially without reality. It will be to my benefit if I unite with him for I share no true similarity of nature with Prakriti.

The twenty-fifth principle, which is the Jivatman, when he thus succeeds in understanding the Paramatman, is able to cast off the Kshara, the mortal, and merge with that which is Akshara, immortal, the essence of all that is auspicious. In reality, the Jiva is nirguna and Avyakta, without attributes and unmanifest, but becomes invested with what is Vyakta, manifest, and assumes gunas.

O lord of Mathura, when he succeeds in gazing upon that which is nirguna and which is the source of the unmanifest, he achieves union with it.

I have told you the indications of what is indestructible and what is destructible, according to the best of my knowledge of what has been expounded in the scriptures. I shall now speak to you about what I have heard as to how knowledge that is subtle, stainless and certain arises. Listen to me.

I have already discoursed to you on the features of the Samkhya and the yoga systems of philosophy as described in their respective texts. Indeed, the science that has been explained in the Samkhya treatises is identical with what has been laid down in the yoga shastras.

Rajan, the knowledge which the Samkhyas preach can enlighten everyone. In the Samkhya doctrines that knowledge has been explicated for the benefit of its disciples. The learned say that this Samkhya system is extensive. Yogins have great regard for this system as also for the Vedas.

In the Samkhya philosophy no subject transcending the twenty-fifth is accepted. I have duly described to you the highest principles of the Samkhyas. In the yoga philosophy, it is said that Brahman, the essence of knowledge without duality, Advaita, becomes the Jiva only when suffused with ignorance. The yoga scriptures speak of both Brahman and Jivatman.'" Bhishma says, ‘Vasishta said, “I will now discourse to you on Buddha, the Supreme Soul, and Abuddha, the Jiva which is the dispensation of the attributes of sattva, rajas, and tamas.

Under the influence of maya, illusion, the Paramatman, becoming the Jiva, assumes myriad forms and comes to regard them all as real. As a consequence of regarding himself indistinguishable from such transformations, the Jivatman fails to understand the Supreme Soul, for he bears the gunas of sattva and rajas and tamas, creating and drawing into himself what he creates.

O Rajan, the Jiva undergoes ceaseless changes for his sport, and because he is capable of understanding the action of the Avyakta, the unmanifest, he is called Buddhyamana, the comprehender.

The unmanifest or Prakriti can never comprehend Brahman which is, in reality, nirguna, without attributes, even when it manifests itself with gunas. Hence Prakriti is called unintelligent. The Srutis declare that if ever Prakriti does succeed in knowing the twenty-fifth tattva, the Jiva, Prakriti will then be identified and united with the Jiva, instead of being apart from It.

However Prakriti can never comprehend the Paramatman, which is ever detached and which transcends the twenty-fifth evolute. As a result of his attachment to and union with Prakriti, the Jiva or Purusha, who in his real nature is unmanifest and not subject to change, comes to be called the unawakened or ignorant.

Indeed, because the twenty-fifth tattva can realise the Avyakta, the unmanifest, that he is called Buddhyamana, or comprehender. He cannot, however, easily grasp the twenty-sixth, which is stainless, which is knowledge without duality, immeasurable and eternal.

The twenty-sixth tattva, however, can know both the Jiva and Prakriti, who are the twenty-fifth and the twenty-fourth principles respectively. O radiant son, only the wise succeed in knowing that Brahman which is unmanifest, which inheres in its real nature in all that is seen and unseen, and which is the one independent essence in the universe.

When the Jiva considers himself distinct from, and other than what he truly is, when he thinks of himself as fat or lean, fair or dark, a Brahmana or a Sudra, it is only then that he fails to recognise the Supreme Soul and himself, and Prakriti with which he is united.

When the Jiva succeeds in understanding Prakriti, and knowing that she is something apart and different from him, only then is he restored to his true nature and attains to that exalted knowledge which is pure and untainted and which is of Brahman. When the Jiva reaches that highest understanding, he then attains to that pure and non-dual knowledge, which is the twenty-sixth principle, Brahman.

He then casts off the manifest, Prakriti fraught with the attributes of creation and destruction. When the Jiva recognises Prakriti, unintelligent and subject to the influence of sattva, rajas and tamas, he then becomes nirguna, without attributes himself.

When he understands that the unmanifest is different from him, he acquires the nature of the Paramatman, the Supreme Soul. The learned say that when the Jiva is freed from the attributes of sattva and rajas and tamas, and united with the Supreme Soul, he becomes identified with that Soul.

The Paramatman is called tattva as well as atattva, and transcends decay and death. O bestower of honours, the Soul, despite resting in the body, with its manifest principles, cannot be said to have acquired the nature of those principles.

The wise say that there are in all twenty-five principles, including the Jivatman. Indeed the Soul does not possess either Consciousness or any other principle. Invested with pure intelligence, it transcends the tattvas. It quickly discards even that principle which is the indication of the knowing or awakened one.

When the Jiva considers himself as the twenty-sixth being, not subject to decay and death, he succeeds through his own light in attaining identity with that twenty-sixth. Though awakened by the twenty-sixth, pure intelligence, the Jiva still becomes subject to ignorance. This is the cause of the Jiva's myriad forms as explained in the Srutis and the Samkhya scriptures.

When the Jiva, endowed with Chetana and unintelligent Prakriti, loses all consciousness of a distinct or individual self, then he discards his multifariousness and resumes his oneness. When the Jivatman who lives in joy and suffering, seldom free from the consciousness of self, succeeds in merging with the Paramatman which is beyond the reach of the understanding, he is then liberated from virtue and vice.

Indeed, when the Jiva attains to the twenty-sixth tattva, which is unborn and puissant and apart from all attachments, comprehending it thoroughly, he himself becomes possessed of infinite puissance and entirely casts off Prakriti. Once he understands the twenty-sixth tattva, the first twenty-four lose all significance and worth.

I have now narrated to you, according to the indication of the Srutis, the nature of the Abuddhya or Prakriti, and of the Jiva; I have also told you about that which is pure knowledge, the Paramatman, the Supreme Soul. Guided by the scriptures, variety and oneness are to be thus understood.

The difference between the gnat and the udumbara, or that between the fish and water, illustrates the difference between the Jivatman and Paramatman, the Supreme Soul. The multiplicity and unity of these two are then similarly understood.

This is called emancipation, mukti, this comprehension or knowledge of oneself as something distinct from unintelligent Prakriti. By making him know the unmanifest, the Paramatman, which transcends Buddhi, intellect, the twenty-fifth tattva, which dwells in the bodies of living creatures, is emancipated.

Indeed, that twenty-fifth is capable of achieving moksha in this manner only and by no other means. Though really different from the Kshetra in which he dwells for the time being, he partakes of the nature of that kshetra as a result of his union with it.

Uniting with what is pure, he becomes pure. Merging with the intelligent, he becomes Intelligent. By joining with one that is emancipated, he is liberated. By uniting with one that has been free from every attachment, he too, is freed from all attachment.

By uniting with one striving for mukti, imbibing the nature of his companion, he himself strives for emancipation. By mingling with one of pure deeds he becomes pure, of pure deeds himself, and blazes with effulgence. By uniting with one of unstained Soul, he becomes of unstained Soul himself.

By fusing with the one immaculate and independent Atman, he becomes one and independent. Uniting with the one that is dependent on its own self, he acquires the same nature and attains to freedom.

Rajan, I have duly told you this that is perfectly true. I have honestly discoursed to you on the subject of the eternal and stainless and primeval Brahman. You may impart this high knowledge, able to awaken the Soul, to that person who though not conversant with the Vedas is nevertheless humble and has a keen desire to acquire Brahmagyana, the knowledge of Brahman.

It should never be given to one who is false, or cunning or roguish, or is weak-minded or devious, or to one who is jealous of learned men, or one who gives pain to others. Listen to me as I speak of those to whom this knowledge may safely be divulged. It should be given to one who has faith, who is meritorious, who abstains from speaking ill of others, who is devoted to tapasya from the purest of motives, who is wise, and who knows the sacrifices and other rites laid down in the Vedas.

This knowledge may be revealed to one with a forgiving disposition, who is compassionate and kind to all creatures; or one who is fond of dwelling in solitary quietness, who lives and acts in accord with the scriptures, or to one never given to quarrels and disputes, or one possessed of great learning or one endowed with wisdom, forgiveness, self-restraint and tranquillity of soul.

This high knowledge of Brahman should never be imparted to one who does not possess such qualities. It has been said that there can be no advantage or punya when such knowledge is given to one who is not suited to receiving it. This high knowledge should never be revealed to one who disregards any vows and restraints even if, in exchange, he gives all of Bhumi, the earth, brimming with jewels and diverse wealth as dakshina. However, without doubt, this knowledge should indeed be given to one who has conquered his senses.

O Karala, let no fear be yours any longer, since you have listened to what I have said about the high Brahman. I have told you about the holy Brahman, without beginning, middle and end, and who can dispel all kinds of grief.

Seeing Brahman can dispel both birth and death, O king, the Brahman full of auspiciousness that removes all fear, Brahman who bestows true weal. And having acquired this essence of all knowledge, cast off all error and stupor today. I acquired this gyana from the eternal Hiranyagarbha himself, Rajan, who divulged it to me when I had gratified that great Being of the most superior soul.

Asked by you today, I have imparted to you the knowledge of eternal Brahman, just as I myself acquired it from my guru. Indeed, I have given you this highest knowledge, the Brahmagyana, which is the refuge of all conversant with mukti exactly as I once received it from Brahma himself."'

Bhishma continues, 'I have now told you what the great Rishi Vasishta said to King Karala of the Janaka vamsa, about the twenty-fifth tattva, attaining which the Jiva has never to come back into the world. It is only when the Jivatman does not truly recognise the Paramatman, the Supreme Soul, which is not subject to decay and death that it has to frequently leave and return to this world.

When the Jiva attains to that high knowledge, he has no longer to come back. Having heard it from the Devarishi, I have, O son, discoursed to you on this Brahmagyana from which arises the highest good.

This knowledge was obtained from Hiranyagarbha by the high-souled Rishi Vasishta. From Vasishta, it was acquired by Narada. From Narada I have learnt it, the knowledge that is indeed the eternal Brahman.

O Kurusattama, foremost of Kurus, having heard this discourse of high import, filled with sacred wisdom, do not grieve any longer. That man who knows Kshara and Akshara is free from fear. Only he who is bereft of such knowledge is obliged to cherish fear.

As a result of this ignorance of Brahman, the soul of the foolish man has to repeatedly come back into this world. Dying, he has to be born into thousands upon thousands of orders of being, every one of which ends in death.

Now in the world of the gods, now among men, and now among intermediate orders of being—he must appear again and again. In course of time, if he succeeds in crossing samsara, the ocean of ignorance in which he is plunged, he then succeeds in avoiding rebirth altogether and merges with the Paramatman, the Supreme Soul.

The ocean of ignorance is fearsome and terrible. It is bottomless and called the unmanifest. O Bhaarata, day after day, creatures fall and sink into that sea. Since you, Rajan, have been freed from that eternal, boundless ocean of darkness, you are also liberated from both rajas and tamas.'

CANTO 310

"Bhishma says, 'Once upon a time a king of Janaka's royal house, while hunting for deer in the uninhabited forests, saw a superior Brahmana, a Rishi of Bhrigu's vamsa. Bowing before the Rishi who was seated at his ease, King Vasuman approached him and, when he also sat, with the sage's leave, asked him this question:

"O holy one, tell me what is of the highest benefit, both here and hereafter, to a man who has an unstable body and is the slave of his desires?" Thus questioned, and properly honoured by the king, that Rishi of profound ascetic merit replied with these most beneficial words.

The Rishi said, "If you desire what is agreeable to you both in this world and the next, be self-restrained and abstain from injuring all creatures. Righteousness is beneficial to the virtuous. Dharma is the refuge of those who are good.

The three worlds with their moving and still creatures flow from dharma. You who so eagerly wish to enjoy all pleasures, how is it that you are not yet satiated with the objects of desire? You see the honey, O you of small understanding, but are blind to the fall.

As one who wants to earn the fruits of knowledge should set himself to the acquisition of knowledge, so also one who desires the fruits of dharma should set himself to the acquisition of righteousness.

Desiring virtue, a wicked man finds it impossible to fulfil his desire despite striving to act in a pure and taintless manner. On the other hand, if a good man is impelled by the desire to earn punya, he accomplishes even a difficult deed with ease. Living in the forest, if one acts in a manner so as to delight in the pleasures of a dwelling among men in towns, he is regarded not as a forest recluse but as a townsman. Similarly, while living in towns, if a man desires the felicity enjoyed by a forest recluse, he is considered not a town dweller but a vanaprastha.

Know then the merit of performing and abstaining from religious karma; concentrate on and be devoted to the practices of dharma in thoughts, words and deeds. Ascertain the propriety of time and place, purify yourself by rituals and vows, and when entreated, without malice make endowments to the virtuous.

Acquiring wealth by righteous means, one should offer it to the deserving. One should bestow gifts, discarding anger; and having made these offerings one should neither regret nor extol those gifts with one's own mouth.

The Brahmana who is full of compassion, honest, and whose birth is pure, is one regarded as deserving of gifts. A man is said to be pure in birth when he is born of a mother that has only one husband and who belongs to the same varna as her husband.

Indeed, such a Brahmana, conversant with the three Vedas—Rig, Yajur and Sama—learned, and who observes the six duties of performing yagnas himself, of officiating at those of others, of learning, teaching, offering dana and receiving gifts, is regarded as being worthy of receiving gifts.

Dharma becomes adharma, and unrighteousness becomes righteousness, according to the character of the doer, of time, and of place. Sin is washed away like the dirt on one's body, with a little exertion and more when the effort is greater.

After purging his bowels, a man should take ghee, a tonic which makes his system healthy. In the same manner, having cleansed oneself of all faults, if one sets oneself to acquire dharma, such righteousness will produce the highest happiness in the next world.

Good and evil thoughts exist in the minds of all creatures. Withdrawing the mind from evil thoughts, it should always be directed towards those that are pure. One should always revere one's svadharma, the practices of one's own varna. Strive, then, to act in a manner that you may have faith in the duties of your varna.

O you of impatient soul, undertake the practice of patience. You of small understanding, seek to become endowed with intelligence. Bereft of serenity, seek to be calm; and lacking in wisdom as you are, try to act wisely.

He who moves in the company of the righteous succeeds, through his own efforts, in acquiring the means of accomplishing what is beneficial for him both in this world and the next. Indeed, the root of this benefit is unwavering steadfastness.

The Rajarishi Mahabhisha fell from heaven through want of this firmness. Yayati, also, was boastful and arrogant, exhausted his punya, and was cast down from swarga; he succeeded in regaining the realms of felicity through steadfastness. You will surely attain to great intelligence and your highest good by paying heed to virtuous and learned men of ascetic merit."'

Bhishma continues, 'Hearing these words of the sage, King Vasuman, possessed of a good character, withdrew his mind from the pursuit of desire, and set it upon the acquisition of dharma.'"

Yudhishtira says, ‘It befits you, Pitamaha, to discourse to me on that which is free from dharma and its opposite, which is free from every doubt, which transcends birth and death, as also virtue and sin, which is auspiciousness, eternal fearlessness, indestructible and immutable, which is always pure, and which is ever free from the toil of exertion.’

Bhishma says, ‘In this regard I will narrate to you the ancient story, Bhaarata, of the discourse between Yajnavalkya and Janaka. Long ago, the famous King Daivarati of Janaka’s royal house, fully conversant with the import of all questions, asked this question of Yajnavalkya, that foremost of Rishis.

Janaka said, “O regenerate Rishi, how many kinds of senses are there? How many kinds are there of Prakriti? What is the Avyakta, unmanifest and highest Brahman? What is higher than Brahman? What is birth and what is death? What are the limits of age?

O Dvijottama, instruct me on these subjects; I am ignorant while you are an ocean of knowledge. Truly, I wish to hear you speak on all these matters.”

Yajnavalkya said, “O king, listen to my answers to these questions of yours. I shall impart to you the supreme knowledge valued by yogins and especially that which the Samkhyas possess.

Nothing is unknown to you; still you have asked me. And, on being questioned, one should answer. This is the eternal practice.

Eight main principles, tattvas, have been named as being of Prakriti, while sixteen have been called indriyas, modifications. Of the Vyakta, the manifest, there are seven. These are the views of those conversant with the science of Adhyatma.

The unmanifest, or original Prakriti, Mahat, Consciousness, and the Panchamahabhutas—five suksma or subtle elements of Bhumi, earth; Vayu, air; Akasa, space; Jala, water, and Agni, fire—these eight are together known as Prakriti. The indriyas are certainly manifest or gross, sthula. Listen now to the enumeration of those called indriyas. They are the ear, the skin, the tongue and the nose; and sound, touch, form, taste and scent; as also speech, the two arms, the two feet, the anus and the organs of pleasure and generation.

Amongst these, the ten beginning with sound, and having their origin in the five Panchamahabhutas, the great evolutes, are called Visesha. The five senses of cognition, are called Savisesha. Those who know the Adhyatma vigyana regard the mind, Manas, as the sixteenth.

This is in consonance with your own views and those of other learned men who know these truths.

From the unmanifest, Rajan, springs the Mahat. The wise regard this to be the first Prakriya, creation relating to Pradhana or Prakriti: From Mahat is produced Chit, Consciousness. This has been called the second Prakriya, having Buddhi, the intellect, for its essence.

From Consciousness has sprung Manas, the mind, which is the essence of sabda, sound, and the others that are the attributes of Akasa and the rest. This is the third creation, related to Chit. From Manas have sprung the five great elements. Truly I say, know that this is the fourth Prakriya called sukshma, subtle or spiritual.

Those who know the primordial elements say that sabda, sound, sparsa, touch, rupa, form, rasa, taste, and gandha, scent, are the fifth creation, related to the great primal elements. The creation of the ear, the skin, the tongue and the nose, forms the sixth; this is regarded as having multiplicity of thought for its essence.

After this arise the senses that follow the ear and the others, those of action, karma, O Rajan. This is called seventh Prakriya and relates to the senses of cognition. Then comes prana, the breath that rises upward, followed by samana, udana and vyana, those that have a transverse motion. This is the eighth creation and is called Arjava.

After these breaths that course transversely in the lower parts of the body—samana, udana and vyana—comes that called apana flowing downwards. This ninth creation is also called Arjava, O king.

These nine Prakriyas, and these twenty-four tattvas, I have expounded to you according to what has been laid down in the sacred shastras. Now, O Rajan, listen to me as I tell you about the durations of time as indicated by the learned in respect of these tattvas.'"

CANTO 312

'Yajnavalkya said, "Listen to me, O foremost of men, as I tell you about the duration of time with respect to the unmanifest, the Supreme Purusha. Ten thousand kalpas are said to constitute his single day. Equal is the duration of his night.

When his night passes, he awakes, and first creates herbs and plants that sustain all embodied creatures. He then creates Brahma who springs from a golden egg.

We have heard that Brahma is the form of all created things. Having dwelt for a whole year within that egg, the great ascetic Brahma, also called Prajapati, Lord of all creatures, emerged from it and created Bhumi, the earth, and swarga, the heavens above.

Brahma, then, it is said in the Vedas, placed the sky between; heaven and earth separated from each other. Seven thousand and five hundred kalpas comprise one day of Brahma. Those who know the science of Adhyatma say that his night also is of an equal duration. Brahma, called Mahan, then creates Consciousness, Bhuta, which is unsurpassed in essence.

Before creating any physical bodies out of what are called the Mahabhutas, the Great Elements, Mahan or Brahma, imbued with tapasya, created four others referred to as his sons. They are the sires of the original Pitris.

Rajan, we have also heard that the senses of knowledge along with the four inner faculties, have sprung from the Pitris, the five great elements, and that the entire universe of mobile and immobile Beings has been filled with those Panchamahabhutas.

The puissant Consciousness created the five Bhutas. These are Bhumi, earth; Vayu, air; Akasa, space; Jala, water, and Agni, fire or light. This Consciousness, this Great Being, from whom springs the third Prakriya, creation, has five thousand kalpas for his night, and his day is of equal length.

Sound, touch, form, taste and smell—sabda, sparsa, rupa, rasa and gandha—are called Visesha. They inhere in the five great elements. All creatures are continually pervaded by these five; they desire one another's companionship, become subservient to one another; they challenge and transcend one another; led by these immutable and compelling urges, creatures kill one another and wander in this world entering into numberless orders of being.

Three thousand kalpas represent the duration of their day. Equal is the measure of their night. Manas, the mind, roves over all things, Rajan, led on by the senses. The senses do not themselves perceive anything. It is Manas that perceives through them.

The eye sees forms when helped by the mind but never by itself. When Manas is distracted, the eye fails to see even the objects directly before it. It is commonly held that the senses perceive. This is not true, for it is the mind that perceives through the senses.

When the activity of Manas, the mind, ceases, the cessation of the activity of the senses follows. That is the end of the activity of the senses, which is the end of the mind's activity. One should thus know that the senses are controlled by the mind. Indeed, Manas is the Lord of all the senses. O illustrious king, these are all the twenty Bhutas in the universe."'

'Yajnavalkya said, "I have, in succession, told you the order and duration of the Prakriyas, the creations, and the total number of their various tanmatras or evolutes. Listen now to me as I tell you of their destruction. Listen to how Brahman, who is eternal and undecaying, and who is without beginning and without end, repeatedly creates and destroys all created things and beings.

When his day ends and night comes, he desires sleep. At such a time the unmanifest and Holy One urges the Being called Maharudra, who is conscious of his great powers for destroying the world. Compelled by the Avyakta, Maharudra assumes the form of Surya of countless rays, and divides himself into a dozen amsas each resembling a blazing fire. With his tejas, he then swiftly consumes the four kinds of created beings, the viviparous, oviparous, bacterial and vegetable.

Within moments all mobile and immobile creatures are annihilated, and the whole of Bhumi, the earth, becomes as bare as a tortoise shell. Having burnt everything on the face of Bhumi, Rudra of immeasurable power then inundates it with water of immense force.

He then creates the fire of dissolution, which dries up that Jala into which Bhumi has been dissolved. The water disappears, leaving the Mahabhuta Agni, the fire, to burn fiercely.

Then arises the mighty Vayu, wind of immeasurable force, in his eight forms, who swiftly swallows that inferno of transcendent force, with seven flames, and which is indeed identifiable with the heat existing in every creature. Having consumed that Agni, Vayu courses in every direction, upwards, downwards, and transversely.

Then Akasa, immeasurable space, swallows that wind of transcendent energy. Then Manas, the mind, effortlessly swallows Akasa. Then Consciousness, Chitta, the Soul of everything, consumes Manas.

In his turn, Chitta is swallowed by the Mahat who is and knows the past, the present and the future. The incomparable Mahat, or universe, is then swallowed by Sambhu, that Lord of all things, in whom the attributes of yoga, anima, laghima, prapti, and others, naturally inhere. He is the supreme and immutable light.

His hands and feet extend over every part; his eyes and head and face are everywhere, his ears reach every place; his existence overwhelms all things. He is the heart of all creatures and his measure is of a digit of the thumb!

That Infinite and Supreme Soul, Paramatman, that Lord of all, thus swallows the universe. After this, what remains is the undying and the immutable. That One is flawless, immaculate, the Creator of the past, the present, and the future, and is perfect.

I have thus, O Rajan, told you about the Pralaya, the great destruction. I will now tell you about Adhyatma, Adhibhuta and Adhidaivata.''

'Yajnavalkya said, "Brahmanas conversant with these subjects of enquiry speak of the two feet as Adhyatma, the act of walking as Adhibhuta, and Vishnu as Adhidaivatam of those two limbs. The anus is Adhyatma; its function of ejecting faeces is Adhibhuta, and Mitra, or Surya, is its Adhidaivata.

The organ of generation is called Adhyatma. Its gratifying function is called Adhibhuta, and Prajapati is its Adhidaivata. The hands are Adhyatma; their function as represented by doing is Adhibhuta; and Indra is the Adhidaivata of the hands.

The organs of speech are Adhyatma. The words uttered by them are Adhibhuta; and Agni is their Adhidaivata. The eye is Adhyatma. Rupa, form, is its Adhibhuta; and Surya is the Adhidaivata of that organ. The ear is Adhyatma. Sabda, sound, is Adhibhuta; and the points of the horizon are its Adhidaivata.

The tongue is Adhyatma. Rasa, taste, is its Adhibhuta; and Jala is its Adhidaivata. The nose is Adhyatma. Gandha, scent, is its Adhibhuta; and Bhumi is its Adhidaivata. The skin is Adhyatma. Sparsa, touch, is its Adhibhuta; and Vayu is its Adhidaivata.

Manas has been called Adhyatma; that with which it is exercised is Adhibhuta; and Chandramas is its Adhidaivata. Consciousness, Chitta, is Adhyatma. Conviction in one's identity with Prakriti is its Adhibhuta; and Mahat or Buddhi is its Adhidaivata. Buddhi is Adhyatma. That which is to be understood is its Adhibhuta; and Kshetrajna is its Adhidaivata.

Rajan, I have thus truly expounded to you, who fully know these original tattvas, in detail, one by one, the puissance of Brahman, the Paramatman as he manifests himself in different forms, in the beginning, the middle and the end.

Prakriti, as if for sport, O king, of her own accord, by undergoing modifications, playfully produces thousands upon countless thousands of combinations of her original transformations that are called gunas. As men can light countless lamps from a single one, Prakriti, too, transforms herself and multiplies the three gunas of Purusha—sattva, rajas and tamas—into numberless creations.

The qualities of sattva include patience, joy, prosperity, and satisfaction, the lustrousness of all faculties, happiness, purity, health, contentment, faith, liberality, compassion, forgiveness, steadfastness, benevolence, equanimity, truth and the acquittance of one's svadharma.

Mildness, modesty, calmness, outward purity, simplicity, observance of obligatory customs and practices, dispassion, fearlessness of heart, disregard for the appearance of banishment of good and evil as also for past deeds, accepting only what is offered as a gift, the absence of greed, concern for others, compassion for all creatures: these have been said to be the qualities ascribed to the sattva guna.

The tale of the qualities of rajas include pride of personal beauty, assertion of power, war, the absence of munificence and compassion, indulgence in kama, and so enduring of happiness and misery, delight in speaking ill of others, and an eagerness for fights and disputes of every kind.

Arrogance, rudeness, anxiety, indulgence in hostilities, sorrow, usurping what belongs to others, shamelessness, crookedness, disunions, roughness, lust, wrath, pride, assertion of superiority, malice and slander are also said to spring from rajas.

I will now tell you about the assemblage of qualities which spring from tamas. They are the torpor of judgement, obscuration of every faculty, darkness and utter, blind darkness. By darkness is implied death, and blind darkness is great wrath, kali.

Besides these, the other indications of tamas are greed with respect to all kinds of food, an insatiable appetite for both food and drink, taking over much pleasure in perfumes, royal attire, sporting events, luxurious seats and beds, and sleep during the day, lies and reckless deeds springing out of heedlessness, delighting in dancing and music on account of ignorance of purer sources of joy, and an aversion for every kind of religion. These, indeed, are the indications of tamas.'"

'Yajnavalkya said, "O best of men, sattva, rajas and tamas are the three gunas of Prakriti. These attach to all things of the universe and always inhere to them. The unmanifest Purusha invested with the six attributes of yoga, by embracing these trigunas, transforms himself by himself into millions and millions of forms.

Those who know the science of Adhyatma say that to sattva is assigned a high, to rajas a middling and to tamas, a low place in the universe. With the help of pure dharma, righteousness, one attains to a high position, alongside the Devas and other divinities.

Through righteousness tainted with sin one attains to the condition of humankind. Finally, through unmixed sin, one sinks into depravity, a vile end, by becoming an animal or a vegetable. Listen now to me, Rajan, as I speak to you about the mixture or compounds of the trigunas of sattva, rajas and tamas.

Sometimes rajas is seen existing with sattva. Tamas also exists alongside rajas. With tamas may also be seen sattva. Sattva and rajas and tamas can exist together and in equal proportions. They constitute the Avyakta, the unmanifest, or Prakriti.

When the unmanifest Purusha is suffused with only sattva, he attains to the regions of the gods. Imbued with both sattva and rajas, he takes birth among human beings. And with rajas and tamas, he takes birth among the intermediate orders of beings. With all three, sattva, rajas and tamas, he attains to the condition of humanity.

Those Mahatmans that transcend both righteousness and sin, attain to that place which is eternal, immutable, undecaying and immortal. Gyanis, men of knowledge, attain to births that are unrivalled, and their place is immaculate and undecaying, transcending the realm of the senses, free from ignorance, above birth and death, and full of light that dispels all kinds of darkness.

You asked me about the nature of the Paramatman that dwells in the unmanifest Purusha. I will tell you, Rajan; listen to me.

Even when dwelling in Prakriti, Purusha is said to dwell in his own nature without partaking of the nature of Prakriti. Prakriti is without reality and inert. Only when presided over by Purusha can she create and destroy."

Janaka said, "Wise one, both Prakriti and Purusha are without beginning and without end. Both of them are without rupa, form. Both are undecaying. Both are, again, unfathomable. How then, Maharishi, can it be said that one of them is inanimate and unintelligent? And how can the other be said to be animate and intelligent?

And why is the latter called Kshetrajna? O foremost of Brahmanas, you know the entire dharma of moksha. I want to hear in full and in detail about emancipation.

Speak to me then of the existence and oneness of Purusha, of his separateness from Prakriti, of the deities that attach to the body of the place to which embodied creatures repair when they die, and that place to which they may go ultimately, in the course of time.

Tell me also of the knowledge described in the Samkhya philosophy, and of the yoga system, separately. O best of men, it befits you also to speak of the premonitory symptoms of death. All these principles are as well known to you as the lines and signs in the palm of your hand!"'

'Yajnavalkya said, "That which is without gunas cannot be explained by ascribing gunas to it. Listen to me and I will expound to you what possesses attributes and what is nirguna.

High-souled and wise Munis, who know the truth about all the tattvas say that when Purusha seizes attributes like a crystal catching the reflection of a red flower, he is said to be imbued with gunas; but when freed from them, like the crystal freed from reflection, he can be viewed in his true nature, that is, nirguna, beyond all attributes.

Unmanifest Prakriti is by her nature filled with gunas. She cannot transcend them. Inert by nature, she becomes attached to attributes. Avyakta, she cannot know anything, while Purusha, by his nature, possesses gyana, knowledge.

There is nothing higher than myself—this is what Purusha is always conscious of. For this reason the unmanifest or Prakriti, although inherently without reality and inert, becomes animate and intelligent in consequence of her union with Purusha who is eternal and indestructible.

When Purusha, through ignorance, repeatedly becomes associated with gunas, he fails to realise his own true nature and thus he fails to attain moksha. As a result of Purusha's reign over the tattvas that flow from Prakriti, he is said to partake of the nature of those evolutions. In consequence also of his agency in the matter of Prakriya, creation, he is said to possess the attribute of creation. In consequence of his agency in the matter of yoga, he is said to possess the attribute of yoga. For his lordship over those particular tattvas or tanmatras known as Prakriti, he is said to possess the nature of Prakriti.

For his agency in the matter of creating the seeds of all immobile things, he partakes of the nature of those seeds. And because he causes the several principles to initiate life, he is as subject to decay and destruction as are these principles themselves.

Since he is the witness of everything, and besides him there is nothing else, and for his consciousness of identity with Prakriti, Yatis crowned with ascetic success, knowers of Adhyatma, and freed from fever of every kind, regard him as existing by himself without a second; he is immutable, Avyakta, unmanifest, in the form of cause, unstable, and Vyakta, manifest, in the form of effects.

This is what has we have heard. The Samkhyas who depend upon gyana alone for their Liberation, and the practice of compassion for all creatures, say that it is Prakriti which is One while Purushas are many.

In fact, Purusha is different from Prakriti which, though unstable, still appears to be stable. As a blade of a reed is different from its outer sheath, even so is Purusha different from Prakriti. Indeed, the worm that is ensconced within the udumbara tree is distinct from the udumbara. Though existing with the udumbara, the worm is not to be regarded as forming a part of the tree.

The fish is distinct from the water in which it lives, and the water is separate from the fish that lives in it. Though the fish lives in the water, it is never drenched by water.

The fire that is contained in an earthen pot is distinct from the pot, and the pot is distinct from the fire it contains. Although the fire exists in and with the pot, it is not to be regarded as forming any part of it.

The lotus-leaf that floats on the surface of some water is distinct from the water on which it floats. Its co-existence with water does not make it a part of the water.

The perennial existence of these things in and with other things is never correctly grasped by ordinary people. They who behold Prakriti and Purusha in any other light are said to possess a flawed vision. It is certain that they have to repeatedly sink into naraka, terrifying hell.

I have now instructed you in the philosophy of the Samkhyas, that excellent science through which all things have been correctly ascertained. Knowing the nature of Purusha and Prakriti in this way, the Samkhyas attain moksha. I have also told you of the systems of those others who are conversant with the great principles of the universe. I will now describe to you the vigyana of the yogins.'"

'Yajnavalkya said, "Rajan, I have already spoken to you of the science of the Samkhyas. Listen now as I discourse on the way of the yogins as heard and seen by me. There is no knowledge that can compare with that of the Samkhyas. There is no power that compares with that of yoga. These two ordain the same practices, and both are regarded as leading to moksha.

Men who are not blessed with intelligence regard the Samkhya and the yoga systems to be distinct from each other. We, however, look upon them as one and the same; we have arrived at this conclusion after study and reflection.

That which the yogins say and do is the very same which the Samkhyas have in view. He who sees both the Samkhya and the yoga systems to be one and the same is to be regarded as truly conversant with the principles that ordain the universe.

O Rajan, know the vital breaths and the senses are the chief means for practising yoga. Just by regulating those breaths and the senses, yogins can go everywhere at will.

Sinless one, when the gross body is destroyed, yogins endowed with subtle bodies, possessing the eight siddhis of yoga, such as anima, laghima and prapti, among others, wander throughout the universe, enjoying in that body all kinds of bliss.

In the shastras, the wise have spoken of yoga as conferring eight kinds of powers. They have spoken of yoga as having eight limbs. Indeed, O king, they have not spoken of any other kind of yoga.

It has been said that the excellent and effective practices of yogins are of two kinds. These, according to the indications in the scriptures, are those with attributes and those free of them: saguna and nirguna.

Dhyana, the concentration of the mind on the sixteen named objects, with the simultaneous regulation of the breath, is of one kind. The concentration of the mind in such a way as to destroy all difference between the contemplator, the object contemplated, and the act of dhyana, along with subjugation of the senses, is of another kind.

The first kind of yoga is said to be that possessed of gunas, attributes; the second kind is said to be that free of them.

Pranayama, regulation of the breath, is yoga with attributes. In nirguna yoga, the mind, freed from its functions, should be still. King of Mithila, at first, only saguna pranayama should be practised, otherwise if the inhaled and suspended breath is exhaled without mentally focusing upon a definite image furnished by a limited mantra, the increase of wind in the neophyte's body will cause him great injury.

In the first yaama of the night, twelve ways of holding the breath are recommended. After sleep, in the last yaama of the night, another twelve ways have been laid down. Without doubt, one who is calm, of subdued senses, living in solitude, rejoicing in his own self, and fully conversant with the import of the scriptures, should focus his Atman on the Paramatman by regulating his breath in these twenty-four ways.

Dispelling the five faults of the five senses, by removing them from their objects of sabda, rupa, sparsa, rasa and gandha, and dispelling the conditions called Pratibha and Apavarga, all the senses should be fixed upon Manas, the mind. Manas should then be fixed on Chitta, Consciousness; Chitta should be set on Buddhi, intelligence, and Buddhi should then be fixed on Prakriti.

Thus merging these, one after another, yogins contemplate the Supreme Soul which is One, which is freed from rajas, which is stainless, immutable and infinite, pure and perfect; who is the eternal Purusha, who is unchangeable, who is indivisible, without decay and death, who is everlasting, who transcends diminution, and who is the immutable Brahman.

Rajan, listen now to the indications of one that is in yoga, communion. All the indications of cheerful contentment of one who rests in perfect peace are seen in him who is in Samadhi. The wise say that the man in Samadhi looks like the still flame of a lamp full of oil and burning in a windless place.

He is like a rock which cannot be moved even slightly, not by a torrential cloudburst. He cannot be shaken by the blasting of conches and beating drums, or by songs, or the sound of hundreds of musical instruments played together.

These are the signs of one in Samadhi. Like a poised, brave and determined man who, while climbing a flight of stairs with a vessel full of oil in his hands, does not spill even a drop even if threatened by armed men, the Yogin, when his mind has been concentrated and when he beholds the Paramatman in Samadhi, remains unmoved, for he has entirely stilled his senses.

These are the signs of the yogin while he is in Samadhi. While in Samadhi, the yogin beholds Brahman, supreme and immutable, and which is a blazing light in the midst of deep and heavy darkness. By these means he attains, after long years, to moksha, after casting off this inanimate body.

This is what the eternal Sruti declares. This is called the yoga of the yogins. What else is it? They know it, they that are enlightened with wisdom, and regard themselves as crowned with final success.''

'Yajnavalkya said, "Listen now to me attentively, Rajan, as I speak of the places to which those who die will go.

If the Jivatman escapes through the feet, it is said that the man goes to the region of Vishnu. If through the calves, we have heard that the man goes to the regions of the Vasus. If through the knees, he attains to the company of the divinities called Sadhyas.

If through the anus, the man attains to the realms of Mitra. If through the back, he returns to Bhumi, and if through the thighs to the world of Prajapati. If through the flanks, the man attains to the realms of the Maruts, and if through the nostrils, to the realm of Chandramas.

If through the arms, the man goes to Indraloka, and if through the chest, to that of Rudra. If through the neck, he goes to the excellent loka of the great Rishi Nara. If through the mouth, the man attains to the world of the Viswadevas, and if through the ears, to the world of the Lokapalas.

If through the nose, the man attains to the realm of Vayu, and if through the eyes, to that of Agni. If through the brows, the man goes to the loka of the Aswins; and if through the forehead, to that of Pitris. If through the crown of the head, the man repairs to the world the puissant Brahma, greatest of gods.

Janaka, I have thus told you about the several realms to which men attain according to the manner in which their Jivatmans escape from their bodies.

I will now tell you the premonitory indications for those who have but one year to live, as laid down by the wise. Having previously seen Arundhati, the fixed star, or the other called Dhruva, one who fails to see it, or one that sees the full moon or the flame of a burning lamp to be broken towards the south, has but a year to live.

Those men who can no longer see images of themselves reflected in the eyes of others have but one year to live. One, who, though radiant, loses lustre, or being endowed with wisdom loses it, indeed, one whose inner and outer nature are thus changed, has but six months more to live.

He who disregards the gods, or has altercations with Brahmanas, or one who, being naturally of a dark complexion, becomes pale, has just six months to live. One who sees the moon as having many lacunae like a spider's web, or one who sees the sun with such gaps, has but one week more to live.

On smelling fragrances in temples, if a man perceives them to be as being offensive like the smell of corpses, he has but one week more to live. The depression of the nose or of the ears, the discolouring of the teeth or of the eye, the loss of consciousness, and of all bodily heat, are symptoms indicating death that very day.

If, without any perceptible cause a stream of tears suddenly flows from his left eye, and if vapours are seen to issue from his head, that is a sure indication that the man will die before that day ends. Knowing all these premonitory symptoms, the man of cleansed soul should, day and night, unite his Atman with the Paramatman in Samadhi.

Thus should he go on till the day for his dissolution arrives. If, however, instead of wishing to die he desires to live in this world, he can cast off all pleasures of gandha and rasa and live on in abstinence. In this manner he conquers death by fixing his Atman on the Paramatman.

Indeed, the man who is blessed with knowledge of the Atman practises the way of life recommended by the Samkhyas and conquers death by uniting his soul with the Supreme Soul. At last, he attains to what is entirely indestructible, which is without birth, auspicious and immutable, eternal and stable, and which is incapable of being attained to by men of impure souls.'"

'Yajnavalkya said, "You have asked me about that Supreme Brahman which resides in the Avyakta, the unmanifest. Your question relates to a deep mystery. Listen to me with close attention, O Rajan.

Having conducted myself with humility according to the ordinances laid down by the Rishis, I obtained the Yajuses from Surya. With the austerest penances I earlier adored the sun god.

The mighty Surya, pleased with me, said, 'Ask, O twice-born Rishi, for the boon upon which you have set your heart; however difficult it may be to obtain, I will gladly grant it to you. It is not easy to incline me to grace!'

Bowing and paying obeisance to him, I addressed that supreme heat-giving luminary in these words: 'I have no knowledge of the Yajuses. I want to know them without delay.'

Thus solicited, the divine one told me, 'I shall impart the Yajuses to you. Made up of the essence of speech, Goddess Saraswati will enter into your body.'

Surya Deva then commanded me to open my mouth. I did as I was told. Devi Saraswati entered into my body, O Anagha. At this, I began to burn. Unable to endure the pain I plunged into a river. Not knowing that what the high-souled Surya had done for me was for my benefit, I even grew angry with him.

While I was burning with the fierce energy of the goddess, the holy Surya said, 'Endure this burning for only a short while. It will soon cease and you will feel cool.' Indeed, soon my body was cool again.

Seeing me restored to ease, the Giver of light said to me, ‘The whole of the Vedas with their Angas, together with the Upanishads, will appear within you through inner light, O Dvija! You will also know and abbreviate all of the Satapathas.

After that, your understanding will turn to the path of moksha. And you will attain to that end which both Samkhyas and yogins covet.’ Having said these words to me, the divine Surya set beyond the Asta hills.

Hearing his parting words, and after he had gone from where I stood, I came home in joy and then remembered Devi Saraswati. As I thought of her, the auspicious Saraswati appeared instantly before my eyes, adorned with all the sacred vowels and the consonants; I first uttered the syllable Aum and then, according to the ordinance, offered the goddess the customary arghya, and dedicated another portion to Surya.

I discharged my duty and sat down, in devotion to both those deities. Thereupon, all of the Satapatha Brahmanas, with all their mysteries and with all their abstractions as also their angas, appeared of themselves before my inner eye, and I was filled with great joy.

I then taught these to a hundred good sishyas and thereby gave displeasure to my great Matulan, my maternal uncle Vaisampayana, with his disciples gathered round him. Radiant in the midst of my disciples, like the sun himself with his rays, I undertook to manage the yagna of your Mahatman father, O king of Mithila.

In that yagna a dispute arose between me and Vaisampayana as to who should be permitted to receive the dakshina that was paid for the recitation of the Vedas. In the very presence of Devala, I took half of that dakshina, the other half going to my uncle. Your sire and Sumantra and Paila and Jaimini and others all acquiesced in that arrangement.

I thus received from Surya Deva the fifty Yajuses. I then studied the Puranas with Romaharshana. Keeping before me those original mantras and the Devi Saraswati, helped by Surya’s inspiration, I set myself to compile the excellent Satapatha Brahmanas, and succeeded in the task never before undertaken by anyone else.

I have taken that path which I wanted to take and I have also taught it to my sishyas. Indeed, I have imparted the whole of those Vedas with their angas and antas to them. As a result of my teachings, pure in mind and body, all those disciples have been filled with joy.

Having established for the benefit of others this gyana of fifty branches, which I had from Surya, I now meditate on the great goal of that final knowledge, the Brahman.

The Gandharva Viswavasu, well-conversant with the Vedanta scriptures, who wanted to know what is beneficial for Brahmanas in this knowledge, what truth occurs in it, and what its objective is, once questioned me.

He put altogether twenty-four questions to me relating to the Vedas. Finally, he asked me the twenty-fifth question relating to that branch of knowledge which is concerned with nyaya, the inferences of ratiocination.

Those questions are as follows: What is the universe and what is the not-universe? What is Aswa and what, again, is Aswa? What is Mitra? What is Varuna? What is gyana? What is the object of knowledge? What is unintelligent? What is intelligent? Who is Kah?

Who possesses the principle of change? Who does not possess it? What is he that devours the sun and what is the sun? What is vidya and what is avidya? What is immobile and what Mobile? What is without beginning, what is Akshara, indestructible, and what is Kshara, destructible?

The best of the Gandharvas asked me these excellent questions. After he, King Viswavasu, asked me these questions one after another, I answered them truly. At first, however, I told him to wait for a brief time, while I reflected on his queries! 'So be it,' the Gandharva said, and sat in silence.

Once again, in my mind, I thought of Goddess Saraswati. Then the replies to those questions arose naturally in my mind like butter from curds. Keeping in view the high science of inferential reasoning, I churned, with my mind, the Upanishads and the angas of the Vedas.

The fourth vigyana that deals with moksha, on which I have already discoursed to you, and which is based upon the twenty-fifth, the Jiva, I then expounded to him.

Having said all this, O Rajan, to King Viswavasu, I said to him, 'Listen now to the answers to the several questions that you have put to me. I now turn to the question, O Gandharva: What is the universe and what is the not-universe?

The universe is Avyakta, unmanifest, and the original Prakriti is endowed with the principles of birth and death, which are terrible to those who desire mukti. It possesses the three gunas of sattva, rajas and tamas, since it creates the tattvas, all of which are fraught with those attributes.

That which is the not-universe is Purusha divested of all gunas. By Aswa and Aswa are meant the female and the male, the former being Prakriti and the latter Purusha. Similarly, Mitra is Purusha, and Varuna is Prakriti. Gyana is Prakriti, while the object of knowledge is Purusha.

The unawakened Jivatman, and the knowing or intelligent are both the nirguna Purusha, for it is Purusha that becomes the Jiva when invested with ignorance. You have asked what Kah is, who is changeable and who is not.

I answer, Kah is Purusha. That which is changeable is Prakriti. He that is not is Purusha. Similarly, that which is called avidya, unknowing, is Prakriti; and that which is called vidya is Purusha.

You have asked me about the mobile and the immobile. That which is mobile is Prakriti, which undergoing change, constitutes the cause of creation and destruction. The Immobile is Purusha, for, without undergoing variations himself, he assists at creation and destruction.

According to a different system of philosophy, that which is Vedya is Prakriti; while that which is Avedya is Purusha. Both Prakriti and Purusha are said to be unintelligent, stable, indestructible, unborn, and eternal, according to the conclusions of philosophers conversant with the Adhyatma.

Prakriti, in the matter of creation, is indestructible, and is unborn; hence Prakriti is not subject to decay or destruction. Purusha, again, is indestructible and unchangeable, for change it has none. The attributes of Prakriti may be destroyed, but not Prakriti herself. The learned, therefore, call Prakriti Akshara.

Prakriti also, by undergoing changes, operates as the cause of creation. The created outcomes appear and disappear, but not original Prakriti. For this reason also is Prakriti called indestructible. Thus have I told you of the conclusions of the fourth science, the turiya vigyana based on the principles of logical inference with mukti as its aim.

Having acquired by the science of Nyaya, inference, and by waiting upon gurus, the Riks, the Samans and the Yajuses, all the obligatory practices should be observed and all the Vedas studied with reverence, O Viswavasu! Foremost of Gandharvas, they who study the Vedas and all their angas, but who do not know the Paramatman from which all things take their birth and into which all things merge at the time of the Pralaya, and which is the one subject whose knowledge the Vedas seek to inculcate —indeed, they—who have no acquaintance with that which the Vedas seek to establish, study the Vedas to no purpose and bear the burden of such study in vain.

If a man wants butter and churns the milk of the female donkey, he does not find what he seeks but only encounters a substance as foul- smelling as ordure. In the same manner if, having studied the Vedas, one fails to grasp what is Prakriti and what is Purusha, one only demonstrates one's own foolishness and bears a useless burden in the form of Vedic lore.

With bhakti and dhyana, devotion and meditation, one should contemplate both Prakriti and Purusha, so that one may avoid repeated births and deaths. Reflection upon the fact of one's repeated births and deaths and avoiding the religion of rituals that produces at best only mortal results, one should take to the immortal religion of yoga.

Kasyapa, if one continuously reflects on the nature of the Jivatman and its connection with the Paramatman, one then succeeds in divesting oneself of all attributes and in beholding the Supreme Soul. Ignorant men regard the eternal and Avyakta Paramatman to be different from the Jiva, the twenty-fifth tattva.

Those who see both as truly one and the same are wise. Frightened by repeated births and deaths, the Samkhyas and yogins regard the Jivatman and the Paramatman to be identical.'

Viswavasu then said, 'Best of Brahmanas, you have said that the Jivatman is indestructible and indistinguishable from the Paramatman. This is difficult to grasp. Discourse on this topic to me once more.

I have heard discourses on this subject from Jaigishavya, Aista, Devala, the regenerate Parasara, the intelligent Varshaganya, Bhrigu, Panchasikha Kapila, Suka, Gautama, Arshtisena, the high-souled Garga, Narada, Asuri, the wise Pulastya, Sanatkumara, the great Sukra and my sire Kasyapa.

Subsequently I heard the discourses of Rudra and the Viswarupa Mahabuddhi, of several of the Devas, of the Pitris and the Daityas. I have gathered all that they say, for they generally speak on that eternal goal of all knowledge.

I desire, however, to hear what you, in all your wisdom, may say on those matters. You are the foremost of all, and a learned teacher of the shastras, and endowed with great intelligence. There is nothing that is unknown to you.

You are an ocean of the Srutis, as described in the world, of both the Devas and Pitris. The great Rishis who dwell in the world of Brahma say that Aditya himself, the eternal lord of all luminaries, is your guru in this knowledge.

Yajnavalkya, you have acquired the entire science of the Samkhyas, and in particular, the scriptures of the yogins. Without doubt, you are enlightened, and fully conversant with the mobile and immobile universe. I wish to hear you discourse on that knowledge, which may be likened to sweet ambrosial payasa.'

Yajnavalkya said, 'Best of Gandharvas, you are able to fathom every knowledge. Yet, since you ask me, hear me instruct you in that which I myself learned from my guru.

Prakriti, which is unintelligent, is apprehended by the Jiva. The Jiva, however, cannot be apprehended by Prakriti. As a result of the Jivatman being reflected in Prakriti, Prakriti is called Pradhana by Samkhyas and yogins who know the original Mahatattvas contained in the Srutis. Sinless one, the other, beholding, sees the twenty-fourth tattva, Prakriti, and the twenty-fifth, the Purusha; finally, not beholding, it beholds the twenty-sixth.

The twenty-fifth tattva thinks that there is nothing higher than itself. In reality, however, though seeing, it does not perceive the twenty-sixth tattva, which beholds it. Wise men should never accept the twenty-fourth, Prakriti, which is unintelligent, inert, as identifiable with the twenty-fifth, or the Purusha which has a real and independent existence.

The fish lives in water. It goes there impelled by its own nature. As the fish, though living in the water, is regarded as separate from it, the twenty-fifth tattva should be apprehended similarly: though it exists in a state of contact with the twenty-fourth, Prakriti, in its real nature, it is distinct from and independent of Prakriti.

When overwhelmed with the Consciousness of Ahamkara, and when unable to understand its identity with the twenty-sixth; in fact, in consequence of the illusion that fills it, of its co-existence with Prakriti, and of its own manner of thinking, the Jivatman always sinks down, but when freed from such Consciousness it rises upwards.

When the Jivatman succeeds in understanding that it is one, and Prakriti with which it resides is another, only then does it succeed in beholding the Paramatman and becomes one with the universe. Rajan, the Supreme is one, and the twenty-fifth, or the Jivatman is another. However, since the Supreme overlies the Jivatman, the wise regard both to be one and the same.

For these reasons, yogins and followers of the Samkhya, terrified by birth and death, blessed with the vision of the twenty-sixth tattva, pure in body and mind, and devoted to the Paramatman, do not recognise the Jivatman as Akshara, indestructible. When one beholds the Supreme Soul and merges with it, losing all consciousness of individuality, one then becomes omniscient, and possessed of omniscience one is freed from the obligation of rebirth.

I have thus spoken to you truly about Prakriti which is unintelligent, and the Jivatman which is intelligent, and the Paramatman which is omniscient, all according to the indications in the Srutis. That man who sees no difference between the knower or the known is both Kevala and Akevala, is the original cause of the universe, and is both Jivatman and the Paramatman.'

Viswavasu said, 'You have duly and adequately discoursed on that which is the origin of all the deities and which leads to mukti. You have spoken of what is true and excellent. May inexhaustible blessings always attend on you, and may your mind be ever united with intelligence!'

Yajnavalkya continued, 'Having said those words, the prince of the Gandharvas flew up towards heaven, shining in resplendent beauty. Before leaving me, he duly honoured me by circumambulating around my person in pradakshina, and I looked at him, highly pleased.

He taught the science he had obtained from me to those divinities that dwell in the regions of Brahma and other gods, to those that dwell on earth, to the dwellers of patala, and to those who have adopted the mukti-marga.

The Samkhyas are devoted to the practices of their system. The yogins are devoted to their practices. There are others too who desire to achieve moksha. To them this vigyana yields visible fruits, O lion among kings.

Mukti flows from gyana; without knowledge it can never be attained. Rajan, this is what the wise have said. Hence, one should strive to acquire true knowledge in all its depth and detail, and so succeed in freeing oneself from birth and death.

Acquiring knowledge from a Brahmana or a Kshatriya or Vaisya or even a Sudra of low birth, one must devotedly revere such gyana. Birth and death cannot assail one that has faith.

All orders of men are Brahmanas. All are sprung from Brahman. All men are Brahmavadis and utter Brahman. Helped by an understanding that is derived from and directed to Brahman, I inculcated this vigyana of Prakriti and Purusha in myself. Indeed, this whole universe is Brahman.

From the mouth of Brahma sprung the Brahmanas; from his arms, sprang the Kshatriyas; from his navel, the Vaisyas; and from his feet, the Sudras. All the varnas, having thus originated, should not be regarded as thieving from one another.

Impelled by ignorance, all men die and take birth once more, birth that is the cause of karma, deeds. Without knowledge, men of all varnas, dragged down by terrible avidya, fall into varied orders of being due to the tattvas that flow from Prakriti. For this reason, all must, by every means, seek to acquire knowledge.

I have told you that every person is entitled to strive for its attainment. One who possesses knowledge is a Brahmana. Others, Kshatriyas and Vaisyas and Sudras, also possess gyana. Hence, this science of mukti is always open to them all. This has been revealed by the wise.

I have answered all the questions you had asked me, and I have answered them all honestly. Discard all sorrow. Cross over the end of this quest. Your questions were excellent. Blessings be on you for ever!'"

Bhishma continues, 'Thus instructed by Yajnavalkya, the king of Mithila was filled with joy. The king honoured that best of sannyasis by circling around him in pradakshina. Given permission by the monarch, the sage left his court.

Having acquired the knowledge of mukti dharma, King Daivarati took his seat, and touching a million cows and vast quantities of gold and jewels, gave them away to numerous Brahmanas. Installing his son as the sovereign of the Videhas, the old king began to live according to the practices of the Yatis.

Meditating mainly on all ordinary duties and their derelictions as laid down in the shastras, the king began to study the entire science of the Samkhyas and the yogins. Regarding himself to be infinite, he began to reflect on only the Eternal and Independent One, the Brahman. He rejected all ordinary duties and their derelictions, punya and paapa, satya and asatya, janma and mrityu, and all other things pertaining to the tattvas of Prakriti.

Both the Samkhyas and yogins, in consonance with their sciences, regard this universe to be caused by to the action of the Vyakta, manifest, and the Avyakta, unmanifest. The learned say that Brahman is free from good and evil, is self-dependent, the Highest of the high, Eternal, and Pure.

Therefore, you too, O Rajan, become pure! The giver, the receiver of the gift, the gift itself, and that which is ordered to be given away, are all to be deemed as the unmanifest Atman. The Atman is the Atman's one possession. Who, therefore, can be a stranger to one?

Always think in this manner, never otherwise. He who does not know what Prakriti is with gunas and what is Purusha transcending them, only he, without knowledge, repairs to sacred waters and performs yagnas.

Not by the study of the Vedas, not by penances, nor by sacrifices, son of Kuru, can one attain to the condition of Brahman. Only when one succeeds in grasping the Supreme or Avyakta, does one come to be revered.

They who wait upon Mahat attain to the regions of Mahat. They who wait upon Chit, Consciousness, attain to the realm of Chetana. They who wait upon what is higher attain to places that are higher than these.

Those gyanis who succeed in apprehending eternal Brahman, who is higher than unmanifest Prakriti, succeed in obtaining that which transcends birth and death, which is free from attributes and qualities, and which is both existent and non-existent. I received this knowledge from Janaka, who had it from Yajnavalkya.

Gyana, knowledge, is the highest. Yagnas, sacrifices, cannot compare with it. With the help of gyana one succeeds in crossing samsara, the world's ocean so full of obstacles, suffering and danger. One can never cross that ocean with sacrifices. Men of knowledge say that one cannot prevail over birth and death, and other obstacles through yagnas, Rajan; indeed they declare that one cannot pass over samsara by ordinary exertion.

Men attain to heaven through yagnas, tapasya, vratas and other observances. But they again fall down into this world. Therefore, adore with reverence that which is Supreme, most pure, blessed, stainless, and sacred, and which transcends all states, being moksha itself.

By understanding Kshetra, and by performing the sacrifice that consists in the acquisition of knowledge, you will become truly wise. In an earlier age, Yajnavalkya did that good to King Janaka which can be derived from a study of the Upanishads. The eternal and immutable Paramatman was the subject on which the great Rishi discoursed to the king of Mithila. It enabled him to attain to that Brahman which is auspicious, and immortal, and which transcends every kind of sorrow.'

"Yudhishtira says, 'Having acquired great power and great wealth, and having obtained a long life, how can one avoid death? By which of these means can one succeed in avoiding decay and death: tapasya, vratas, the diverse karmas laid down in the Vedas, or by knowledge of the Srutis, or the application of medicaments?'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to the old story of Panchasikha, who was a bhikshu in his practices, and Janaka. Once upon a time Janaka, the ruler of the Videhas, questioned the Maharishi Panchasikha, the foremost of all who knew the Vedas and whose doubts about the purpose and significance of all duties had been dispelled.

The king asked, "Through what conduct, O holy one, may one transcend decrepitude and death? Is it by tapasya, or by gyana? Or by religious deeds like yagnas and vratas, or by the study and knowledge of the shastras?"

Thus addressed by the ruler of the Videhas, the learned Panchasikha, knower of all things unseen, answered, "Decay and death cannot be prevented under any circumstances. Neither days nor nights, nor months, ever cease.

Only that man, who, though transient, adopts the eternal path of the religion of Nivritti, abstention from all actions, succeeds in evading birth and death. Destruction overtakes all creatures. All are ceaselessly borne along the infinite current of time.

Those that are borne along this infinite river infested by the two mighty crocodiles of decrepitude and death, without any rescue boat, sink down without anyone coming to their help. As they are swept along that current, men fail to find any friend for assistance and do not take an interest in any one else.

One meets with wives and other friends on one's way. A man encounters enjoyable companions but never for any length of time. Creatures, as they are borne along the river of time, become repeatedly attracted towards one another, and, like masses of clouds, blown by the wind, collide with a report of thunder.

Decay and death devour all creatures, like wolves. Indeed, they devour the strong and the weak, the short and the tall. In all transitory creatures, only the Soul exists eternally.

Why should he, then, rejoice when creatures are born or grieve when they die? Where do I come from? Who am I? Where shall I go? Whose am I? Before what do I rest? What shall I be? Why do you grieve and for what? Who else but you will behold swarga or patala? Thus, without discarding the shastras, we should offer dakshina and perform yagnas!'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Rajarishi of Kuruvamsa, who ever attained mukti, the annihilation of Buddhi, understanding, and the other faculties, without abandoning the domestic life, grihasta? Tell me this! How can the sthula and sukshma sariras, the gross and the subtle bodies, be cast off? Pitamaha, also tell me what the supreme excellence is.'

Bhishma says 'In this regard, the old tale is told of the discourse between Janaka and Sulabha. In days of yore, there was a king of Mithila by the name of Dharmadhyaja, of Janaka's vamsa. He was devoted to the practices of the religion of Vairagya, which is renunciation. He was deeply learned in the Vedas, with the scriptures on mukti, and with the shastras bearing on his own dharma as a king.

Subduing his senses, he ruled this earth. Hearing of his good conduct in the world, many wise men wanted to emulate him. In the same Satya yuga lived a woman called Sulabha who was a sannyasini; she practised the dharma of yoga and wandered over the whole world.

In the course of her wanderings, Sulabha heard from many Brahmana Dandis of different places that the ruler of Mithila was devoted to the dharma of mukti. Hearing this about Janaka and wishing to ascertain its veracity, Sulabha wanted to meet the king in person.

Using her powers of yoga, Sulabha abandoned her natural form and features, and assumed the most faultless figure and unrivalled beauty. In the twinkling of an eye and with the speed of the quickest arrow, the fair-browed devi of eyes like lotus-petals flew to the capital of the Videhas. Arriving at the city of Mithila, teeming with people, she adopted the guise of a mendicant and presented herself before the king.

Seeing her elegant and delicate form, the king was filled with wonder and asked who she was, whose she was, and where she came from. Welcoming her, he offered her an excellent seat, honoured her by giving her water to wash her feet, and gratified her with fine refreshments.

Refreshed and gratified with the hospitality offered to her, Sulabha urged the king, who was surrounded by his ministers and seated in the midst of learned scholars, to speak upon his adherence to the moksha dharma.

Doubtful of whether Janaka had succeeded in attaining to Mukti by following the religion of Nivritti, Sulabha, who had yoga-shakti, entered the mind of the king with her own mind. Wanting to know the truth, she blocked the rays issuing from the eyes of the king with the rays of light from her own eyes and bound Janaka with bonds of yoga.

That best of kings, who prided himself upon his own invincibility, foiled the intentions of Sulabha and indeed seized her will with his own. In his sukshma rupa, the king was without the royal chatra, parasol and sceptre. Sulabha, in hers, was without the tridanda, her mendicant's triple staff.

Both remained in the same sthula rupas, and so conversed with each other. Listen to that conversation as it transpired between Janaka and Sulabha.

Janaka said, "O sannyasini, to what course of conduct are you devoted? Whose are you? Where have you come from? After finishing your work here, where will you go? Only with questioning can one ascertain another's knowledge of the scriptures, their age or varna.

Since you have come to me, you must answer my questions. Know that I am truly free of all vanity for my raja chatra and raja danda, my royal parasol and sceptre. I wish to know you well. You truly deserve my respect.

Listen to me as I speak to you of mukti, for no one else can discourse to you on that subject. I will also tell you about the person from whom, in ancient times, I acquired this transcendent knowledge.

I am the beloved sishya of the high-souled and venerable Panchasikha, belonging to the pravarajya, the mendicant order of Parasara's vamsa. My doubts have been dispelled and I fully know the Samkhya and the yoga philosophies, and the Vidhis, the ordinances with respect to yagnas and other rites, which constitute the three well-known paths to moksha.

Wandering over the earth and pursuing the path pointed out in the shastras, the learned Panchasikha once lived joyfully in my palace for four months during the monsoons. That foremost of Samkhyas discoursed to me on the many means of attaining mukti, honestly and clearly, so that even I could easily comprehend them. He did not, however, command me to give up my kingdom.

Freed from attachments, and fixing my Soul on the supreme Brahman, I lived unmoved by companionship, practising in its entirety that threefold Pravritti which is laid down in the treatises on mukti. Renouncing all attachments is the highest means prescribed for emancipation.

It is from knowledge that Vairagya, the renunciation by which one is freed, is said to flow. The endeavour after yoga arises from gyana, and through that endeavour one attains to knowledge of the Atman. Through knowledge of the Atman one transcends joy and sorrow. This enables one to transcend death and achieve high success.

I have acquired that Chetana, the knowledge of the Atman, and accordingly, I have transcended all the pairs of opposites. Even in this life have I been freed from stupor and have risen above all attachments.

Just as soil, saturated with and softened by water, causes the sown seed to sprout, so do the actions of men cause rebirth. As a seed once fried cannot sprout, though it once could, has my heart been freed from desire; by the instruction of the holy Panchasikha of sannyasa, my mind no longer produces its fruit in the form of attachment to the objects of the senses.

I never experience love for my wife or hatred for my enemies. Indeed, I keep aloof from both, clearly knowing the futility of attachment and anger. I regard both equally: him that smears my right hand with sandalwood-paste and him that wounds my left.

Having attained my true goal, I am content, and look equally upon a clod of earth, a piece of stone, and a nugget of gold. Though engaged in ruling a kingdom, I am free from attachments of every kind. In consequence of all this I am superior to all bearers of tridandas.

Some great men, who are conversant with the subject of mukti, say that it has three paths: gyana, yoga and karma, the way of yagnas and kriyas and other acts. Some regard gyana, having all worldly things for its objects, as the means to mukti. Some hold that the total renunciation of outer and inner actions is the means.

Another class of men who know the scriptures of emancipation say that gyana is the only means. Yatis, with subtle vision, hold that karmas, actions, are the means. The high-souled Panchasikha, discarding both the opinion about gyana and karma, knowledge and deeds, regards the third way, yoga, as the only means to mukti.

If men leading the grihasta life are endowed with yama and niyama, they become the equals of sannyasins. If, on the other hand, sannyasins are filled with desire and aversion, and attached to wives and honour, and vanity and affection, they become the equals of householders.

If one can attain mukti through knowledge, then emancipation may exist in tridandas, for nothing prevents the bearers of such staffs from acquiring the requisite gyana. Why then can emancipation not exist in the chatra and the danda as well, especially when there is equal reason in taking up the tridanda and the sceptre?

One becomes attached to all those objects and deeds which one needs for one's own self for particular reasons. If a man sees the faults of domestic life and discards it to adopt another mode fraught with great merit, he cannot, merely for such rejection and adoption, be regarded as one free from all attachments; for all that he has done is to attach himself to a new method after having freed himself from a previous one.

Sovereignty is fraught with the rewarding and the chastising of others. The life of a mendicant is equally fraught with the same, for they too reward and chastise those they can. Since they are akin to kings in this respect, why would they alone attain mukti, and not kings?

Notwithstanding sovereignty, one is cleansed of all sins through of gyana alone, living the while in the Supreme Brahman. The wearing of brown cloths, shaving of the head, bearing the tridanda and the kamandalu, these are the outward signs of one's mode of life. These have no value in attaining mukti.

Notwithstanding the adoption of these symbols of a particular way of life, when knowledge alone is the cause of one's emancipation from sorrow, it would appear that the adoption of mere emblems is perfectly useless. Or, if you see the mitigation of sorrow in these symbols of sannyasa, why then should not the alleviation of sorrow be seen in the chatra and the danda that I have adopted?

Mukti does not exist in poverty; nor is bondage to be found in affluence. One attains to it through gyana, illumination, alone, whether one is indigent or wealthy.

For these reasons, know that I am living in a condition of freedom, though ostensibly engaged in the enjoyments of dharma, artha and kama, in the form of kingdom and wives, which, for most men, constitute bondage. I have severed the bonds of kingdom and prosperity, and the bondage to attachments, with the sword of renunciation, whetted on the stone of the scriptures on mukti.

As regards myself, I tell you that I have become liberated in this way. O sannyasini, I hold you in high esteem. But that should not prevent me from telling you that your conduct does not match the practices of the very mode of life that you have embraced!

You have great elegance and delicacy of form. You are shapely and beautiful. You are young. You have all these, and you have niyama, subjugation of the senses. I doubt it verily. By entering into me with the power of yoga, you have invaded my body to ascertain whether I am really emancipated or not.

Your action ill suits that mode of life whose emblems you bear. The tridanda is unfit for a yogin filled with desire. As regards yourself, you do not adhere to your staff. As regards those that are free, it is fitting that they protect themselves from falling.

Let me tell you about your transgression in consequence of your contact with me and having entered into my sthula sarira, this gross body, with the help of your understanding. Why have you entered my kingdom or my palace? At whose bidding have you entered into my heart?

You belong to the foremost of all the varnas, being, as you are, a Brahmana woman. As regards myself, however, I am a Kshatriya. There can be no union between us. Do not cause a varnasamkarsana, a mixing of castes.

You live by practising those dharmas that lead to mukti. I live in the grihasta mode of life. This deed of yours is thus another evil that you have done, for it produces an unnatural union of two opposite ways of life. I do not know whether you belong to my own gotra or not.

You, too, do not know who I am, and to what gotra I belong. If you are of my own gotra, by entering into my body you have created another evil—that of an unnatural union. If, again, your husband is alive and in a distant place, your union with me has produced the fourth sin of adultery, for you are not one with whom I may be lawfully united.

Do you perpetrate all these sins, driven by the motive of achieving a particular goal? Do you act from ignorance or from a perverted intelligence? If, again, because of your decadent nature, your behaviour has become thoroughly independent or unrestrained, I tell you that if you have any knowledge of the scriptures, you will understand that everything you have done has generated evil.

As a result of your actions, a third fault attaches to you, a fault that destroys peace of mind. By trying to display your superiority, you reveal the signs of an immoral woman.

Desirous of asserting victory as you are, it is not just me that you want to defeat, for it is clear that you wish to obtain a victory over my entire court consisting of these learned and superior Brahmanas; by casting your eyes in this manner towards all these meritorious Brahmanas, it is evident that you desire to humiliate them all and glorify yourself at their expense.

Bewildered by the pride and might of yoga born of your envy of my power, you have fused your understanding with mine and have mingled nectar with poison.

The union of man and woman, when each desires the other, is sweet as nectar. When, however, a woman desires a man who does not want her, the union of the two, instead of being a merit, becomes a flaw as noxious as poison.

Do not continue to touch me. Know that I am righteous. Conduct yourself according to your svadharma. Your search into whether I am or I am not emancipated is finished.

It is fitting for you not to conceal all your secret motives from me. It is not correct for you to disguise and hide from me what your purpose is: whether your action has been prompted by the desire of accomplishing your own objective or that of some other hostile king.

One should never appear fraudulently before a king; nor before a Brahmana; nor before one's wife when she is virtuous. Those who appear in deceitful guise before these three are soon ruined.

The power of kings lies in their sovereignty. The power of Brahmanas conversant with the Vedas is in the Vedas. Women wield high power because of their beauty, youth and blessedness. Possessing these strengths, all three are powerful.

He who wishes to accomplish his own goal should always approach these three with sincerity and honesty; insincerity and deceit fail to produce success in these three quarters. It is right for you to tell me your varna of birth, about your learning and conduct, and disposition and nature, and also why you have come here!'"

Bhishma continues, 'Though rebuked by the king in these harsh, offensive, and unseemly words, Sulabha was not at all abashed. After Janaka had spoken, the beautiful Sulabha replied in words more handsome than her person.

Sulabha said, "Rajan, speech should always be free of the nine verbal faults and the nine errors of judgement. While lucidly explaining the meaning of anything, speech should possess the eighteen well-known merits.

Ambiguity, ascertaining the merits and flaws of premises and conclusions, weighing the relative strength or weakness of those faults and merits, establishment of the conclusion, and the element of persuasiveness or otherwise that attaches to the conclusion arrived at: these five characteristics pertaining to the senses constitute the authoritativeness of what is said.

Listen now to the characteristics of all these requirements, as I expound them according to the combinations, beginning with ambiguity. As regards the comprehending of the subject, when knowledge rests on distinguishing the objects to be known being different from one another, and when the understanding rests upon many points that follow each other, the combination of words is said to be vitiated by ambiguity.

By ascertaining merits and flaws, the establishment, by elimination in premises and conclusions, adopting tentative meanings is called Samkhya. Krama or weighing the relative strength or weakness of the faults or merits, determined by the above process, consists in settling the appropriateness of the priority or sequence of the words used in a sentence. Those who are conversant with the interpretation of sentences or texts give this meaning to the word Krama.

Nigamana or Samapana, conclusion, means the final determination, after examining what has been said on the subjects of dharma, artha, kama and moksha, in respect of what it is that has specifically been stated in the text.

The sorrow born of attraction or revulsion increases to a great measure. The conduct, O Rajan, which one pursues to dispel the sorrow experienced is called Prayojanam.

Take my word for it, O king, that these characteristics of ambiguity and the others, numbering five in all, when occurring together, constitute a complete and intelligible sentence. What I say will be full of sense and meaning, judicious and free from ambiguity because each word will not symbolise many things.

They are logical, free from pleonasm or tautology, smooth, certain, free of bombast, sweet and agreeable, truthful, consistent with dharma, artha and kama, refined to be free from Prakriti, not elliptical or imperfect, gentle and easily grasped; they are characterised by correct order, not far-fetched in respect of sense, connected with one another as cause and effect, and each having a specific purpose.

I shall not tell you anything prompted by desire or wrath, fear or greed, abjectness or deceit or shame, compassion or pride. I will answer you because it is proper for me to respond to what you have asked.

When the speaker, the hearer and the words said, completely agree with one another in the course of speech, then the sense or meaning is revealed clearly. When, in the matter of what is said, the speaker shows disregard for the understanding of the hearer by uttering words whose meaning only he himself understands, then, however fine those words may be, they cannot be grasped by the hearer.

That speaker's words are faulty, again, if he abandons all regard for his own meaning and uses words that, though of excellent sound and sense, arouse only mistaken impressions in the mind of the listener.

That speaker, however, who uses words that are, while expressing his own meaning, intelligible to the hearer as well, truly deserves to be called a speaker. No other man deserves the name. It befits you, therefore, Rajan, to hear with concentrated attention my words that are laden with meaning and a wealth of significance.

You have asked me who I am, whose I am, and where I come from. O king, listen to me with an undivided mind as I answer your questions. As lac and wood, as grains of dust and drops of water, exist commingled when brought together, even so do the lives of all creatures.

Sabda, sparsa, rasa, rupa and gandha, these and the senses, though diverse in their essences, still exist in a state of commingling like lac and wood. It is well known that nobody asks any of these: who are you? Each of them also has no knowledge either of itself or of the others.

The eye cannot see itself. The ear cannot hear itself. The eye, again, cannot discharge the functions of any of the other senses, nor can any of the senses carry out the functions of any other sense save its own. Even if all of them combine together, they will fail to know their own selves, just as dust and water mingled together cannot know each other though existing in a state of union.

In order to discharge their respective functions, they await the contact with objects external to them. The eye, form and light, constitute the three requirements for seeing. The same is the case with respect to the working of the other senses and the ideas that result from them.

Again, between the functions of the senses, like vision and hearing, and the ideas which are their result, like form and sound, Manas, the mind, is an entity other than the senses and is regarded as having a function of its own. To arrive at certainty, one uses Manas to distinguish what is existent from what is non-existent in the matter of all ideas derived from the senses.

With the five senses of knowledge and five senses of action, Manas makes a total of eleven. The twelfth is the Buddhi, understanding. When doubt arises in respect of what is to be known, Buddhi comes forward and settles all doubts to help discernment.

After the twelfth, sattva is the thirteenth tattva. With its help creatures are distinguished as possessing more of it or less of it in their constitutions. After this, Chitta, Consciousness of self, is another tattva, the fourteenth. It helps one to understand the self as distinguished from what is not self.

Desire is the fifteenth principle. Unto it inheres the whole universe. The sixteenth principle is avidya. Unto it inhere the seventeenth and the eighteenth tattvas called Prakriti and Vyakti, which is maya and prakasa.

Joy and sorrow, decrepitude and death, acquisition and loss, the agreeable and the unpleasant—these constitute the nineteenth tattva and are called pairs of opposites. Beyond the nineteenth principle is another, Kaala, time, called the twentieth. Know that the births and death of all creatures are due to the action of this twentieth tattva.

These twenty exist together. Besides these, the Panchamahabhutas, the five great primal elements, and existence and non-existence, bring the total to twenty-seven. Beyond these are three others named Vidhi, Sukra and Bala, which make the tally reach thirty. These thirty tattvas occur in the body.

Some regard unmanifest Prakriti to be the source or cause of these thirty principles. This is the view of the atheistic Samkhya school. The Kanadas of gross vision regard the manifest or anus, atoms, to be their cause.

Whether the Avyakta, unmanifest, or the Vyakta, manifest, be their cause, or whether the two, the Supreme or Purusha and the Vyakta, be regarded as their cause, or whether the four together, the Supreme or Purusha and his maya, and the Jiva and avidya, ignorance, be the cause, they that are conversant with Adhyatma behold Prakriti to be the cause of all creatures.

That Prakriti, which is Avyakta, becomes manifest in the form of these tattvas. I, you, O king, and all others possessing a body are the result of that Prakriti so far as our bodies are concerned.

Insemination and other embryonic conditions are due to the mixture of the vital seed and eggs. In consequence of insemination the result which first appears is called Kalala. From Kalala arises Budbuda or the embryonic bubble.

From the stage called Budbuda springs what is called Pesi. From Pesi that stage arises in which the various limbs become manifest. From this last condition appear nails and hair.

Upon the end of the ninth month, king of Mithila, the creature takes its birth so that, its sex being known, it comes to be called a boy or girl. When the creature issues out of the womb, the form it presents is such that its nails and fingers seem to be of the colour of burnished copper.

The next stage is infancy, when the form that was seen at the time of birth changes. From infancy one reaches youth, and from youth, old age. As the creature advances from one stage into another, the form presented in the previous stage is altered.

The constituent elements of the body, which serve diverse functions, undergo change every moment in every creature. Those changes, however, are so minute that they cannot be observed. The birth of particles, and their death, in each successive condition, cannot be marked even as one cannot distinguish the changes in the flame of a burning lamp.

When such is the state of the bodies of all creatures—when that which is called the body is changing incessantly even like the swift movement of a horse of fine mettle—who then comes from where, or not, or whose is it or whose is it not, or from where does it not arise? What connection, in fact, exists between creatures and their own bodies?

As fire is generated from the contact of flint with iron, or from two sticks of wood rubbed against each other, even so are creatures generated from the combination of the thirty tattvas. Indeed, as you see your own body in your body, and your soul in your own soul, why is it that you do not see your own body and soul in the bodies and souls of others?

If it is true that you can identify yourself with others, why did you ask me who I am and whose? If it is true that you, O king, are free from the shackle of duality that says, ‘this is mine and this other is not mine’, then what use are such questions as ‘who are you, whose are you and from where do you come?’

What indications of mukti can be said to be in a king who acts as others act towards enemies and allies and neutrals, and in victory and truce and war? What signs of mukti occur in him who does not know the true nature of the aggregate of three, dharma, artha and kama as manifested in seven ways in all deeds and who, on that account, is attached to that aggregate of three?

What indications of mukti exist in him who fails to cast an equal eye on the agreeable, on the weak, and the strong? You are unworthy, and your pretence of mukti should be put down by your advisors.

With so many faults, your efforts to attain emancipation is like the use of medicine by a patient who indulges in all kinds of forbidden foods and practices. Parantapa, reflecting upon spouses and other sources of attachment, one should find these in one’s own soul. What else can be regarded as the indication of mukti?

Listen now to me as I speak fully of these and certain other minute sources of attachment pertaining to the four well-known actions of sleeping, pleasure, eating and dressing to which you are still bound though you profess have adopted mukti dharma.

That man who has to rule the whole world must, indeed, be an absolute king without a second. He is obliged to live in only a single palace. In that palace he has again only one sleeping chamber. In that chamber he has only one bed to lie on. Half that bed again he is obliged to give to his queen. This may serve as an example of how little a king’s share is of all he is said to own.

This is the case with his objects of enjoyment, with the food he eats and with the garments he wears. He is thus attached to a very limited share of all things. Again, he is attached to the duties of rewarding and punishing.

The king is always dependent on others. He enjoys a very small share of all that he is supposed to own, and to that small share he is forced to be attached just as others are attached to their possessions.

In the matter of war and peace, the king is not independent. In the matter of women, of sport, and other kinds of enjoyment, the king’s inclinations and choices are very constrained. In the matter of taking counsel and in the assembly of his councillors what independence can the king be said to have?

When he commands other men, he is said to be absolutely independent. But the very next moment, his autonomy is barred by the very men whom he has commanded.

If the king wishes to sleep, he cannot satisfy his desire, thwarted as he is by those who want to transact business with him. He must sleep when permitted, and while sleeping he is obliged to wake up to attend to those that have urgent business with him. ‘Bathe, touch, drink, eat, pour libations on the fire, perform sacrifices, speak, listen’—these are the words which kings have to hear from others, and hearing them he becomes a slave to those that utter them.

Men come in groups to the king and ask him for gifts. As the guardian of the general treasury, however, he cannot make gifts to even the most deserving. If he makes these endowments, the treasury becomes exhausted. If he does not, he disappoints his solicitors who become hostile towards him. He is vexed and inimical feelings invade his mind.

If many wise and heroic and wealthy men live together, the king’s mind becomes distrustful. Even when there is no reason to fear, the king becomes fearful of those that always wait upon him. These very men also find fault with him. Behold, in what ways the king’s fears may arise from even them.

All men are kings in their own houses. All men are also householders in their own homes. Janaka, like kings, all men mete out rewards and punishments in their own homes. They, too, like kings, have sons and wives and themselves, treasuries and friends and stores. In these respects the king is not different from other men.

Like them, shouts of ‘the kingdom is ruined’, ‘the city is consumed by fire’, ‘the best of elephants is dead’, fill the king with anguish, and he yields to grief, not knowing that these impressions are all caused by ignorance and delusion.

The king is seldom free from mental suffering caused by desire, aversion and fear. He is also commonly afflicted by headaches and other similar maladies. Like others, he is troubled by the contradictory pairs of opposites like pleasure and pain. He is anxious about everything. Since the kingdom is full of enemies and impediments, the king, while he enjoys it, passes sleepless nights.

Sovereignty is thus blessed with an extremely small share of happiness, while it is imbued with great misery. It is as insubstantial and fleeting as burning flames fed by straw or bubbles seen on water.

Who would actually like to gain sovereignty, or having acquired it ever hope to win tranquillity? You regard this kingdom and this palace to be yours. You think that this army, this treasury and these advisors are yours. In reality, whose are they, and whose are they not?

Allies, ministers, the capital, the provinces, punishment, the treasury, and the king, these seven constitute the limbs of a kingdom and, depending upon one another, stand like pillars that together support one another and the kingdom. The merits of each are complemented by the merits of the others.

Which of them are superior to the rest? At certain times, some particular ones are regarded as more distinguished than the rest, when some important end is served through their agency. Superiority, for the time being, is said to belong to that which is most effective.

These seven limbs, along with the three others, form an aggregate of ten, support one another, and enjoy the kingdom like the king himself.

That king who is filled with great energy, and who is firmly attached to the Kshatriya dharma, should be satisfied with only a tenth part of the produce of his subject's field. Some kings are seen to be content with less than a tenth part of such produce. There is no one who owns the kingly office without someone else also owning it in the world; there is no kingdom without a king.

If there be no kingdom, there can be no righteousness, and if there be no dharma, from where can mukti arise? The most sacred and highest merit belongs to kings and kingdoms.

By ruling a kingdom well, a king earns the punya that attaches to the Aswamedha yagna with the whole earth given away as dakshina. But how many kings are there who rule wisely? Janaka, I can mention hundreds and thousands of faults like these that attach to kings and kingdoms. Then, again, when I have no real connection with even my body, how then can I be said to have any contact with the bodies of others?

You cannot charge me with having attempted to bring about varnasamkarsana, a mixing of castes. Have you not heard the mukti dharma explained in its entirety by Panchasikha, together with its means, its methods, its practices and its conclusion?

If you have prevailed over all your bonds and freed yourself from all attachments, may I ask you, O king, why do you still keep your connections with this royal chatra and these other symbols of sovereignty? I think you have not listened to the shastras, or that you have listened to them without any benefit, or, perhaps, you have listened to some other works passing for the shastras.

It seems that you have mere worldly knowledge, and that like an ordinary man of the world you are bound by the bonds of touch, wives, palaces and the like. If it be true that you have been emancipated from all bonds, what harm have I done you by entering your body with only my intellect?

With Yatis, among all varnas men, the custom is to live in uninhabited, deserted places. What harm then have I done, and to whom, by entering your understanding which is truly of real knowledge? I have not touched you, Rajan, with my hands, or arms, or feet, or thighs, or with any other part of my body.

You are born into a high race. You are modest. You have foresight. Whether the act has been good or bad, my entrance into your body has been a private one, concerning us two only. Was it not improper for you to publish that private act before your whole court?

These Brahmanas are all worthy of reverence. They are the foremost of gurus. Being their king, you are also entitled to their respect. Paying them reverence, you are deserving of receiving reverence from them.

Reflecting on all this, if you really know propriety with respect to speech, it was not right for you, before these foremost Brahmanas, to proclaim the fact of this intercourse between two persons of opposite sexes.

King of Mithila, I stay within you without touching you at all even as a drop of water stays on a lotus-leaf without wetting it. Despite the instructions of Panchasikha of the pravarajya, the mendicant order, your knowledge has become abstracted from the sensual objects to which it relates.

It is clear that while you have given up the grihasta way of life you have not yet attained mukti that is so difficult to achieve. You linger between the two, pretending that you have reached the goal of muktas.

The contact of one who is emancipated with another that is also free, or Purusha with Prakriti, cannot lead to an intermingling of the kind you dread. Only those who regard the Atman to be identical with the body, and who think that the varnas and asramas are really different from one another, err in supposing such an intermixing to be possible.

My body is different from yours. But my Atman is not different from your soul. When I am able to realise this, I have not the slightest doubt that my Buddhi is really not dwelling in yours, though I have entered into you by yoga.

A pot is carried in the hand. In the pot is milk. On the milk is a fly. Though the hand and pot, the pot and milk, and the milk and the fly, exist together, yet are they all distinct from each other. The pot does not share the nature of the milk. Nor does the milk have the nature of the fly. The condition of each is independent, and can never be altered by the condition of that other with which it may temporarily exist.

In this manner, varna and dharma, though they may exist together with and in one who is emancipated, do not really attach to him. How then can varnasamkarsana result from this union of ours?

Then, again, my varna is not superior to yours. I am not a Vaisya, nor a Sudra. I am, O king, of the same varna as you, born of a pure race. There was once a Rajarishi known as Pradhana. It is clear that you have heard of him. I am born in his vamsa, and my name is Sulabha.

Indra, accompanied by Drona and Satasringa and Chakradwara, and other great mountains, would attend the yagnas performed by my ancestors. Being born in such a vamsa, it was established that no fitting husband could be found for me. I was then instructed in the moksha dharma and now I wander over the earth alone, practising sannyasa.

I do not practise any hypocrisy in the matter of the life of renunciation. I am not a thief that appropriates what belongs to others. I do not confuse the practices of the different varnas. I am firm in the practices of that mode of life to which I properly belong. I am firm and resolute in my vows.

I never utter any word without reflecting on its propriety. Rajan, I did not come to you without careful deliberation. Having heard that your understanding has been purified by the kukti dharma, I came here to derive some benefit from it. Indeed, I came to ask you about emancipation.

I do not say this to glorify myself and humiliate my opponents. But I say it, impelled by sincerity alone. What I say is, he that is emancipated never indulges in that intellectual battle which is implied by a dialectical disputation for the sake of victory. He, on the other hand, is really liberated who devotes himself to Brahman, that sole seat of peace.

As a person of the mendicant order resides for only one night in an empty house, leaving the next morning, I too, shall remain for this one night in your body, which is like an empty chamber, destitute of knowledge.

You have honoured me with both speech and other offers that are due from a host to a guest. Having slept this one night in your body, O ruler of Mithila, which is as it were my own chamber now, I shall depart tomorrow."

Bhishma continues, 'Hearing these words full of reason and excellent sense, King Janaka failed to give any answer.'

CANTO 322

"Yudhishtira says, 'How was Suka, the son of Vyasa, in ancient days, won over to renunciation? I want to hear you narrate the story. My curiosity in this matter is irrepressible. You of the Kuru vamsa, it is fitting for you to instruct me about the conclusions in respect of the unmanifest, the cause, the manifest, the effects, and of the truth, and about Brahman that is in them, but unattached to them, as also of the acts of the Swayambhu Narayana, as you know them.'

Bhishma says, 'Beholding his son Suka living fearlessly as ordinary men do in practices that are considered harmless by them, Vyasa taught him all the Vedas and then discoursed to him one day in these words:

Vyasa said, "O son, becoming a master of the senses, do you suppress extreme cold and heat, hunger and thirst, and the wind also, and having subdued them, as yogins do, do you practise dharma? Do you duly observe truth and sincerity, and freedom from wrath and malice, and self-restraint and tapasya, and the duties of benevolence and compassion?

Do you pursue the truth, firmly devoted to righteousness, abandoning all sort of insincerity and deceit? Do you sustain yourself on vighasa, what remains of food after feeding the Devas and Atithis?

Your body is as transitory as the bubbles on the surface of water. The Jivatman sits unattached in it as a bird on a tree. The companionship of all agreeable objects is extremely short-lived. Why then, O son, do you sleep in such forgetfulness?

Your enemies are attentive and alert and ever ready to spring on you, always waiting for their chance. Why are you so foolish as to not know this?

As the days pass, one after another, your life is always being reduced. Indeed when your life is being incessantly shortened, why do you not hurry to learn the means of saving yourself?

Only they that are lacking in faith in the existence of the next life set their hearts on things of this world that only have the effect of increasing flesh and blood. They are totally unmindful of all that is concerned with the next world. Those men that are bewildered by erroneous understandings display a hatred for dharma.

The man who follows misguided persons who have adopted devious and sinful paths is equally afflicted by the ways of sin. Mahatmans, however, who are content, devoted to the scriptures, and possessed of immense power, pursue the path of righteousness.

Do you wait upon them with reverence and seek their instruction. Do you act according to the teachings of those wise men whose eyes are set upon dharma. With your understanding cleansed by such lessons and rendered superior, do you then restrain your heart which is ever ready to deviate from the right course.

They whose Buddhi is always concerned with the present, who fearlessly regard the future as something remote; they who do not observe any restrictions in the matter of food are really foolish men who fail to understand that this world is only a temporary field of trial.

Repairing to the flight of steps of dharma, climb those steps one after another. At present you are like a worm that weaves its cocoon around itself and so depriving itself of all means of escape.

Do you keep to your left, without any scruple, the atheist who transgresses all restraints, and courts destruction, who stands like a house beside a fierce and surging river, and who, to others, appears to stand like a bamboo with its tall head erect in pride.

Using the raft of yoga, cross the ocean of the world, this samsara, whose waters are constituted of your five senses. Its fierce monsters are moha, krodha and mrityu—desire, wrath and death; its vortex is janma, birth itself. With the raft of dharma, you must traverse the world affected by death and afflicted by decay, and upon which the thunder-bolts of days and nights fall incessantly.

Death seeks you at all moments, whether you are sitting or lying down; it is certain that you will be death's victim at any time. From where then will you find your rescue? Like the she-wolf taking a lamb, death snatches away one that is still engaged in earning wealth and still unsatiated in the indulgence of his pleasures.

When you are destined to enter into the dark, you hold up the blazing lamp of righteous understanding, whose flame has been kindled. Falling into various forms one after another in the world of men, a creature obtains the birth of a Brahmana with great difficulty. You have obtained that birth. Son, endeavour to maintain it properly.

A Brahmana has not been born for the gratification of desire. On the other hand, his body is intended to be subjected to mortification and penances in this world so that incomparable happiness may be his in the next. The status of Brahmanatva is acquired with the help of long, sustained and austere tapasya.

Having acquired that condition, one should never waste one's time in the indulgence of one's senses. Always engaged in penances and self-restraint, and desiring what is good for you, live and act in peace and serenity.

The life of every man is like a horse. The nature of that steed is Avyakta, unmanifest. The sixteen elements constitute its body. Its character is most subtle.

Kshanas, and trutis, and nimeshas are the hair on its body. The sandhyas, the twilights, constitute its shoulder joints. The light and the dark fortnights are its two eyes of equal power. Months are its other limbs.

That steed runs incessantly. If your eyes be not blind, see that charger race forward on its invisible course; set your heart on dharma, after hearing what your gurus have to say on the subject of the next world.

They that fall away from dharma and those who conduct themselves recklessly, who always display malice towards others and take to sin, are obliged to assume physical bodies in the regions of Yama and suffer diverse afflictions and torments.

That king who is devoted to dharma and who protects the good and punishes the evil, with discrimination, attains to those regions that belong to men of righteous deeds. Through diverse kinds of good karma, he attains to such faultless felicity which cannot be acquired by even thousands of births.

Furious dogs of frightful mien, crows with iron beaks, flocks of ravens and vultures and other dark birds, and blood-sucking worms torment the man who transgresses the commands of his parents and preceptors when he goes to hell after death. That sinful wretch who, because of his recklessness, violates the ten boundaries that have been fixed by Swayambhu himself is obliged to pass his time in great suffering in the wild wastelands in the dominions of the king of Pitris.

That greedy man, who is in love with falsehood, who always takes delight in deception and cheating, and who injures others by practising hypocrisy and deceit, has to go to a bottomless hell and suffer great anguish and tortures for his sins.

Such a man is forced to bathe in the broad Vaitarani river whose waters are boiling, to enter into a forest of trees whose leaves are as sharp as swords, and then to lie on a bed of battle-axes. He has thus to pass his days in dreadful hell in great agony.

You see only the regions of Brahma and other deities, but you are blind to that which is the highest—mukti! Alas, you are also blind to old age and decay that are followed by death.

Go along the path of mukti! Why do you delay? A frightful terror, destructive of your happiness, lies before you. Take swift steps to achieve liberation.

Soon after death you are sure to be taken before Yama. To obtain felicity in the next world, strive to attain to righteousness through the practice of difficult and austere vratas.

Regardless of the sufferings of others, the all-powerful Yama takes the lives of all, yours and your friends'. No one can resist him. Very soon the wind of Yama will blow and bear you into his presence. Very soon you will be taken to that dread presence all alone.

Do you achieve here what will be for your good there. Where now is that death-wind which will blow before you very soon? Are you mindful of it? Very soon, when that moment arrives, the points of the horizon will begin to spin before your eyes. Are you mindful of that?

O son, soon the Vedas will vanish from your sight as you are helplessly sucked into that terrifying presence. Set your heart, then, on that most excellent yoga of mukti. Seek to attain that sole treasure so that, after death, you will not have to grieve at the recollection of your former deeds, good and evil, all of which are characterised by error.

Decrepitude very soon weakens your body and robs you of your limbs, strength and beauty. Therefore, seek that unique treasure. Very soon the Destroyer, with disease for his sarathy, in order to take your life, will pierce and break your body with a mighty hand. Practise, then, austere penance.

Very soon those terrible wolves, which reside within your body, will attack you from every side. Endeavour, therefore, to achieve acts of righteousness. Very soon all alone, you will behold a thick darkness, and very soon you will see golden trees on the top of the mountain. Swiftly you must perform deeds of dharma.

Very soon your evil companions and enemies, your senses, dressed in the guise of friends, will swerve you from true vision. Do you, then, strive to achieve that which is of the highest good.

Earn that wealth which has no fear from either kings or thieves, and which one does not have to abandon even at death. Earned by one's own actions, that wealth has never to be shared with others. In the other world, each enjoys that which he has earned for himself.

O son, give that to others by which they may be able to live in the next world. Also set yourself to acquiring that wealth which is indestructible and eternal.

Do not think that you should first enjoy all kinds of pleasures and then turn your heart towards mukti, for before you are satiated with enjoyment you may be overtaken by death. In view of this, hasten to do acts of goodness.

Neither mother nor son, nor relatives, nor dear friends, even when implored honourably, accompany the man who dies. One has to go oneself, unaccompanied, to the regions of Yama.

Only those deeds, good and bad, that one did before dying, accompany the man into the other world. The gold and riches that one has earned by good and bad means do not benefit one when one's body meets with dissolution.

There is no better witness than the Atman, of all actions done or not done in life, of men that have gone to the other world. When the acting Chaitanya, the Jivatman, enters into the witness Chaitanya the destruction of the body takes place; this is seen by yoga-buddhi when yogins enter the firmament of their hearts.

Even here, Agni, Surya and Vayu, these three Devas, reside in the body. Beholding as they do all the deeds and practices of one's life, they become one's witnesses.

Days and nights, the former characterised by the virtue of revealing all things and the latter by concealing all things, run incessantly; touching all things they reduce their allotted periods of life.

Therefore, be observant of the duties of your own varna. The road in the other world, leading to the realms of Yama, is infested by many enemies in the form of iron-beaked birds and wolves, and by many repulsive and terrifying insects and worms.

Take care of your own actions, for only these will accompany you along that road. One does not share one's karma with others, but everyone enjoys or endures the fruits of his own actions.

As Apsaras and Maharishis attain to fruits of great felicity, in the same manner, men of righteous deeds, as the fruits of their respective righteous acts, obtain in the other world chariots of transcendent radiance that move everywhere at the will of the riders. Men of taintless deeds, cleansed souls and pure birth obtain the fruits, in the next world, which correspond with their own righteous acts in this life.

By walking along the high road marked by the duties of grihasta, men acquire happy ends and attain to the region of Prajapati or Brihaspati, or of him of a hundred yagnas. I can give you thousands and thousands of instructions. Know, however, that dharma, the mighty cleanser, keeps all foolish persons in the dark.

You have passed twenty-four years. You are now full twenty-five years of age. Your years are passing away. Do you begin to lay your store of righteousness. The Destroyer that dwells within error and heedlessness will very soon deprive your senses of their powers. Relying on your body alone, swiftly perform your duties before that consummation comes.

When it is your duty to go along that road on which you alone shall be in front and you alone behind, what need then do you have of either your body or your wife and children?

When men have to go by themselves, without companions, to the land of Yama, it is clear that in view of such a terrifying situation, you should seek to acquire that one unique treasure—dharma or yogasamadhi. The puissant Yama, regardless of the afflictions of others, snatches away and uproots the friends and relatives of one's vamsa. There is no one that can thwart him.

Seek to gather a stock of righteousness. Son, I impart to you these lessons that are all in accord with the shastras I follow. Observe them by acting according to their truth.

He who supports his body by following the duties laid down for his varna, and who gives dakshina to earn whatever fruits may attach to such deeds, is freed from the consequences born of ignorance and delusion. The knowledge which a man of righteous deeds acquires from Vedic practices leads to omniscience.

That omniscience is identical with moksha dharma, the vigyana of the highest object of human acquisition. Instruction in this, imparted to the grateful, is beneficial for it leads to the attainment of emancipation.

The pleasure that one takes in living amidst the dwellings of men is truly a shackle that binds fast. Breaking that shackle, men of righteous deeds repair to regions of great felicity. Evil men, however, fail to break that bond.

Since you have to die, what use have you of wealth, or of relatives, or with children? Employ yourself in searching for your soul which is hidden in a cave. Where have all your grandsires gone?

Do today that which you would keep for tomorrow. Do that in the morning which you would defer for the afternoon. Death does not wait for anyone, to see whether he has or has not accomplished his tasks. Following the body after one's death to the cremation ground, one's relatives and kinsmen and friends return quickly after throwing it on the funeral pyre.

Without hesitation avoid those who are sceptics, who are without compassion, and who are attached to evil ways; endeavour to seek, without listlessness or apathy, that which is for your highest good. When, therefore, the world is afflicted by death, do you wholeheartedly achieve dharma, aided all the while by unswerving patience.

That man who is conversant with the means of attaining mukti and who discharges his svadharma, certainly attains to great felicity in the other world. There is no destruction for you who never stray from the path of dharma and do not recognise death in the attainment of a different body.

He who increases his store of righteousness is truly wise. He who, on the other hand, falls away from dharma is said to be a fool. One who is engaged in doing good deeds attains swarga and other rewards as the fruits of those deeds; but he who is given to evil ways has to sink into naraka.

Having acquired the human condition, so difficult to attain, which is the stepping-stone to heaven, one should fix one's soul on the Brahman so that one may not once more fall away. One whose understanding, directed towards the path to swarga, does not stray from it, is regarded by the wise as a man of dharma, and when he dies his friends should indeed grieve.

The man whose understanding is not restless and is directed to Brahman, and who has attained swarga, is freed from naraka, a great terror. They who are born in the asramas of sannyasis and die there, do not earn much punya by abstaining from enjoyments and the indulgence of desire even for their entire lives.

However, he who possessing objects of pleasure casts them off and engages himself in tapasya succeeds in acquiring everything. I regard the fruits of the penances of such a man to be much higher.

There have been, and will be, hundreds and thousands of mothers and fathers, sons and wives in this world. Who, however, were they and whose are we? I am quite alone. I have no one whom I may call mine. Nor do I belong to anyone else. I do not see that person whose I am, nor do I see him whom I may call mine. They have nothing to do with you. You have nothing to do with them.

All creatures are born according to their karma, their acts of past lives. You, too, will go hence and be born into a new varna determined by your own deeds. In this world we see that the friends and followers of only those that are rich show devotion to the rich. The friends and followers of the poor fall away during their very lifetime.

Man commits countless heinous sins for the sake of his wife and children. From those evil deeds he derives much distress both now and in the next world. The wise man beholds the world of life destroyed by the actions of every living being.

Therefore, O son, act according to all the instructions I have given you!

The man of true vision, seeing this world to be only a field of karma, action, should, from desire of felicity in the next world, do good deeds. Time exerts his irresistible power, and cooks all creatures in his own cauldron with his ladle made of months and seasons, using the sun for his fire, and days and nights for his fuel; these days and nights are the witnesses of the fruits of every creature's karma.

Of what use is that wealth which is not given away and which is not enjoyed? For what purpose is that strength which is not employed in resisting or subjugating one's enemies? For what purpose is that knowledge of the scriptures which does not compel one to righteous deeds? And for what purpose is that atman which does not subdue the senses and abstain from evil?"'

Bhishma continues, ‘Having heard these most beneficial words spoken by the island-born Vyasa, Suka leaves his father and goes forth to seek a guru who could teach him the moksha dharma.’”

"Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, if there is any value in dakshina, yagnas, and in tapasya well-performed, and in obedience rendered to gurus and other revered elders, speak to me of them.'

Bhishma says, 'An understanding, associated with evil, causes the mind to fall into sin. In this state one taints one's actions, and then falls into great misery.

Those who sin have to be born into the most indigent circumstances. They move from famine to famine, from pain to pain, and from fear to fear. They are deader than those who are dead.

Those who are possessed of bhakti, self-restrained and devoted to dharma, are prosperous, and go forth from joy to joy, from heaven to heaven, from bliss to bliss. Unbelievers have to pass, with groping hands, through realms infested by beasts of prey and elephants, and pathless tracts teeming with snakes and robbers and other terrors. What more need be said of these?

On the other hand, those who revere the Devas and Atithis, are generous, considerate to the virtuous, and offer dakshina in yagnas, walk on the path of felicity that belongs to men of cleansed and subdued souls. Those who are unrighteous will not be counted among men even as grains without kernel are not counted as grain, and as cockroaches are not counted among birds.

One's deeds follow one even when one runs fast. As the doer lays himself down, so also do his actions lie with him. Indeed, one's sins sit when the doer sits, and run when he runs. The sins act when the doer acts, and, in fact follow him like his very shadow. The doer's karma, by whatever means and under whatever circumstances, endures, and is sure to be enjoyed or endured with respect of its fruits by the doer in his next life.

From every side time always drags along all creatures, duly observing the laws of the distance to which they are flung, which is in keeping with their actions. As flowers and fruits, without being urged, never fail to blossom and appear at their proper time, even so one's past deeds make their appearance at their time.

Honour and dishonour, gain and loss, destruction and growth, are seen to set in. No one can resist them. None endure, for disappearance follows appearance.

The sorrows one suffers is the result of one's karma. The happiness one enjoys flows from one's karma. From the time when one lies within a mother's womb one begins to enjoy and suffer one's deeds of a past life. The consequences of good and evil deeds of one's childhood, youth, or old age are experienced in one's next life at the same ages.

As the calf recognises its mother among thousands of her kind, one's past exploits, without doubt, seek one out in one's next life, unerringly, although one may live among thousands of one's kind. As a piece of dirty cloth is whitened by being washed in water, in the same manner, cleansed by continuous exposure to the fire of fasts and penances, the righteous at last attain to unending bliss.

You of high intelligence, the desires and purposes of those whose sins have been washed away by sustained and well-performed tapasya are crowned with fruition. The path of the righteous cannot be discerned even as that of birds in the sky or that of fishes in water.

There is no need to speak ill of others, or to talk about the fall of others. On the other hand, one should always do what is pleasing, agreeable, and beneficial to one's own self.'"

CANTO 324

"Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, O Pitamaha, how Mahatman Suka of austere penances was born as the son of Vyasa, and how did he succeed in attaining the highest goal? Which woman bore the son of Vyasa, rich in tapodhana? We do not know who Suka's mother was, nor do we know anything of the birth of that high-souled sannyasi. How was it that, when he was a mere boy, his mind became entirely drawn to the knowledge of the subtle Brahman?

Indeed, in this world, there is no other in whom such predilections have been marked at so early an age. I want to hear all this in detail. I am never satiated by your excellent and amrita-like words. Pitamaha, tell me, in their proper order, of Suka's greatness and knowledge, and of his union with the Paramatman!'

Bhishma says, 'The Rishis did not make punya depend upon life span, or decay, or wealth, or friends. They said that he who studied the Vedas was great. What you wish to know is rooted in tapasya.

Son of Pandu, that tapa rises from the subjugation of the senses. Without doubt, one errs in giving the reins of one's life to one's senses. It is only by restraining them that one finds true success.

The merit that attaches to a thousand Aswamedha yagnas or a hundred Vajapeyas is not even a sixteenth of the punya that arises from yoga. I will now tell you about the circumstances of Suka's birth, the fruits of his tapasya, and what he achieved by his deeds, subjects that cannot be grasped by those of uncleansed souls.

Once upon a time on Meru's peak, Mahadeva, adorned with karnikara flowers, sported with his terrible ganas. The daughter of Himavat-king of the mountains, Devi Parvati, was also there. Near that peak, the island-born Vyasa practised extraordinary austerities.

O best of the Kurus, using yoga he withdrew himself into his own Atman, engaged in dharana, and performed many penances to have a son. He addressed Mahadeva with a prayer "O puissant one, let me have a son who will have the power of Agni and Bhumi, Jala, Vayu and Akasa." Engaged in the most austere tapasya, the Rishi begged Siva, who cannot be supplicated by men of impure souls, using not words but his yoga-shakti.

The mighty Vyasa remained there for a hundred years, surviving on air alone, engaged in adoring Mahadeva of multifarious form, the lord of Uma. There stood all the Devarishis and Rajarishis and the Lokapalas and the Sadhyas along with the Vasus, and the Adityas, the Rudras, and Surya and Chandramas, and the Maruts, and the oceans, and the rivers and the Aswins, the Devas, the Gandharvas, and Narada and Parvata and the Gandharva Viswavasu, and the Siddhas, and the Apsaras.

There sat Mahadeva, also known as Rudra, decked with an excellent garland of karnikara flowers, blazing with effulgence like the moon with his rays. In those delightful, divine forests, peopled with Devas and heavenly Rishis, Maharishi Vyasa remained, engaged in high yoga dhyana, in order to obtain a son. His strength did not diminish, nor did he feel any pain.

The three worlds gazed at this penance in amazement. While the Rishi, of immeasurable energy, sat in yoga, his matted locks, in consequence of his tejas, were seen to burn like flames of fire. I heard this from the illustrious Markandeya. He would always narrate to me the exploits of the Devas. It is on account of that tejas that the matted jata of the Mahatman Krishna-Dwaipayana to this day seem to be of the colour of fire.

Gratified with the Rishi's tapasya and his fervent bhakti, Mahadeva resolved to grant him his wish. The three-eyed one smiled with pleasure, and said to him, "O island-born one, you will get a son as you wish! Possessed of greatness, he shall be as pure as Agni, as Vayu, as Bhumi, as Jala and as Akasa! He will possess the Consciousness of his being Brahman; his understanding and soul shall be devoted to Brahman, and he shall completely depend upon Brahman even so that he will be merged and one with Brahman!'"

"Bhishma says, 'Having obtained this great boon from Mahadeva, one day the son of Satyavati was rubbing sticks to make a fire. While thus engaged, the illustrious Rishi saw the Apsara Ghritachi, who, because of her tejas, was of arresting beauty. Yudhishtira, seeing her in that forest Vyasa was overcome with desire.

Seeing the Rishi's heart aflame with by desire, Ghritachi transformed herself into a she-parrot and flew to that place. Although Vyasa now saw the Apsara in another form, his desire did not subside but spread over every part of his body.

Summoning all his patience, the Muni tried to suppress his desire; despite all his effort, however, Vyasa could not control his agitated mind. With fate moving him, inexorably, the Rishi's heart was smitten by Ghritachi's beautiful form.

To repress his lust, he earnestly continued with the task of making a fire, yet he helplessly ejaculated and his seed fell onto the ground. That best of Dvijas, however, continued to rub the sticks without feeling any misgivings for what had happened. From the seed that fell, a son was born to him, called Suka. It is because of these circumstances attending his birth that he was named Suka, after the parrot. Indeed, for the form his mother took, he himself often assumed a great parrot's head!

Thus, from the two arani sticks his father used for kindling a fire, was born that greatest of Rishi, and the highest of yogins. As in a yagna a blazing fire sheds its radiance all around when libations of ghee are poured upon it, so did Suka take his birth, radiating effulgence because of his own tejas.

Son of Kuru, assuming the excellent form and complexion of his father, Suka, of pure soul, shone like a smokeless fire. The greatest of rivers, the Ganga in her embodied form, came to the breast of Meru and bathed Suka after his birth with her sacred waters.

An ascetic's staff and a dark deer-skin fell from the sky for Mahatman Suka. The Gandharvas sang, the diverse tribes of Apsaras danced, and divine booming drums sounded. The Gandharva Viswavasu, and Tumburu and Varada, and others called Haha, and Huhu, eulogised the birth of Suka.

There arrived the Lokapalas with Sakra at their head, as also the other Devas and the Devarishis. Vayu rained showers of divine flowers upon the place. The entire universe, mobile and immobile, was infused with surging joy.

Accompanied by the Devi, and moved by love, Mahadeva of great refulgence came there, and soon after the birth of the Muni's son himself invested him with the sacred thread. Sakra lovingly bestowed upon him a celestial kamandalu of great beauty, and divine raiment.

Hamsas and satapatras and kraunchas in their thousands, and many sukas and chasas, O Bhaarata, wheeled over his head. Blessed with great splendour and intelligence, Suka, having obtained his birth from the two fire-sticks, continued to live there, engaged the while in the attentive observance of many vratas and upavasas.

As soon as Suka was born, the Vedas with all their mysteries and all their antas, came to dwell in him, even as they did in Vyasa. For all that, remembering the universal practice, Suka selected Brihaspati, who knew all the Vedas together with their angas, as his guru.

Having studied all the Vedas together with all their mysteries and abstractions, as also all the itihasas and the Artha Shastra, the Mahamuni Suka returned home, after paying his guru dakshina. Adopting the vow of a Brahmacharin, he then began practising the most severe tapasya, focusing all his being in dhyana.

In even his childhood, he came to be revered by the Devas and Rishis for his knowledge and penances. The mind of the great Muni, Rajan, took no pleasure in the three asramas of life, including the grihasta; his heart was set on just the mukti dharma.'"

"Bhishma says, 'Thinking of mukti, Suka humbly approached his father and desiring to achieve his highest good, he saluted his great guru and said, "You are well versed in the mukti dharma. O illustrious one, discourse to me upon it, so that my mind may achieve the supreme peace."

Hearing his son's words, the Maharishi said to him, "Son, you must study the mukti dharma and all the various duties of life."

At his father's command, Suka, that foremost of men of dharma, mastered all the treatises on yoga, and also the Samkhya vigyana of Kapila. When Vyasa saw his son to be possessed with the knowledge of the Vedas, infused with the tejas of Brahman, and fully conversant with the mukti dharma, he said to him, "Go to Janaka, the ruler of Mithila. He will show you the way to your mukti."

Suka went forth to Mithila to ask its king about the truth of dharma and the refuge of emancipation. Before he set out, his sire further told him, "Go there by that path which ordinary men take. Do not use your yoga shakti which lets you fly through the skies."

Being humble by nature, Suka was not at all surprised by this. He was further told to go there with simplicity and not from any desire for pleasure: "Along your way do not seek friends and wives, since they are the causes of attachment to the world.

Although we preside over his yagnas, do not regard yourself superior to Janaka while you stay with him. Obey him and live under his direction. He alone will dispel all your doubts.

The king of Mithila is well versed in all dharma and fully knows the mukti shastras. He is one at whose yagnas I officiate. Without any hesitation, do what says."

Thus instructed, the righteous-souled Suka went to Mithila on foot although he was able to traverse through the skies over the whole earth with her seas. Passing over many hills and mountains, many rivers and lakes, and countless forests abounding with beasts of prey and other feral animals, he crossed the two Varshas of Meru and Hari successively and next the Varsha of Himavat, and came at last to the Varsha known by the name of Bharata.

Having seen many kingdoms inhabited by Chins and Huns, Mahamuni Suka at last reached Aryavarta. Obeying his father's commands and bearing them constantly in his mind, he gradually passed along his way over the earth like a bird passing through the air. Going through many delightful towns and thronging cities, he saw diverse kinds of wealth but waited not to observe them.

On his way he crossed many delightful gardens and many sacred waters. Soon he reached the realm of the Videhas that was protected by the virtuous Mahatman Janaka. There he saw many populous villages, and many kinds of food and drink and habitations of cowherds swelling with men and many herds of kine.

He saw many fields abounding with rice, barley and other grain, and many lakes inhabited by swans and cranes and adorned with beautiful lotuses. Passing through the Videha country with its prosperous subjects, he arrived at the wonderful gardens of Mithila rich with many species of trees.

Full of elephants and horses and chariots, and men and women, he passed by them without pausing to observe any of them closely. Bearing the thought, and ceaselessly dwelling upon it—the desire to master the mukti dharma—Suka of the cheerful soul who took his joy in only dhyana thus reached Mithila at last.

At the gate, he sent word through the dwarapalakas. Calm, devoted to dhyana and yoga, he entered the city, after having obtained permission. Walking down the main highway full of fine, rich men, he reached the king's palace and entered it without hesitation.

The guards forbade him with rough words. Without any anger, Suka stopped and waited. Neither the sun nor the long distance he had walked had fatigued him in the least. Neither hunger nor thirst, nor the exertion he had made, had weakened him. The heat of the sun had not seared him, or pained him even slightly.

Among those guards there was one who felt compassion for him, to see him stand there himself like the brilliant midday Surya. Worshipping him with due form and revering him properly, with folded hands he led him to the first chamber of the palace.

Seated there alone, Suka began to meditate on mukti. Possessed of serene splendour he looked with an equal eye upon both a shady spot and one exposed to the sun's rays. Soon, Janaka's minister came up to him with folded hands and led him to the second chamber of the palace.

That chamber led to a spacious garden which formed a part of the inner apartments of the palace. It looked like a second Chaitraratha. Beautiful pools of water he saw here and there, at regular intervals. Lustrous trees, all in bloom, graced the garden.

Women of transcendent beauty were in attendance. The minister led Suka from the second chamber to that enchanted place. Ordering those damsels to give the Muni a seat, the minister left him there.

Those exquisite women were young, of beautiful forms and faces, and shapely hips; they were clad in fine red raiment, decked with ornaments of burnished gold. They were skilled in pleasing conversation and maddening revelry, and thorough mistresses of the arts of singing and dancing.

Always smiling, they were equal to the very Apsaras in beauty. Accomplished in all the ways of dalliance, consummate in reading the thoughts of men upon whom they waited, fifty young women, of high varna and of easy virtue, surrounded Suka the ascetic.

Giving him padya, water to wash his feet, and worshipping him respectfully with the usual offerings or arghya, they gratified him with excellent foodstuffs suitable to the season. After he had eaten, one after another, they singly led him through the grounds, showing him every thing of beauty and interest, O Bhaarata. So knowing of the thoughts of all men, sporting and laughing and singing, they entertained that auspicious Muni of noble soul.

The pure-souled ascetic born from the two aranis, dutiful, having perfect control over all his senses, and a thorough master of his wrath, was neither pleased nor annoyed at all this. Then those foremost of beautiful women gave him an excellent asana to sit upon.

Washing his feet and his limbs, Suka said his sandhya vandana, his evening prayers, sat on that fine seat, and began to think of the object for which he had come there. In the first part of the night, he devoted himself to yoga. The puissant ascetic passed the middle portion of the night in sleep. Waking from his slumber, he went through the necessary rites of cleansing his body, and though surrounded by those beautiful women, he once again dedicated himself to yoga.

It was in this way, O Bhaarata, that the son of the island-born Vyasa passed the second half of that day and the whole of that night in the palace of King Janaka.'"

CANTO 327

"Bhishma says, 'The next morning, King Janaka, accompanied by his minister and his whole household, and with his priest going before him, came to Suka. Bringing with him costly asanas and diverse kinds of jewels and riches, and bearing the ingredients of the arghya on his own head, the monarch approached the son of his revered guru.

The king took that beautiful and costly asana, decked with jewels and overlaid with gold, from his priest, and, with his own hands, presented it with great reverence to Suka. After the son of the island-born Krishna had sat upon it, Janaka worshipped him according to prescribed kriyas.

He first offered him padya to wash his feet, and then gave him the arghya and kine as dakshina. The Muni accepted that worship offered with due kriyas and mantras. That Dvijottama accepted the worship and the cows the king offered and saluted the monarch.

Possessed of great tejas, he asked after Janaka's wellbeing and prosperity. Suka also included in his enquiry the wellbeing of the king's followers and ministers. With Suka's permission, Janaka sat down with all his party.

Of high birth and blessed with a high soul, the king of Mithila, with folded hands, sat down on the bare ground and in turn enquired after the wellbeing and unabated prosperity of Vyasa's son. Janaka then asked his guest about the purpose of his visit.

Suka said, "Be you blessed; my father said to me that his Yajamana, the ruler of the Videhas, known the world over by the name of Janaka, is well-versed in the mukti dharma. He commanded me to come to him promptly, if

I ever wanted to dispel any doubts in the matter of the dharma of either Pravritti or Nivritti.

He gave me to understand that the king of Mithila would dispel all my doubts. I have, therefore, come here, at the command of my sire, for the purpose of learning from you. It is fitting for you, O foremost of all righteous ones, to instruct me!

What is the svadharma of a Brahmana, and what is the essence of mukti dharma? How is moksha to be obtained? Can it be acquired through the way of gyana or by tapasya?"

Janaka said, "Hear what the duties are for a Brahmana from the time of his birth. After his upanayana, investiture with the sacred thread, he should devote his attention to the study of the Vedas. By practising tapasya and dutifully serving his guru and observing the dharma of Brahmacharya, O puissant one, he should pay off the debt he owes to the Devas and the Pitris, and cast off all malice. Having studied the Vedas closely, subjugated his senses, and paying his guru dakshina, he should, with his guru's permission return home.

Returning home, he should adopt the grihasta way of life by marrying a woman and confining himself to her, and by freeing himself from every kind of evil, and establishing his grihapatya, his domestic fire. In this asrama, he should procreate sons and grandsons.

After that, he should retire into the forest, and continue to worship the same fires and receive guests with cordial hospitality. Living righteously in the forest, he should at last establish his fire in his Atman, and freed from all the pairs of opposites, and casting off all attachments from the soul, he should spend his days in sannyasa, otherwise known as the asrama of Brahman."

Suka said, "If one attains to such an understanding, purified by study of the scriptures and of the true conception of all things, and if the heart frees itself permanently from the effects of all pairs of contradictions, is it still necessary for one to adopt the three asramas of brahmacharya, grihasta and vanaprastha in succession? This is what I ask you. It is proper for you to tell me. O ruler of men, tell me this according to the true import of the Vedas!"

Janaka said, "Without a mind cleansed by study of the shastras and without that true conception of all things which is known by the name of vigyana, the attainment of moksha is impossible. That purified understanding, again, it is said, is unattainable without one's connection to a guru.

The guru is the helmsman, and gyana is the boat; both help one to cross samsara, the ocean of the world. After having acquired that boat, one is crowned with success; and having crossed the ocean, one may abandon both.

To prevent the destruction of all the worlds and to prevent the destruction of the karma upon which the worlds depend, the wise practised the dharma of the four asramas as the sages did in ancient days. By gradually abandoning karma, good and bad, agreeably to this order of asramas, over the course of many births, one attains mukti.

That man who, through penances performed during the course of many births, obtains a pure mind and understanding and soul is able to attain mukti in the very first stage of brahmacharya itself in a fresh birth. With a cleansed understanding, he attains mukti; with this knowledge in respect of all visible things, what further desire remains to be satisfied by observing the three other asramas?

One should always discard faults born of the gunas of rajas and tamas. Adhering to the path of sattva, one should know the self by the self. Beholding one's self in all creatures and all creatures in one's self, one should live without attachment like fish who live in water without being drenched by it.

He who succeeds in transcending all pairs of opposites and resisting their influence, succeeds in casting off every attachment, and attains to infinite bliss in the next world, going there like a bird soaring into the sky. In this connection, there is an ancient story narrated by King Yayati and remembered by all who are conversant with the shastras bearing on mukti.

The radiance of the Paramatman exists only in one's Atman, nowhere else. It is found equally in all creatures. One can see it oneself if one's heart is devoted to yoga. When a man lives in such a way that another does not fear his very sight, and when he is not himself frightened at the sight of others; when a man ceases to cherish, desire and hate, he is then said to attain to Brahman.

When a man does not sin against any creature in thought, word and deed, he then attains Brahman. By restraining the mind and the Atman, by discarding malice that darkens the mind, and by abjuring desire and torpor, one is said to reach Brahman.

When he equally respects all objects that he perceives with all his senses, and also all living creatures, and transcends all pairs of opposites, a man is then said to attain Brahman. When he casts an equal eye upon praise and censure, gold and iron, happiness and misery, heat and cold, good and evil, the agreeable and the disagreeable, life and death, he is then said to attain to Brahman.

On observing the practices of the mendicant orders, one should subdue one's senses and withdraw the mind even like a tortoise withdraws its outstretched limbs. A house cloaked in darkness can be seen with the help of a lamp; in the same manner can the Atman be kindled with the lamp of Buddhi, the understanding.

O Mahabuddhi, I see that all this knowledge already dwells in you. Whatever else should be known by one wishing to learn about the mukti dharma, you already know. O Devarishi, I am convinced that through the grace of your guru and his teachings, you have already transcended all the objects of the senses.

O Mahamuni, through your father's blessings, I have attained to omniscience, and hence know you well. Your knowledge is vaster than what you think you own. Your perceptions resulting from intuition are much greater than what you think you own. Your powers are mightier than what you are aware of.

Whether as a consequence of your tender age, or of the doubts you have been unable to dispel, or of the fear that is due to not having attained mukti, you are not conscious of that knowledge founded in intuition although it has arisen in your mind. After your doubts have been dispelled by those like me, you succeed in loosening the knots that bind your heart and then, by a righteous exertion, attain and become conscious of that gyana.

You have already acquired gyana. Your mind is calm and steady. You are free from greed and covetousness. For all that, O Brahmana, without effort you will not attain the Brahman, which is the highest acquisition.

You see no distinction between happiness and sorrow. You are not covetous. You have no longing for dance and song. You have no attachments. You have no attachment to friends. You have no fear of things that inspire fear. O blessed one, I see that you cast an equal eye upon a lump of gold and a clod of earth.

We, I and others possessed of wisdom, see you well set on the highest and indestructible path of tranquillity. You are true to the dharma which allows the Brahmana to obtain that fruit which should be his, which is identical with the essence of mukti. What else do you want to ask me?'"

CANTO 328

"Bhishma says, 'Having heard these words of King Janaka, Suka of cleansed soul and settled conclusions began to stay in his Soul with his Soul, having of course seen the self with his self. Having achieved his objective, he became happy and serene, and without questioning Janaka further, he flew northwards to the mountains of Himavat with the speed of the wind.

These mountains abounded with diverse tribes of Apsaras and echoed with exalted sounds. Teeming with thousands of Kinnaras and Bhringarajas, it was adorned, besides, with many Madgus and Khanjaritas, and many Jivajivakas of varied colours.

And there were many peacocks also of wonderful hues, uttering their shrill cries. Many flocks of swans, and many flights of joyful kokilas too, adorned the place. Garuda, the prince of birds, dwelt constantly on that peak.

The four Lokapalas, the Devas and diverse classes of Rishis always came there from the desire to do good to the world. It was there that the high-souled Vishnu had undergone the severest austerities to have a son.

It was there that the divine Senapati Kumara, in his younger days, disregarded the three worlds with all its inhabitants, hurled his spear and pierced the earth with it. As he hurled it, Skanda challenged the universe, crying, "If there is anyone mightier than me, or who holds Brahmanas dearer, or who can compare with me in devotion to the Brahmanas and the Vedas, or has tejas like mine, let him draw up this spear or at least shake it!"

Hearing this challenge, the three lokas become anxious, and all creatures asked one another, "Who will draw out this lance?" Vishnu saw that all the Devas and Asuras and Rakshasas were distraught. He reflected upon what best could be done. Unable to bear that challenge of the spear, he cast his eyes on Skanda, the son of Agni.

With his left hand, Vishnu seized that blazing spear and began to shake it. Shaken by the awesome power of Vishnu, the whole earth with her mountains, forests, and seas, shuddered along with the spear. Although Vishnu was fully able to pull it out, he contented himself with shaking it. In this, the puissant Narayana kept the honour of Skanda intact.

Having shaken it himself, the divine Vishnu addressed Prahlada, saying, "Behold the might of Kumara. None else in the universe can move this lance!"

Unable to bear this, Prahlada resolved to pull out the spear. He seized it, but was unable to Hiranyakasipu plunged down onto the earth.

Taking himself to the northern side of those grand mountains, Mahadeva, the bull his emblem, had performed the austerest tapasya. The asrama where Siva had undergone those austerities is encircled on all sides with a blazing fire.

Only men of pure souls can approach that mountain known by the name of Aditya. There was a fiery girdle all around it, of the width of ten yojanas, and it cannot be approached by Yakshas and Rakshasas and Danavas.

The illustrious and tejas-filled Agni lived there and was engaged in removing all obstacles from the side of Mahadeva of fathomless wisdom who remained there for a thousand celestial years, all the while standing on one foot. Dwelling on the side of Himavat, Mahadeva Mahavrata scorched the Devas in their heavens with his fiery tapasya.

At the foot of those mountains, in a quiet and secluded place, Parasara's son, Mahamuni Vyasa, taught the Vedas to his sishyas. Those disciples were the highly blessed Sumantra, Vaisampayana, Jaimini of great wisdom, and Tapodhana Paila. Suka went forth to that delightful asrama where his father, the great Muni Vyasa, lived with his sishyas.

Seated here, Vyasa watched his son advance like a radiant fire scattering flames, resembling the sun himself. As Suka approached, he appeared not to touch the trees or the rocks of the mountain. Completely dissociated from all objects of the senses, engaged in yoga, the Mahatman Rishi came swiftly, even like an arrow loosed from a bow.

Born from the aranis, Suka drew near his sire and touched his feet. With due reverence he then approached his father's disciples. Joyfully, he narrated all the particulars of his conversation with King Janaka.

Vyasa, the son of Parasara, after the arrival of his great son, continued to dwell on Himavat engaged in teaching his disciples and his son. One day he was seated at his ease, and his sishyas, all proficient in the Vedas, with subdued senses, and with tranquil souls, sat around him. All of them had thoroughly mastered the Vedas with their angas. All were observant of penances. With folded hands they addressed their guru with the following words:

"Through your grace, we have been blessed with great tejas. Our fame also has spread. There is one boon that we humbly beg you to grant us."

Hearing these words, the regenerate Rishi answered them, saying, "Sons, tell me what is the boon you wish me to grant you?"

Hearing this reply from their preceptor, the disciples were filled with joy. Once more bowing their heads low before their guru and joining their hands, Rajan, in one voice all of them spoke these excellent words:

"If our guru is pleased with us, then, O best of sages, we are sure to be crowned with success! We all ask you, Maharishi, to grant us a boon. Be you graceful to us. Let no sixth sishya, besides us five, become famed. We are four. Our guru's son is the fifth. Let the Vedas shine forth in only us five. This is the boon that we seek."

Hearing them, Vyasa, the son of Parasara, of great intelligence, deeply learned in the meaning of the Vedas, having a righteous soul, and always engaged in thoughts that confer benefits on a man in the next world, spoke these virtuous words to his sishyas:

"The Vedas should always be given unto him who is a Brahmana, or unto him who desires to listen to Vedic teachings, and by him who eagerly wishes to dwell in the world of Brahma. Go forth and multiply. Let the Vedas spread through your exertions.

The Vedas should never be imparted to one who has not formally become a disciple. Nor should they be given to one who does not observe pure vratas. Nor should they be bestowed on one of impure soul.

These are the attributes of those who can be accepted as sishyas for the communication of Veda gyana. No knowledge should be imparted to one without a proper scrutiny of his character; just as pure gold is tested by heat, cutting and rubbing, so also should disciples be tested by their birth and accomplishments.

You should never set them tasks beyond their abilities, or tasks that are fraught with danger. One's knowledge is always commensurate with one's understanding and diligence. Let all sishyas overcome all obstacles, and let all of them meet with auspicious success.

You are competent to teach the shastras to persons of all the varnas. While teaching you must address a Brahmana, putting him first. These are the laws that govern the study of the Vedas; and this is regarded as a noble task.

The Vedas were created by the Self-born to praise the Devas. That man who, through the clouding of his mind, speaks ill of a Brahmana who knows the Vedas, is certain to face humiliation.

He who disobeys all the laws while seeking knowledge, and he who disregards dharma while imparting knowledge both fall from grace; instead of the devotion which should prevail between guru and sishya, such questioning and such instruction are certain to create distrust and suspicion.

I have now told you everything about the way in which the Vedas must be studied and taught. You must bear this instruction in mind while dealing with and teaching your sishyas.'"

"Bhishma says, 'Hearing these words of their guru, Vyasa's tejasvin sishyas were filled with joy and embraced one another. Addressing one another, they said, "We will always remember what our illustrious teacher has said for our future good, and we shall do as he has said."

Having said this to one another with joyful hearts, the disciples of Vyasa, who were thorough masters of words, once more addressed him, "Mahamuni, if it pleases you, we wish to go down from this mountain into the world to undertake the task of dividing the Vedas!"

The mighty son of Parasara replied to them in words suffused with dharma and artha. "You may go to Bhumi or to Swargaloka, as you please. You should always be attentive, for the Vedas are such that they are always liable to be misunderstood."

Granted permission by their guru of truthful speech, the sishyas left him after circling around him in pradakshina and bowing their heads before him. Descending to the earth they performed the Agnishtoma and other yagnas; and they began to officiate at the sacrifices of Brahmanas and Kshatriyas and Vaisyas. Happily passing their days in the grihastasrama, they were revered by the Brahmanas. Famed and prosperous, they were employed in teaching the Veda and performing yagnas.

After his disciples had departed, Vyasa remained in his asrama with only his son in his company. The Rishi passed his days in anxious thoughtfulness and silence, sitting in a secluded corner of the hermitage. At that time Mahamuni Narada of great punya came there to see Vyasa, and spoke to him in mellifluous words.

Narada said, “O regenerate Rishi of Vasishta’s vamsa, why have the Vedic mantras fallen silent? Why are you sitting quiet and alone, in meditation like one engrossed in some thought? Alas, shorn of Vedic echoes, this mountain has lost its beauty, like the moon shorn of splendour when assailed by Rahu or enveloped in a cloud.

Without the Vedas being heard, though inhabited by the Devarishis, the mountain no longer looks wondrous but resembles a village of Nishadas. The Rishis, the Devas and the Gandharvas, too, no longer shine forth as before, for they are without the Veda nadam!”

Hearing these words of Narada, the island-born Vyasa answered, “O Devarishi, you know all the declarations of the Vedas; I agree with all that you have said and it is right for you to say this to me. Omniscient one you have seen everything.

Your knowledge also embraces all things within its sphere. All that has ever occurred in the three worlds is known to you. O great Narada, command me. Tell me what I what should I do now. Separated from my sishyas, my mind has become despondent.”

Narada said, “If the recitation of Vedas is suspended they are tainted. The Brahmanas are tainted by the non-observance of their vratas. The Balhika vamsa is the stain of the earth. Curiosity renders women impure. Recite the Vedas along with your most intelligent son, and drive out the terrors arising from Rakshasas with the echoes of their mantras.”’

Bhishma continues, ‘Vyasa, the foremost of all who understand dharma and who are devoted to Vedic recitation, was filled with joy and said to Narada, “So be it.” With his son Suka, he began to chant the Vedas in a loud sonorous voice, observing all the laws of orthoepy, correct pronunciation, and filling the three worlds with that sacred sound.

One day, as father and son, both conversant with all dharma, were engaged in chanting the Vedas, a violent wind arose that seemed to be driven by the storms that blow on the ocean’s breast. Knowing that the hour was inauspicious, Vyasa immediately told Suka to stop chanting.

Suka was filled with curiosity. He asked his sire, “O Dvija, where does this wind come from? Tell me everything about what this wind is and means.”

Vyasa heard Suka’s question and was full of amazement at what had happened. He answered Suka telling him that such an omen indicated that the chanting of the Vedas should be stopped.

“You have attained spiritual vision. Your mind has of itself been cleansed of every impurity. You have been freed from the gunas of rajas and tamas. You now dwell in sattva. You now behold your Soul with your soul, even as one gazes at one’s own reflection in a mirror. Establishing yourself in your own Atman, do you contemplate the Vedas.

The path of the Paramatman is called Devayana, the path of the gods. The path composed of tamas is called Pitriyana, the path of manes. These are the two paths in the next world. By one, men go to swarga. By the other, they go to naraka.

The winds blow over the earth’s surface and in the sky. They blow in seven courses. Listen to me as I recount them one after another. The body is furnished with the senses which are controlled by the Sadhyas and many great beings of immeasurable power. These gave birth to an invincible son named Samana.

From Samana sprang a son called Udana. From Udana sprang Vyana, who gave rise to Apana; and lastly from Apana sprung the wind called Prana. That invincible scorcher of all enemies, Prana, remained childless.

I will now tell you about the different functions of those winds. Prana is the cause of the diverse functions of all living creatures, and because they live by it, it is called Prana, life.

The first wind is known by the name of Pravaha—Samana which blows along the first masses of clouds born of smoke and heat. Coursing through the sky, and coming into contact with the water contained in clouds, that wind reveals itself in effulgence among the flashes of lightning.

The second wind called Avaha blows deafeningly. This wind causes Soma and the other luminaries to rise and appear. Within the body, which is a microcosm of the universe, that wind is called Udana by the wise.

The third wind, known as Udvaha, sucks up water from the four oceans, and conveys it to the clouds in the sky; and, having done this, offers them up to Indra, the god of rain.

The wind called Samvaha supports the clouds and divides them into many parts, turns them into vapour in order to pour down rain and once more makes them liquid; it is the roar of the thunderheads, which exist for the preservation and nurture of the world. The wind Samvaha bears the chariots of all celestial beings along the sky. The fourth in the enumeration, it is strong, with the power to destroy the very mountains.

The fifth wind is swift and forceful. It is dry and uproots and smashes down all trees. The clouds beside it are known by the name Balahaka. That wind causes diverse kinds of natural calamities, and roars deafeningly in the firmament. It is known by the name Vivaha.

The sixth wind bears the celestial waters through the skies and prevents them from falling down. That wind blows and supports the sacred waters of the Akasa Ganga, preventing them from falling down.

Obstructed by that wind from a distance, the sun, the source of a thousand rays, and which illumines the world, appears as a luminary of but one ray. Through the action of that wind, the moon, after waning, waxes again till he displays a full disc. Best of Rishis, that wind is known by the name Parivaha.

Stealing the life of all living creatures when the proper hour comes, its path is followed by Surya's son Yama; this wind is the source of that immortality attained by yogins of subtle vision who are always engaged in yoga dhyana.

This wind, Parivaha, in ancient times, helped the thousands of grandsons of Daksha Prajapati, by his ten sons, to attain to the ends of the universe. The touch of that wind Parivaha enables one to attain mukti by freeing oneself from the obligation to return to the world of samsara. No one can resist this foremost of all winds.

Marvellous are these winds, all sons of Diti. They can go everywhere and support all things, and they blow all around you without being attached to you at any time.

It is truly wonderful that this foremost of mountains should thus be suddenly shaken by this wind that now blows here. This wind is the breath of Vishnu's nostrils. When driven swiftly forward, it begins to blow with such great force that it agitates the whole universe.

When the wind begins to blow violently, persons who know the Vedas do not chant their mantras. The Vedas are a form of wind. If forcefully uttered at the wrong time, the outer wind is tortured."

Having said these words, and once the wind had ceased, the mighty son of Parasara bade his son to recommence his Vedic chanting. He then left that place to bathe in the waters of the celestial Ganga.'"

CANTO 330

"Bhishma says, 'After Vyasa had left the place, Narada, traversing the sky, came there and saw Suka studying the shastras. The Devarishi had come to ask Suka about the meaning of certain sections of the Vedas. Seeing the Devarishi Narada in his hermitage, Suka revered him by offering him the arghya according to Vedic rites.

Gratified with the honours bestowed upon him, Narada addressed Suka, saying, "Righteous one, tell me, how can I bring about what is for your highest good?"

Hearing Narada's words, Suka said to him, "Instruct me in that which may benefit me."

Narada said, "In ancient times, the illustrious Sanatkumara spoke these words to certain pure-souled Rishis who had approached him seeking the truth: 'There is no eye like that of gyana. There is no penance like sannyasa.

Abstaining from evil acts, steady practice of dharma, sadachara, good conduct, the correct observance of all religious duties, these constitute the highest good. Having obtained the condition of humanity, full of sorrow, he that becomes attached to it, is bewildered; such a man never succeeds in emancipating himself from grief.

A man's intellect becomes increasingly enmeshed in the net of stupor when he is attached to worldly things. Such a man becomes sorrowful, both in this world and the next.

One should, by every means in one's power, restrain both desire and wrath if one seeks to achieve what is for one's good. Desire and anger arise for only destroying one's wellbeing.

One should always protect one's tapasya from wrath, and one's prosperity from pride. One should always protect one's knowledge from honour and dishonour, and one's Atman from error.

Compassion is the highest virtue. Forgiveness is the highest power. The knowledge of the Atman is the highest knowledge. There is nothing higher than truth. It is always fitting to speak the truth. It is better again to speak what is beneficial than to speak what is true. I hold that to be truth which most benefits all creatures.

That man is said to be truly learned and wise who abandons every deed, who never indulges in hope, who is completely dissociated from all worldly surroundings, and who has renounced everything that pertains to the world.

He who, without attachment, enjoys all sensual desires with the help of restrained senses, who has a serene soul, who is never moved by joy of sorrow, who is engaged in yogadhyana, who lives in the company of the Devas controlling his senses, yet detached from them, and who, though having a body, never identifies himself with it, becomes emancipated and attains to the highest good.

O Muni, one who never sees others, never touches others, and never talks with others, soon achieves that highest good. One must not injure any creature. On the other hand, one must be friendly towards all. Having obtained the human condition, one should never behave inimically towards any being.

A complete disregard for all worldly things, perfect contentment, abandonment of all kinds of hope, and patience: these constitute the highest good of a man who has subdued his senses and acquired a knowledge of the self. Casting off all attachments, you must subjugate all your senses, and so attain felicity both here and in the next world.

They that are free from greed never have to suffer any sorrow. One should discard all covetousness from one's soul. By casting off greed, O amiable and blessed one, you will be able to free yourself from sorrow and pain.

One who wishes to conquer that which is unconquerable should live in tapasya, self-restraint, silence and a subjugation of the Atman. Such a man should live amidst attachments without being attached to them.

That Brahmana who lives in the midst of attachments without being attached to them and who always lives in seclusion, soon attains to the highest bliss. That man who lives in happiness by himself, surrounded by many creatures who delight in leading lives of sexual union, is one whose thirst has been slaked by knowledge. It is well known that he whose thirst has been slaked by knowledge never experiences grief.

One attains the status of the Devas through good karma and to the condition of Manavas through karma good and bad. By evil actions, one helplessly falls down among the lower animals. Always assailed by sorrow and decay and death, a living creature is being cooked in this world in the cauldron of time. Do you not know this?

You frequently regard that to be beneficial which is really harmful; that to be certain which is really uncertain; and that to be desirable and good which is undesirable and evil. Alas, why do you not awaken to a correct understanding of these?

Like a silkworm that ensconces itself in its own cocoon, you have wrapped yourself in a cocoon made of your own countless acts born of stupor and error. Alas, why do you not awaken to a clear awareness of your real state?

You have no need to attach yourself to worldly things. Attachment to worldly objects gives rise to evil. The silk-worm that weaves a cocoon round itself is finally destroyed by its own action. Those who become attached to sons and spouses and relatives meet with destruction in the end, even as wild elephants who sink into the mire of a lake are gradually weakened until they die.

Behold, all creatures that allow themselves to be enmeshed by love suffer great anguish just as fish do on land, dragged there by cruel nets. Relatives, sons, wives, the body itself, and all one's possessions stored with care, are insignificant and useless in the next world. Only one's good and evil karma follow one to the other world.

When it is certain that you will have to go helplessly to the other world, leaving behind all these things, why are you attached to such inconsequential and worthless objects, paying no attention to that which constitutes your real and lasting wealth?

The path you must travel is without any resting place. Along that way, there is no support one can use. The land through which it passes is unknown and undiscovered. It is cloaked in thick darkness.

Alas, how will you pass along that way without equipping yourself with the necessary means? When you go along that road, nobody will follow you. Only your deeds, good and bad, will follow when you leave this world for the next.

One seeks that foremost of goals by learning, actions, internal and external purity, and great knowledge. When that is attained, one is freed from rebirth.

The desire that one feels for living amidst human habitations is like a binding cord. The virtuous succeed in severing that bond and freeing themselves. Only the sinful do not succeed in breaking these ties.

Samsara, the ocean of life, is terrifying. Personal beauty of form, rupa, constitutes its banks. The mind is the speed of its current. Sparsa, touch, forms its island. Rasa, taste, constitutes its current. Gandha, scent, is its mire. Sabda, sound is its waters. That particular part of it which leads towards swarga is beset with great difficulties.

The body is the boat by which one must cross samsara. Forgiveness is the oar by which it is rowed. Truth is the ballast to steady that boat. The practice of dharma, righteousness, is the rope that must be attached to the mast to draw that boat along dangerous waters.

Dana is the wind that lifts the sails of that boat. It is with that swift boat that one must cross samsara. Shed both virtue and vice, truth and falsehood. Having cast off truth and falsehood, discard the means by which these are to be cast off.

By casting off all purpose, cast off virtue; by casting off all desire cast off sin also. Using the help of Buddhi, discard truth and falsehood; and, finally, by knowledge of the highest subject, the Paramatman, dispense with intelligence itself.

Cast off this body. It has bones for its pillars, sinews for its binding cords, flesh and blood for its outer plaster, and the skin for its outermost casing. It is full of urine and faeces and emits a stench.

Exposed to the assaults of decrepitude and sorrow, it is the seat of disease and is weakened by pain. With the attribute of rajas in predominance, it is neither permanent nor durable, serving only as the temporary abode for the creature it houses.

This entire universe of matter, and that which is called Mahat or Buddhi, are made up of the five Mahabhutas. That which is called Mahat is due to the action of the Paramatman.

The five senses, the three gunas of tamas, rajas and sattva, together with those which have been mentioned before, constitute a tale of seventeen.

These seventeen, known as the unmanifest, with the manifest, that is the five objects of the five senses, rupa, rasa, sabda, sparsa and gandha, along with Chit and Buddhi, form the well-known account of the twenty-four principles.

When one possesses these twenty-four tattvas, one comes to be called Jiva or human. He who knows the aggregate of three, dharma, artha and kama, as also happiness and sorrow, life and death, truly, and in all their details, is said to know growth, decay and destruction.

The objects of knowledge should be known gradually, one after another. All objects that are grasped by the senses are called Vyakta, manifest. Those that transcend the senses and are known only by their indications are said to be Avyakta, unmanifest.

By restraining the senses, one wins great gratification, even like a thirsty and parched traveller at a torrent of rain. Having subdued the senses one beholds one's soul expand to embrace all objects within itself. Having its roots in gyana, the power of the man who beholds Narayana in his own self, who sees all creatures in all conditions in his own soul, is never lost.

He who uses knowledge to transcend all kinds of pain born of error and stupor is never touched by evil when he comes into contact with other creatures. Such a man, his understanding being fully displayed, never finds fault with the course of conduct that prevails in the world.

One conversant with mukti says that the Paramatman is without beginning and without end; that it takes birth as all creatures; that it resides as a witness in the Jivatman; that it is inactive, and without form. Only he who encounters pain as a consequence of his own misdeeds, slays many beings to ward off that pain.

As a result of such sacrifices, the actors have to attain rebirths and have necessarily to perform countless actions. Such a man, blinded by error, regards what is in fact a source of grief to be bliss and is always unhappy even like a sick man who eats food that is unfitting. Such a man is pressed and crushed by his actions like a substance that is churned and pounded.

Bound by his karma, he is reborn, the order of his life being determined by the nature of his acts. Suffering many kinds of torture, he travels in a repeated round of rebirths even like a wheel that turns ceaselessly. You, on the other hand, have cut through all your bonds.

You abstain from all karma! Omniscient and the master of all things, achieve success and be liberated from all existent objects. In earlier times, through control of their senses and the power of their tapasya, many have destroyed the bonds of karma and attained uninterrupted felicity.'"

CANTO 331

"Bhishma says, 'Narada said, "By listening to the blessed shastras that bring about peace, dispel grief, and produce happiness, one attains a pure understanding, and having attained it obtains high felicity.

A thousand causes of sorrow, a hundred causes of fear, from day to day, afflict one that is bereft of Buddhi, but not one that is wise and learned. Listen, therefore to these ancient narratives as I recite them to you, in order to ease your sorrows. If one can conquer one's understanding, one is sure to attain happiness.

By associating with the undesirable and dissociating from what is agreeable, only foolish men are subject to mental anguish of every kind. One should not grieve over things past, thinking of their merits. He who thinks of the past with attachment can never emancipate himself.

One should always try to discover the faults in things one has become attached to. One must regard such things as fraught with much evil. By doing so, one can be freed from them.

The man who laments for what is past fails to acquire either wealth or fame or punya. That which no longer exists cannot be obtained. When such things pass away, they do not return, however keenly one may regret their passing.

Creatures sometimes acquire and sometimes lose worldly objects. No man in this world can mourn all that happens to him. Dead or lost, he who grieves for what is past, becomes unhappy. Instead of just one sorrow, he experiences two.

With the help of their intelligence, those men see clearly who do not weep when they behold the course of life and death in the world. They never have to shed tears at anything that takes place. When any such calamity, causing either physical or mental pain, which cannot be warded off by the best of efforts, occurs, one should stop reflecting on it with sorrowful regret.

Not to think about it, this is the medicine for sorrow. By thinking of it, one can never dispel it; on the other hand, by brooding on sorrow, one only increases it. Mental agony should be destroyed by wisdom; physical pain should be dispelled by medicines. This is the power of knowledge, gyana.

In such matters, one should not behave like men of little understanding. Youth, beauty, life, treasures, health and association with loved ones: all these are fleeting. One who is wise should never covet them.

One should not lament individually for a painful occurrence that concerns an entire community. Instead of indulging in grief, once stricken by it, one should seek to avert it and apply a remedy as soon as one sees the opportunity for doing so.

There is no doubt that in this life the measure of misery is far greater than that of joy. There is no doubt that all men show attachment for objects of the senses and that death is regarded as disagreeable.

The man who discards both joy and sorrow, is said to attain Brahman. When such a man leaves this world, sage men never grieve.

In spending wealth there is pain. In protecting it there is pain. In acquiring it there is pain. Hence, when one's riches are destroyed, one should not be sad.

Men of little understanding attain many levels of prosperity but fail to achieve contentment, and at last perish in misery. Men of wisdom, however, are always content. All are destined to end in dissolution.

All things that are high are fated to fall down and become low. Union is sure to end in disunion, and life is certain to end in death. Thirst is unquenchable. Contentment is the highest happiness. Hence, the wise regard contentment to be the most precious wealth.

One's allotted lifespan runs continually. It does not stop in its course for even a single moment. When one's body itself is not eternal, what other thing in this world can be considered so? Those who reflect on the nature of all creatures and conclude that it is beyond the mind's grasp, turn their attention to the highest path, and, when they advance on it, do not have to feel sorrow.

Like a tiger who seizes and flees with its prey, death seizes and makes off with the man who is engaged in unprofitable occupations and is unsatisfied with objects of desire and pleasure.

One should always seek to free oneself from sorrow. One should seek to dispel sorrow by acting joyfully, without indulging in grief, and having freed oneself from a particular sorrow, should act in such a manner as to ward off sadness by abstaining from all faults of conduct.

After enjoying sabda, sparsa, rupa, gandha and rasa, the rich and the poor alike find that these are hollow and futile. Before union with these, creatures are never subject to sorrow. One who is steadfast in one's original nature is never saddened when that union is ended.

One should control one's stomach and sexual appetite patiently. One should protect one's hands and feet with the help of the eye. One's eyes and ears and other senses should be protected by the mind. One's mind and speech should be governed by wisdom.

Casting off love and affection for those who are known and those unknown, one should conduct oneself with humility. Such a man is said to possess wisdom, and such a one surely finds bliss.

He who is pleased with his own Atman, devoted to yoga, who depends upon nothing beyond the self, who is without greed, and who conducts himself without depending on anything but his self, succeeds in attaining felicity."'

CANTO 332

"Bhishma says, 'Narada said, "When the vicissitudes of happiness and sorrow appear or disappear, these transitions cannot be avoided by either wisdom, policy or effort. Without allowing oneself to fall away from one's true nature, one should strive to protect one's own self.

He who takes such care and exertion, never perishes. Regarding the self greatly, one should always seek to rescue oneself from disease, decay, and death.

Mental and physical diseases afflict the body, like keen-pointed shafts shot from the bow by a mighty archer. The body of a man tormented by thirst, tortured by agony, perfectly helpless, and who wants to prolong his life, is dragged towards destruction.

Days and nights course ceaselessly, bearing away on their current the lives of all men. Like gushing rivers, these flow eternally without ever turning back.

The unending succession of the light and dark fortnights wastes away all mortals without ceasing for even a moment. Rising and setting, day after day, the sun, who is himself undecaying, continually stirs the joys and sorrows of all men in the cooking pot of time. The nights pass, taking with them all the unexpected good and bad that overtake man, that depend on karma and fate.

If the fruits of man's actions were not dependent on external circumstances, he would obtain everything he desires. Even men who are clever, intelligent, of restrained senses, if they do not act, they never succeed in earning any fruits.

Others, lacking in intelligence, without talents or accomplishments of any kind, and who are truly the lowest of men, even when they do not long for success, are seen to be crowned with the fruits of all their desires.

He who is always ready to injure all creatures, and who is engaged in deceiving all the world, is seen to bathe in happiness. One who sits idly obtains great prosperity, while another, exerting himself earnestly, is seen to miss desirable fruits that are almost within his reach.

Would you ascribe this to be one of the faults of man? The vital seed, originating in one's nature, with mere looking, passes from one to another. When placed in the womb, it sometimes produces an embryo and sometimes fails. When sexual union fails, it resembles a mango tree that puts forth a great many flowers without, however, producing a single fruit.

Often, one who desires progeny and who strives vigorously to achieve their objective by worshipping many Devas, fails to procreate. Another, fearing the birth of a child as one fears a poisonous snake, finds a long-lived son born unto him, seeming to be his own self come back to the stages through which he has himself passed.

Despondent men who ardently long for offspring, and at last beget children born after ten long months, after countless yagnas to many Devas and undergoing severe austerities, find them to be veritable wretches of their race. Others are blessed by progeny, obtained with the same blessed karmas and kriyas, who instantly inherit wealth and grain and other sources of enjoyment earned and stored by their sires.

In an act of sexual union between two persons of opposite sexes, the embryo is born in the womb, like a calamity afflicting the mother. Very soon after the suspension of the vital breaths, other physical forms possess that embodied creature whose gross body has been destroyed but whose deeds have all been performed with that gross body made of flesh and blood.

Upon the dissolution of the body, another body, just as destructible as the one that is destroyed, is ready for the burnt creature to migrate into even as one boat transfers its passengers into another. As a result of sexual union, a drop of the vital seed, which is inanimate, is placed in the womb.

I ask you, through whose or what care is the embryo kept alive? That part of the body into which the food that is eaten goes and where it is digested, is the place where the embryo resides, but it is not digested there. The fertilised egg does not reside in that part of the body where the food eaten is digested. It is in the womb, enveloped in urine and faeces, one's sojourn is regulated by nature.

In the matter of where it lives and from where it escapes, the born creature is not a free agent. He is perfectly helpless in these. Some foetuses fall from the womb prematurely, as yet undeveloped. Some come out alive and continue to live. As regards some, after being quickened with life, they are destroyed while still in the womb in consequence of some other bodies being ready for them because of their past karma.

A man inserts the semen in an act of sexual union, and obtains from it a son or daughter. The offspring thus gained, when the time comes, performs a similar act. When a man's allotted life span draws to a close, the five primal elements of his body attain to the seventh and the ninth stages and then cease to be. The man himself does not change.

Without doubt, when afflicted by diseases, as small animals assailed by hunters, men lose their powers of standing and moving. Even if such men want to spend vast wealth, the best efforts of physicians cannot alleviate their pain. This occurs even when skilled and knowledgeable doctors, equipped with excellent medicines, are themselves afflicted by disease like hunted animals.

Even if men drink many astringents and all kinds of medicated ghee, they are broken by age and disease like trees by mighty tuskers. When animals and birds and beasts of prey and poor men are ailing, who treats them with medicines? Indeed, they are not even regarded as being ill. Like larger animals attacking smaller ones, sicknesses afflict even fierce kings with inexorable prowess and ferocity. All men, unable to even utter cries of pain, and overwhelmed by grief, are seen to be borne away along the powerful current into which they have been flung. Embodied creatures, even when seeking to vanquish nature, are unable to conquer it, despite using wealth, sovereign power, or the most austere penances.

If all attempts men make were crowned with success, then they would never be subject to decay, would never experience anything disagreeable, and would be crowned with success in all their desires.

All wish to attain ultimate superiority of position. To gratify this, they strive to their utmost. The result, however, does not fulfil their desires. Even men that are perfectly attentive and honest, brave and powerful, are seen to look up to men intoxicated with the arrogance of wealth and wine.

There are those whose calamities disappear before even these are marked or noticed by them. There are others who have no riches and yet are free from all miseries. A great disparity may be observed with respect to the fruits of karma. Some are seen to bear chariots on their shoulders, while some are seen to ride them.

All men desire wealth and prosperity. Only a few have chariots and elephants and horses in their processions. Some do not have a single spouse when their first-wedded ones are dead; while others have hundreds to call their own.

Misery and happiness exist side by side. Men have either one or the other. Behold, this is a subject of wonder. Do not be bewildered at such a sight.

Cast off both dharma and adharma. Cast off also truth and falsehood. Having discarded both, then cast off that which helps you to cast them off! O best of Rishis, I have now told you about that which brings great unhappiness. With these instructions, the Devas, once all human beings, succeeded in leaving the earth and became the inhabitants of swarga."

Hearing these words of Narada, the wise and serene Suka reflected upon the teachings he received, but could not arrive at any certainty of conclusion. He understood that one suffers great misery because of children and spouses, and that one has to take great pains to acquire scientific and Vedic knowledge.

He, therefore, asked himself, "What is that situation which is eternal and which is free from misery of every kind but in which there are great riches?" Reflecting for a moment upon the path ordained for him, Suka, who was well acquainted with the beginning and the end of all duties, resolved to attain to the highest end that is fraught with the greatest felicity.

He questioned himself, saying, "How shall I break free from all attachments, and become perfectly free and attain that excellent goal? How, indeed, shall I reach that from which there is no return to samsara, the ocean of diverse kinds of birth?

I desire that condition of existence from which there is no return. Casting off all kinds of attachments, with the help of the mind, I will attain that goal after reflection and arriving at certainty. I shall reach that realm in which my Atman will be at peace, and I will be able to dwell for eternity without being subject to decay or change.

It is, however, certain that this end cannot be attained without yoga. He who reaches the state of perfect knowledge and enlightenment does not experience attachments through base deeds.

I shall, therefore, have recourse to yoga, and casting off this body which is my present home, I will transform myself into wind and enter the sun, that mass of effulgence. When the Jivatman enters the sun's radiance, he no longer suffers like Soma who, with the gods, upon the exhaustion of merit, falls down on the earth and having once more acquired sufficient merit returns to heaven.

The moon is always seen to wane and then wax. Seeing this waning and waxing that continue repeatedly, I do not wish for a form of existence in which there are such changes. The sun heats up all the world with his fiery rays. His disc never diminishes. Remaining unchanged, he saps the energy from all things. Hence, I desire to immerse myself into the blazing sun. Having discarded my body in the solar realms, I shall live there, invincible, my inner soul freed from all fear. With the great Rishis I shall enter the unbearable energy of the sun.

I declare unto all creatures, to these trees, these elephants, these mountains, the earth herself, the cardinal points of the horizon, the sky, the Devas, the Danavas, the Gandharvas, the Pisachas, the Uragas and the Rakshasas, that I shall enter into all creatures in the world. Let all the Devas along with the Rishis behold the prowess of my yoga today!"

With these words, Suka made his intentions clear to the illustrious Narada. Obtaining his permission, Suka then went to his father's dwelling. Arriving in the presence of the Mahamuni, the high-souled and island-born Krishna, Suka circled round him and enquired after his wellbeing.

Hearing of Suka's intention, the Maharishi was greatly pleased. Addressing him, Vyasa said, "O son, beloved son, do stay a while here so that I may look upon you and gratify my eyes."

Suka, however, did not heed that request. Freed from attachment and all doubt, he began to think only of mukti, and focused himself on the journey ahead. He left his father and walked to the majestic breast of Kailasa inhabited by thousands of enlightened ascetics.'"

CANTO 333

"Bhishma says, 'Having ascended the peak of the mountain, O Bhaarata, the son of Vyasa sat down upon an even grassless place and retired from the dwellings of other creatures. In accordance with the shastras and the laws laid down, the ascetic, conversant with the sequence of the successive processes of yoga, held his soul first in one place and then in another, starting with his feet and proceeding upwards through all the limbs.

Soon after the sun rose, Suka sat humbly, with his face turned eastwards, in a yogic posture, hands and feet drawn in. Where he sat, prepared for yoga, there were no flocks of birds, no sound, and no sight that was repulsive or terrifying. He beheld his own Atman freed from all attachments. Beholding that highest of all things, he laughed joyfully.

He readied himself for yoga to attain to emancipation. Becoming a great master of yoga, he transcended the element of space. He then circled around Narada, the Devarishi, in pradakshina and told him about his intentions to address himself to the highest yoga.

Suka said, "I have succeeded in beholding the path of mukti, and I have addressed myself to it. O you, blessed with the wealth of tapasya. Splendid one, through your grace, I will attain to the highest goal!"'

Bhishma says, 'Having received the permission of Narada, Suka the son of the island-born Vyasa saluted the divine Rishi and once more set himself to yoga and entered Akasa. He ascended from Kailasa and soared into the sky.

Identifying himself with Vayu, the blessed Suka of unchanging ends flew across the sky. All creatures watched him as he traversed the skies shining with the radiance of Garuda at the speed of the wind or thought itself.

Filled with the splendour of fire and the sun, Suka regarded the three worlds in their entirety as one homogenous Brahman, and travelled along that long path. Indeed, all creatures mobile and immobile cast their eyes upon him as he advanced with concentrated attention, and a tranquil, fearless soul. In accordance with the laws and their powers, all worshipped him with reverence.

The inhabitants of swarga rained showers of celestial flowers over him. On seeing him, all the tribes of Apsaras and Gandharvas were filled with wonder. The enlightened Rishis were equally amazed. And they asked themselves, "Who is this one that has attained to success by his tapasya? With his gaze withdrawn from his own body but turned upwards, he fills us all with joy with his glances!"

Of righteous soul and celebrated throughout the three worlds, Suka walked in silence, his face turned towards the east and his gaze directed towards the sun. As he went, he seemed to fill the entire sky with an all-pervading sound.

As they watched him approach, all the Apsaras were filled with awe and amazement. Led by Panchachuda and others, they looked at Suka with eyes wide with wonder. And they asked one another, "What deity is this one that has attained to such a high end? Without doubt, he comes here, freed from all attachments from all desires!"

Suka then went to the Malaya Mountains where Urvasi and Purvachitti dwelt. Both of them were awestruck as they beheld his tejas.

And they said, "How wondrous is the fixed attention to yoga of a Brahmana youth who was accustomed to the recitation and study of the Vedas. Soon, like the moon, he will traverse the whole sky.

He acquired this superior understanding through dutiful service and humble ministrations to his father. Of austere penances, he is firmly attached to his sire, and is much loved by him in return. Alas, why has he been dismissed by his inattentive father to tread a path from which there is no return?"

Hearing these words of Urvasi, and noting their significance, Suka, that foremost of all persons conversant with dharma, looked around him, and once again perceived the sky, all the earth with her mountains and forests, and her lakes and rivers. All the Devas and Devis folded their hands, paid reverence to the son of the island-born Rishi, and gazed upon him with wonder and respect.

That foremost of all righteous men, Suka, addressed them with these words, "If my sire should follow me and repeatedly call after me by my name, do all of you together give him my answer. Moved by the affection that you all bear for me, fulfil my request!"

Hearing Suka's words, all the points of the horizon, all the forests, all the seas, all the rivers, and all the mountains, answered him from every side, saying, "We accept your command, O regenerate one! It shall be as you say. Thus do we answer the words spoken by the Rishi!"'

"Bhishma says, 'Having spoken to all in this way, Suka, the twice-born Rishi of austere penances, cast off the four kinds of faults. Casting off also the eight kinds of tamas, he dismissed the five kinds of rajas. Radiant with intelligence, he discarded even the sattva guna. All this was marvellous.

He then dwelt in that eternal place devoid of attributes, freed from every indication—that is, in Brahman, blazing like a smokeless fire. Meteors began to shoot out in every direction. The points of the horizon seemed to be ablaze. The earth trembled. All those phenomena were awesome to behold.

The trees began to shed their branches and the mountains their peaks. Loud claps of thunder were heard that seemed to rive the Himavat Mountains. The sun seemed at that moment to be shorn of splendour. Fire refused to blaze forth.

The lakes and rivers and seas were all agitated. Vasava poured torrents of fragrant rain. A pure breeze, bearing the scent of unearthly perfumes, began to blow.

As he coursed through the sky, Suka saw the two beautiful peaks of Himavat and Meru. These were close to each other. One of them was made of gold and appeared yellow; the other was white, being made of silver. O Bhaarata, both were a hundred yojanas in height and in breadth. As he journeyed towards the north, Suka saw those two magnificent peaks.

He dashed fearlessly against the two crests that appeared joined to each other. Unable to bear the force, they were rent in two. That sight was breathtaking.

Suka pierced through those peaks; they were unable to stop his onward course. Watching, the inhabitants of swarga cried out loud. The Gandharvas and the Rishis, and others who dwelt in those mountains were divided in two as Suka passed through.

A deafening echo was heard everywhere at that moment, and exclamations of "Uttamam! Excellent!" He was adored by the Gandharvas and the Rishis, by hosts of Yakshas and Rakshasas, and all tribes of the Vidyadharas.

Rajan, the whole sky was strewn with celestial flowers showered from heaven at the very moment when Suka breached that impenetrable barrier! From a height, the righteous-souled Suka saw the beautiful and divine Mandakini flowing below through a region adorned by many flowering groves and forests. Delightful Apsaras played in these waters. Seeing Suka who was bodiless those naked sprites felt shame.

Learning that Suka had undertaken his great journey, Vyasa, filled with love, followed him along the same path. Meanwhile, Suka, who moved through the sky higher than the region of the wind, displayed his prowess of yoga and united himself with Brahman.

In a flash, adopting the subtle path of high yoga, Vyasa of austere penances, reached the spot from where Suka began his journey. Travelling the same way, Vyasa saw the peaks Suka had cloven in two as he passed through them.

When they encountered Vyasa, the Rishis began to describe to him his son's achievements. Vyasa, however, began to lament, loudly calling his son's name, causing the three worlds to resound with his cries.

Meanwhile, the righteous-souled Suka, who had entered the very elements, had become their soul and acquired omnipresence, answered his father with a resounding Bhoh. At this, the entire universe of mobile and immobile creatures echoed Suka's reply by crying Bhoh.

From that time to this, as if to answer Suka, whenever sounds are uttered in mountain-caves or on mountainsides, the echo comes back—Bhoh!

By casting off all the attributes of sound, and disappearing with his yoga-shakti, Suka attained to the highest condition. Seeing that glory and power of his son of immeasurable energy, Vyasa sat down and sorrowfully began to think of him.

Seeing him seated there, the Apsaras, who sported on the banks of the divine Mandakini, became restless, embarrassed and despondent. To hide their nakedness, some of them plunged into the stream, some entered the forests nearby, and some quickly gathered up their clothes. None of them had, however, betrayed any such signs of agitation at the sight of his son Suka.

Seeing these movements, the Rishi understood that his son had been liberated from all attachments, but that he, Vyasa himself, was not free from them. He was filled with both joy and shame. As Vyasa sat there, Siva, armed with Pinaka, surrounded by many Devas and Gandharvas, and adored by all the Maharishis, came to that place.

Consoling the island-born Rishi who was burning with grief because of his son, Mahadeva said to him. "You once prayed to me for a son with the energy of Agni, Jala, Vayu and Akasa. Generated by your tapasyas that very kind of son was born to you.

By my grace, he was pure and full of Brahmatejas. He has attained to the highest end, one that cannot be won by anyone who has not completely subdued his senses; nor can it be acquired by any of the Devas even. Why then, O Rishi, do you grieve for that son?

As long as the mountains exist, as long as the ocean lasts, so long will your son's fame endure undiminished. With my blessings, Maharishi, you will, in this world, perceive a shadowy form resembling your son, moving ever at your side, never deserting you even for a moment!"

Thus favoured by the illustrious Rudra himself, Vyasa saw the shadow of his son by his side. He returned from that place, now filled with joy.

I have now told you, Bharatarishabha, everything regarding the birth and life of Suka. Devarishi Narada and the great Vyasa repeatedly told all this to me in ancient days when asked about it. One who serenely listens to this sacred history dealing with the subject of mukti is certain to attain to that highest end.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'If a man be a grihasta or a brahmacharin, a vanaprastha or a sannyasi, and if he desires to achieve success, what deity should he adore? How can he with certainty attain swarga and mukti?

According to what laws should he perform the homa in honour of the Devas and the Pitris? What is the realm to which one goes when one is emancipated? What is the essence of mukti? What should one do so that, having attained swarga, one will not fall from there?

Who is the Deity of the deities? And who is the Pitri of the Pitris? Who is he that is superior to him? Who is the Deva of the Devas? Tell me all this, Pitamaha!'

Bhishma says, 'Conversant with the art of questioning, O Anagha, you have asked me a question that that touches a deep mystery. Even if one were to strive for a hundred years, one would be unable to answer it using reason and the science of argumentation. Rajan, your question cannot be answered without the grace of Narayana, or of the highest gyana. Parantapa, though your subject is one of profound mystery, I shall yet expound it to you.

Let me narrate to you the ancient itihasa of the discourse between Narada and the Rishi Narayana. I heard it from my father that, in the Krita yuga, during the epoch of the Swayambhu Manu, the eternal Narayana, the Paramatman of the universe, took birth as the son of dharma in a quadruple form, as Nara, Narayana, Hari and the self-created Krishna.

Amongst them all, Narayana and Nara underwent the severest austerities by repairing to the Himalayan retreat of Badari, riding on their golden chariots. Each of these were furnished with eight wheels, constituted of the five primal elements, and were beautiful indeed.

Those original lords of the world, who had been born as the sons of Dharma, became emaciated because of the tapasya they had undergone. On account of those austerities and their tejas, the very Devas could not look at them.

Only that deity whom they propitiated could behold them. Devoted to them, and compelled by an ardent desire to see them, Narada descended onto Gandhamadana from a peak of the lofty mountains of Meru, and wandered over all the world.

At last he swiftly repaired to Badari's asrama. Driven by curiosity he entered it at the hour that Nara and Narayana performed their daily kriyas.

He said to himself, "This is truly the retreat of that Being in whom are established all the worlds including the Devas, the Asuras, the Gandharvas, the Kinnaras and the Nagas!

There was only one form of this great Being before. That single rupa took birth in four forms for the expansion of the race sired by Dharma. How wonderful it is that dharma has thus been honoured by these four great Devas—Nara, Narayana, Hari and Krishna!

Krishna and Hari lived here in earlier times. Nara and Narayana now dwell here, engaged in tapasya to increase their punya. These two are the highest refuge of the universe.

What is the nature of their daily rites? They are the procreators of all living things, and the illustrious Lords of all beings. Filled with high intelligence, which Deva do these two worship? Who are those Pitris whom these two Pitris of all beings adore?"

Reflecting on this, filled with devotion towards Narayana, Narada suddenly appeared before the two Devas. After they had finished worshipping their Devas and Rishis, they looked at the Devarishi who had arrived at their asrama. The latter was honoured with those eternal ceremonies that are ordained in the shastras.

Watching that extraordinary conduct of the two primordial Devas in themselves worshipping other Devas and Pitris, Rishi Narada took his seat there, pleased with the homage he had received. With a cheerful soul he gazed at Narayana, and bowing to Mahadeva he said:

"In the Vedas and the Puranas, in the angas and the subsidiary angas you are praised and revered; you are unborn and eternal. You are the Creator. You are the Mother of the universe. You are the embodiment of immortality and the foremost of all things.

The past and the future, indeed, the entire universe is founded in you! Men in all the four asramas of life ceaselessly propitiate you who have many forms.

You are the father and the mother and the eternal guru of the universe. Who is that Deva or that Pitri for whom you are performing yagnas today?"

The holy one replied, "This is one subject about which nothing should be said. It is an ancient mystery. But your devotion to me is great. Hence, O Dvija, I will openly discourse to you about it.

That which is minute, which is inconceivable, unmanifest, immobile, durable, without any connection with the senses and the objects of the senses, that which is dissociated from the five elements—that is called the Soul that dwells in all existent creatures. That is known by the name Kshetrajna.

It transcends the three gunas of sattva, rajas and tamas, and is regarded as Purusha in the shastras. From him has come the unmanifest that possesses the three attributes of sattva, rajas and tamas.

Though really Avyakta, unmanifest, she is the indestructible Prakriti and dwells in all manifest forms. Know that she is the source from which we two have sprung. That all-pervading Soul, which is made up of all existent and non-existent things, is adored by us.

Even he is what we worship in all the rites that we perform in honour of the Devas and the Pitris. There is no higher Deva or Pitri than he. O regenerate one, He should be known as our Atman. It is him that we worship.

He has propagated the path of dharma followed by men. It is his law that we should duly perform all the necessary kriyas for the Devas and the Pitris.

Brahma, Sthanu, Manu, Daksha, Bhrigu, Dharma, Yama, Marichi, Angiras, Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, Vasishta, Paramesthi, Vivaswat, Soma, he that has been called Kardama, Krodha, Avak, and Krita: these twenty-one Prajapatis were the firstborn.

All of them obeyed the eternal law of Narayana. Those most evolved of all men observed every rite ordained to honour the Devas and the Pitris, in detail, and achieved what they sought.

The divinities of heaven bow to that Supreme Deity and through his grace they attain to those fruits he ordains for them. This is the established conclusion of the shastras: those men are liberated who, freed from these seventeen attributes—the five senses of knowledge, the five senses of action, the five vital breaths, and Manas and Buddhi—have cast off all karma and are divested of the fifteen elements which constitute the sthula sarira, the gross body.

That which the emancipated attain to as their ultimate end is called Kshetrajna. In the shastras he is regarded both possessing and also free from all the gunas. He can be grasped by knowledge alone.

We two have sprung from him. Knowing him in that way, we adore that eternal Soul of all things. The Vedas and all the asramas of life, despite their differences of opinion, are all devoted to him.

Quick to be moved to grace, he grants them noble and blessed aims. In this world, those who are filled with his spirit, and are fully and absolutely devoted to him, attain to higher ends, for they succeed in entering and becoming merged in him.

Narada, I have now revealed to you this exalted mystery, as I am moved by the love I bear for you because of your devotion to me. Indeed, it is on account of this devotion that you have succeeded in listening to my discourse!'”

"Bhishma says, 'Thus addressed by Narayana, foremost of all beings, Narada, foremost of men, spoke again to Narayana for the good of the world.

Narada said, "O Swayambhu, let that objective be achieved for which you have taken birth in four forms in the house of Dharma! I will now repair to Sweta dwipa, the White Island, to gaze upon your true nature.

I always worship my elders. I have never divulged the secrets of others and I have studied the Vedas carefully. I have undergone austere tapasya. I have never lied. As ordained in the shastras, I have always protected the four varnas.

I have always behaved in the same manner towards friends and enemies. Wholly and steadfastly devoted to him, I ceaselessly adore the Paramatman, that first among Devas. Having cleansed my soul by these meritorious deeds, why will I not succeed in seeing that Infinite Lord of the universe?"

Hearing these words of Paramesthi's son, Narayana, protector of the shastras, gave him leave to go. Before dismissing him, he worshipped the Devarishi with those rites and rituals laid down in the scriptures. Narada also offered due adoration to the Rishi Narayana. After this worship had been mutually given and received, Narada left that place.

Blessed with high yogic powers, Narada soared into the sky and reached the peak of the mountains of Meru. Going to a secluded place there, the Maharishi rested for a while.

He then gazed towards the north-west and saw a magnificent sight there. Towards the north, in the ocean of milk, there is a great island named Sweta dwipa, the White Island. The learned say that its distance from the mountains of Meru is more than thirty-two thousand yojanas.

The inhabitants of that realm have no senses. They live without eating any kind of food. Their eyes do not blink. They always exude wonderful fragrances perfumes. Their complexions are white. They are unblemished by any trace of sin. They scorch the eyes of those sinners that look at them.

Their bones and bodies are as hard as the vajra. They regard honour and dishonour equally. They appear to be divine. All of them bear auspicious marks and have great strength.

Their heads appear like parasols. Their voices are deep like the roar of thunderclouds. Each of them has four Mushkas. The soles of their feet are marked by hundreds of lines.

They have sixty large white teeth and eight smaller ones. They have many tongues. With those tongues they seem to lick the very sun, which faces every direction. Indeed, they seem capable of devouring that deity from whom the entire universe has emerged, the Vedas, the Devas and the serene Munis.'

Yudhishtira says, 'O Pitamaha, you have said that those beings have no senses, that they do not eat anything, that their eyes do not blink, and that they always exude fragrant aromas.

I ask you, how were they born? What is the nature of their superior goal? Bharatarishabha, are the signs of those emancipated men the same as those by which all the inhabitants of the White Island are distinguished?

Dispel my doubts. I feel deeply curious. You are the repository of all histories and discourses. As for us, we depend entirely on you; we look to you for knowledge and instruction.'

Bhishma continues, 'Rajan, this story, which I heard from my father, is long. I will tell it to you. Indeed, it is regarded as the essence of all other narratives.

In ancient times, there lived a king on earth by the name of Uparichara. He was known to be the friend of Indra of the Devas. He was devoted to Narayana, who is also known as Hari.

He was observant of all the duties laid down in the shastras. Devoted to his father, he was always obedient and ready for any worthy action. He became the sovereign of the world on account of a boon he received from Narayana.

Following the ancient sattvata ritual established by Surya himself, King Uparichara worshipped Narayana, the Devadeva, and when this worship was over he adored the Pitris of the universe. After worshipping the Pitris, he worshipped the Brahmanas. He then divided the offerings among those who were dependent on him. With what remained after serving them, the king satisfied his own hunger.

Devoted to truth, Uparichara abstained from injuring any creature. With his whole soul, the king was devoted to Janardana, who is without beginning, middle and end, who is the Creator of the universe, and who does not decay or die.

Seeing Parantapa's devotion to him, Narayana shared his throne and palace with him. The king regarded his kingdom and wealth and spouses and animals as gifts from Narayana. He in turn offered up all his possessions to that great God.

Adopting the Sattvata ritual, King Uparichara would perform all his yagnas and ceremonies, both optional and obligatory, with the fullest concentration. In his palace, many great Brahmanas, well conversant with the Pancharatra ritual, would eat before all others the food offered to Narayana.

That Parantapa ruled his kingdom righteously; no untruth ever passed his lips and no wicked thought ever entered his mind. He never committed even the slightest sin.

The seven celebrated Saptarishis—Marichi, Atri, Angiras, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu and Vasishta of great tejas, who came to be known as the Chitra-sikhandins—uniting together on Meru, proclaimed an excellent treatise on the duties consistent with the four Vedas.

That discourse was uttered by seven mouths, and represent the best compendium of human duties and observances. Known by the name of Chitra-sikhandins, those seven Rishis constitute the seven Pravriti elements of Mahat, Ahamkara, and the rest, and Swayambhu Manu, who is the eighth in the enumeration, is the original Prakriti.

These eight uphold the universe, and it was these eight that promulgated this treatise. With their senses and minds under perfect control, and ever devoted to yoga, these eight Munis, with concentrated souls, know fully the past, the present and the future, and are devoted to the religion of truth.

Reflecting in their minds, that this is good, this is Brahman, this is valuable, those Rishis created the worlds, and the science of morality and duty that governs those worlds. In that treatise the authors discoursed on dharma, artha, kama and mukti.

In it they also laid down the various restrictions and limitations intended for Bhumi and also for swarga. They composed that discourse after having worshipped, along with many other Rishis, the puissant and illustrious Narayana, called also Hari, with tapasya for a thousand celestial years.

Gratified with their penances and worship, Narayana commanded Saraswati, the goddess of learning and speech, to enter into the bodies of those Rishis. For the good of the worlds, the Devi did as she was told. As a result of her entering into the Rishis, rich in penances, they were able to compose those most excellent treatises marked by the harmony of words, good sense and strong reasoning.

Having composed that treatise sanctified by Pranava, the syllable AUM, the Rishis first recited it to Narayana, who was delighted. The foremost of all Beings then addressed those Rishis in a divine voice and said, "These hundred thousand verses that you have composed are excellent. This treatise of a hundred thousand verses you have composed is exceptional.

The dharma and kriyas of all the worlds will flow from this your work! In complete accordance with the four Vedas, the Yajuses, the Samans, and the Atharvans of Angiras, this treatise will be an authority with respect to both Pravritti and Nivritti in all the worlds.

In accordance with the shastras I have created Brahman from the attribute of grace, Rudra from my wrath, and yourselves, O Brahmanas, as representing the Pravriti-elements, of Mahat, Ahamkara, and the rest; Surya and Chandramas, Vayu and Prithvi, Jala and Agni, all the stars and planets and constellations, all creatures, and utterers of Brahma, the Vedas, all live and act in their respective spheres and all are respected as authorities.

This treatise you have composed shall be regarded by all men as a work of the highest authority. This is my command.

Guided by this treatise, Swayambhu Manu himself will declare to the world its course of duties and observances. When Usanas and Brihaspati arise, they also will promulgate their respective treatises on dharma, guided by and quoting from this your treatise.

After the promulgation of this treatise by Manu and of that by Usanas, and also by Brihaspati, this science composed by you will be acquired by King Vasu, also known as Uparichara. Indeed, O Dvijottamas, that king will acquire knowledge of this your work from Brihaspati.

That king, filled with all good thoughts, will become devoted to me. Guided by this treatise, he will perform all his karmas and kriyas. Verily, this treatise composed by you will be the best of all treatises on dharma. This excellent treatise, rich in wondrous mysteries, is fraught with instructions to acquire both material and spiritual punya.

As a result of this treatise, you will be the progenitor of a vast race. King Uparichara also will become great and prosperous. Upon his death, however, this eternal work will disappear from the world."

Having said these words to all those Rishis, the invisible Narayana left them and went to an unknown place. Then those sires of the world, those Rishis that bestowed their thoughts on the ends pursued by the world, duly promulgated that treatise which is the eternal origin of all kriya and karma.

Subsequently, when Brihaspati was born in Angiras's race in the Krita yuga, those seven Rishis gave him the task of promulgating their treatise which was consistent with the Upanishads and the Vedangas. These upholders of the universe and the first promulgators of duties and religious observances went forth to their chosen place, having resolved to devote themselves to tapasya.'"

CANTO 337

"Bhishma says, 'With the end of the great kalpa, when the divine Purohita Brihaspati was born in the race of Angiras, all the Devas were delighted. The words Brihat, Brahma and Mahat all mean the same. Brihaspati was so called because he possessed all these qualities. King Uparichara, otherwise called Vasu, became a disciple of Brihaspati and soon became the foremost of his sishyas.

At the feet of his acharya, he then began to study the science composed by the seven Rishis known as Chitra-sikhandins. With his soul purified by tapasya and other rituals, he ruled the earth like Indra ruling swarga.

The illustrious king performed an Aswamedha yagna in which his guru Brihaspati became the Hota. The sons of Prajapati themselves, Ekata Dwita, and Trita, became the Sadasyas in that yagna.

There were others also who became Sadasyas at that sacrifice: Dhanusha, Raivya, Arvavasu, Parvavasu, the Rishi Medhatithi, the great Rishi Tandya, the blessed Rishi Santi otherwise called Vedasiras, Maharishi Kapila, who was the father of Salihotra, the first kalpa, Tittiri the elder brother of Vaisampayana, Kanwa and Devahotra, in all sixteen.

Rajan, all the required samagrahis were gathered for that great yagna. No animals were slaughtered. The king had so ordained it. He was full of compassion. Pure and tolerant of mind, he had discarded all desires, and knew all the rituals and ceremonies. The produce of the forests were used in that yagna.

Hari, the god of devas, was gratified with the king on account of that yagna. Hidden from everyone else, Narayana showed himself to his bhakta. Accepting his share, by imbibing its scent, he himself took up the Purodasa.

Unseen by anyone, Narayana took the offerings. Brihaspati was angered by this. Seizing the ladle he hurled it violently at the sky, and shed tears in wrath.

Addressing King Uparichara, he said, “Here, I place this as Narayana’s share of the sacrificial offerings. Without doubt, he shall take it before my eyes.”’

Yudhishtira says, ‘At the great sacrifice of Uparichara, all the Devas appeared openly to take their share of the arghya and were seen by all. Why is it that only Hari acted otherwise by taking his share without being seen?’

Bhishma continues, ‘When Brihaspati was enraged, the great King Vasu and all his Sadasyas sought to pacify the Maharishi. Calmly they addressed Brihaspati, saying, “It befits you not to give way to anger.

In this Krita you, your wrath should not characterise anyone. The great God, for whom you set aside the share of the sacrificial offerings, is himself free from anger. O Brihaspati, he cannot be seen either by us or by you! Only he can behold him to whom He extends his grace.”

Then the Rishis Ekata, Dwita and Trita, who knew the science of morality and duties compiled by the seven sages, addressed that assembly and began the following narration.

“We are the sons of Brahma, begotten by a command of his will, not in the ordinary way. Once upon a time we went to the north in order to obtain that which is for our highest good. Having undergone tapasya for thousands of years and acquired great punya, we again stood on only one foot like fixed stakes of wood.

The land where we performed tapasya lies to the north of the mountains of Meru and on the shores of the ocean of milk. Our goal was to behold the divine Narayana in his own form.

Upon the completion of our penances and after we had performed the final ablutions, we heard a divine voice, at once deep as that of the clouds and exceedingly sweet, filling our hearts with rapture.

The voice said, ‘You Brahmanas have performed these penances with cheerful souls. Devoted to Narayana, you seek to know how you may succeed in beholding that God of great puissance!

On the northern shores of the ocean of milk there is a magnificent island called Sweta dwipa, White Island. The complexions of the men that inhabit that island are as white as the rays of the moon and they are devoted to Narayana.

Worshippers of that foremost of all Beings, they are devoted to him with all their souls. They all enter that eternal and illustrious deity of a thousand rays.

They are without any senses. They do not live on any kind of food. Their eyes do not blink. Their bodies are fragrant. Indeed, the inhabitants of the White Island worship only one God. Rishis, go there, for there I have revealed myself!'

Hearing these divine words, all of us went forth to the island described to us. Eagerly desiring to behold him, our hearts full of him, at last we arrived at that great island called Sweta dwipa.

There, we could see nothing. Indeed, our vision was blinded by the lustre of the Devadeva and so we could not see him. At this, the idea, due to the grace of the great God himself, arose in our minds—that one that had not undergone sufficient penances could not swiftly behold Narayana.

Under the influence of this idea, we once more set ourselves to the practice of rigorous tapasya, suited to the time and place, for a hundred years. Upon the completion of our vratas, we saw many men of auspicious features.

All of them were white like the moon with every mark of auspiciousness. Their hands were always joined in prayer. The faces of some were turned towards the north and of some towards the east. They were engaged in silently meditating upon the Brahman.

The japa performed by those Mahatmans was a silent, mental one with an audible recitation of any mantras. As a result of their minds and hearts being entirely focused upon him, Hari was gratified.

Maharishi, the effulgence emitted by each of those men resembled the splendours that Surya assumes at the time of the Mahapralaya, the dissolution of the universe. Indeed, we thought that that island was the home of all light. All the inhabitants were equal in energy. There was no superiority or inferiority among them.

Suddenly, we saw a light burning with the concentrated effulgence of a thousand suns. Together, the inhabitants ran joyously towards that light, with hands joined in reverence, uttering the one word Namas, we bow to you.

We then heard a booming sound made by them in unison. It seemed that those men were engaged in offering up a sacrifice to the great God.

We ourselves suddenly lost our senses by his unbearable tejas. Deprived of sight and strength and all our senses, we could not see or feel anything. We only heard a thundering voice in which those gathered there spoke as one.

They said, 'Victory to you, O you of eyes like lotus-petals! Salutations to thee, O Creator of the universe! Salutations to you, Hrishikesa, foremost of Beings, you who are the First-born!'

This is what we heard, uttered distinctly and in agreement with the laws of pronunciation. A pure and redolent breeze blew, bearing perfumes of divine flowers, and of certain herbs and plants germane to the occasion.

Those men, suffused with great devotion, with hearts full of reverence, conversant with the ordinances laid down in the Pancharatra, were worshipping Narayana with thought, words and action. Without doubt, Hari appeared in that place from where the sound they made arose.

Bewildered by his illusion, we could not see him. After the breeze had subsided and the yagna ended, our hearts were troubled with anxiety, O foremost of Angira's vamsa.

As we stood among those thousands of men, all of purest descent, no one honoured us with a glance or nod. Those ascetics, joyful and pious, all practising the Brahmatva, did not show any kind of feeling for us.

We were exceedingly weary. Our tapasya had emaciated us. At that moment, a divine Being spoke to us from the sky, saying, 'These white men, who are without their outer senses, have the capacity to behold Narayana.

Only those Dvijottamas whom these white men honour with their glances become competent to gaze upon the great God. Munis, go now to the place from where you have come.

That great deity cannot be perceived by one that is devoid of bhakti. Incapable of being seen because of his dazzling radiance, that illustrious deity can be beheld only by men who, in the course of long ages, succeed in devoting themselves only and absolutely to him.

You have a great duty to perform. After the passing of this, the Krita yuga, when the Treta yuga comes in the course of the Vivaswat cycle, a great disaster will engulf the worlds. O Munis, you will then have to join with the Devas to dispel that calamity.'

Having heard these wonderful words that were sweet as amrita, we soon returned to the place we desired, through the power of that great Deity.

When we, with the help of even such austere tapasya and arghya, have failed to catch a glimpse of him, how can you expect to see him so easily?

Narayana is the Great Being, he is the Creator of the universe. He is adorned in sacrifices with offerings of ghee and other special food accompanied by the chanting of Vedic mantras. He has no beginning and no end. He is Avyakta. Both the Devas and the Danavas worship him."

Encouraged by these words spoken by Ekata and commended by his companions, Dwita and Trita, and entreated by the other Sadasyas, the high-minded Brihaspati brought that sacrifice to completion after duly offering the accustomed adorations to the Devas. King Uparichara also completed his mahayagna and began to rule his subjects righteously.

At last, casting off his body, he ascended into swarga. After some time, through the curse of the Brahmanas, he fell from those blissful realms and sank deep into the bowels of the earth.

O tiger among monarchs, King Vasu was always devoted to the true dharma. Although sunk deep in the bowels of the earth, his devotion to virtue did not abate. Ever devoted to Narayana, and ever reciting sacred mantras to him, he once more ascended to heaven through Narayana's grace.

Rising from the bowels of the earth, because of attaining that highest end, King Vasu went to a place even higher than Brahmaloka, dominion of Brahma himself.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Despite being wholly devoted to Narayana, why did the great King Vasu fall from swarga and why did he have to sink below the surface of Bhumi?'

Bhishma says, 'O Bhaarata, in this regard listen to the old narrative of a discourse between the Rishis and the Devas. Long ago, the Devas addressed many foremost of Brahmanas and told them that yagnas should be performed by offering up Ajas as dakshina. Aja should be understood as the goat and no other animal.

The Rishis said, "The Vedic Sruti declares that in sacrifices the offerings should consist of seeds of vegetables. Seeds are called ajas. It befits you not to kill goats. The slaughter of animals is not prescribed in the dharma of the virtuous. This, again, is the Krita yuga. How can animals be killed in this age of righteousness?"'

Bhishma continues, 'While this discourse was underway between the Rishis and the Devas, King Vasu came that way. Abounding in prosperity, the king moved through the sky accompanied by his soldiers, chariots and animals.

Beholding the king arriving there, the Brahmanas said to the Devas, "This one will remove our doubts. He performs sacrifices. He is liberal in making gifts. He always seeks the good of all creatures. How could the great Vasu speak otherwise?"

Having thus spoken to each other, the Devas and the Rishis approached King Vasu and asked him, "Rajan, with what should one conduct yagnas? Should one sacrifice with the goat or with herbs and plants? Dispel our doubts. We regard you as our judge in this matter."

Thus addressed, Vasu humbly joined his hands and said to them, “Tell me truly, O supreme Brahmanas, what in your opinion is entertained by you in this matter?”

The Rishis said, “In our understanding, yagnas should be performed with grain. The Devas, however, maintain that sacrifices should be done using animals. You be our judge and tell us which of view is correct.”’

Bhishma continues, ‘Learning the position of the Devas on this matter, Vasu, moved by a partiality for them, said that yagnas should be performed with animals. All the Rishis, blazing with the splendour of the sun, were enraged at this choice.

To Vasu, who was seated on his chariot and who had wrongly taken up for the Devas, they said, “Since you have mistakenly taken the side of the Devas, you will fall from heaven. From this day on, you will lose the power of journeying through the sky. Through our curse you will sink deep below the surface of the earth.”

After the Rishis had spoken, King Uparichara immediately plunged down into an abyss. But at the command of Narayana, Vasu retained his memory. To his good fortune, pained at the curse pronounced on him by the Brahmanas, the Devas began to think how that curse might be neutralised.

They said, “This high-souled king has been cursed for our sake. We, the inhabitants of heaven, must unite for his good in return for what he has done for us.” Having swiftly reflected and decided thus, the Devas went to where King Uparichara was.

Arriving in his presence, they said to him, “You are devoted to Narayana, the great God of the Brahmanas. He, the ruler of both the Devas and the Asuras, is pleased with you and will save you from the curse. It is proper, however, that the high-souled Brahmanas should be honoured. Rajan, their penances must necessarily fructify. Indeed, you have already plunged from the sky to the earth. We desire, however, to favour you in one respect. O Anagha, as long as you live in this abyss, you will receive food and sustenance through our boon.

Those streaks of ghee which Brahmanas pour in yagnas with concentrated minds, accompanied by sacred mantras, and known as Vasudhara, shall be yours, throughout blessings. Indeed, neither weakness nor distress will touch you.

While dwelling in this hollow, neither hunger nor thirst will afflict you for you will drink those streams of ghrita called Vasudhara. Your energy will continue undiminished. As a consequence, the boon that we grant you, Narayana will be pleased with you, and he will bear you to the realm of Brahma!"

Having granted these boons to the king, the Devas and all those Tapodhana Rishis returned to their respective abodes. Then Vasu began to adore the Creator of the universe and to silently recite the sacred mantras that had come forth from Narayana's mouth in ancient days.

Parantapa, though dwelling in a pit of the earth, the king still worshipped Hari, the Lord of all the gods, in the five celebrated yagnas that are performed five times every day. As a result of these adorations, Narayana was pleased with him who had controlled his senses, and had shown himself to be entirely devoted to him, by relying upon him as his sole refuge.

The illustrious Vishnu, that giver of boons, addressed that foremost of birds, Garuda of great speed, who waited upon him as his servant. "O excellent and most blest Garuda, listen to what I say. There lives a great king by the name of Vasu who is of righteous soul and rigid vows. Through the wrath of the Brahmanas, he has fallen into an abyss of the earth.

The Brahmanas have been sufficiently honoured, since their curse has fructified. Go now to that king. At my command, Garuda, go to King Uparichara who now dwells in the depths of patala and can no more course through the sky. Go, Garuda, and swiftly raise him up."

Hearing Vishnu's words, Garuda spread his wings and going like the wind, entered the pit in which King Vasu was. He lifted up the king in his beak, soared into the sky and there he released Vasu. At that moment, King Uparichara once more acquired his divine form and re-entered the realm of Brahma.

Son of Kunti, in this manner did that great king first plunge down into the depths of the earth through the curse of the Brahmanas for a fault of speech, and once more ascend to swarga at the command of Vishnu.

Uparichara devoutly worshipped only the puissant Lord Hari, that foremost of all Beings. It was for this reverence that the king was freed from the curse of the Brahmanas and regained the felicitous regions of Brahmaloka.'

Bhishma continues, 'I have now told you everything regarding the origin of the spiritual sons of Brahma. Listen to me with undivided attention, for I will now narrate to you how Devarishi Narada went to the White Island in ancient times.'"

CANTO 339

"Bhishma says, 'Arriving at Sweta dwipa, the illustrious Rishi saw those same white men possessed of lunar splendour of whom I have already spoken to you. Worshipped by them, the Rishi venerated them in return by bowing his head and revering them in his mind.

Wishing to behold Narayana, he began to live there, engaged in the silent recitation of sacred mantras, and observing the most difficult vratas. With dhyana, the regenerate Rishi, arms upraised, stood in yoga, and recited this mantra to the Lord of the universe, he, who is both saguna, the essence of attributes, and nirguna, without all attributes.

Narada said,[1] "Salutations to you, O God of gods, you who are free from all deeds! You are he who is nirguna, who is the Anudarshin of all the worlds, who is called Kshetrajna, who is the foremost of all Beings, who is infinite, who is called Purusha, who is the great Purusha, who is the foremost of all Purushas, who is the soul of the three attributes, who is called the Foremost, who is amrita, nectar, who is called Immortal, who is called Anantasesha, who is Akasa, space,

You are he who is without beginning, who is both Vyakta, manifest, and Avyakta, unmanifest, as existing and not-existent things, who is said to have his home in Satya, who is the foremost among the Devas; Narayana, who is the giver of wealth, the fruits of one's actions, who is identified with Daksha and other Lords of the creation, who is the Aswattha and other mighty trees, who is the four-headed Brahma, who is the Lord of all created Beings, who is the Lord of speech.

You are he who is the Lord of the universe, Indra, who is the all-pervading Atman, who is the sun, who is prana, the breath, who is the Lord of the waters, Varuna, who is the Emperor or the king, who can be identified with the Lokapalas of the several points of the horizon, who is the refuge of the universe at the time of the final dissolution.

You are he who is concealed, who is the giver of the Vedas unto Brahma, who is associated with the sacrifices and Vedic studies achieved by Brahmanas with the help of their bodies, who is linked with the four principal orders of the Devas, who is every one of those orders, who shines radiantly with great effulgence, unto whom is offered the seven largest arghya along with the Gayatri and other mantras.

You are he who is Yama, who is Chitragupta and the other attendants of Yama, who is the wife of Yama, who is the Tushita order of the Devas, who is that other order called Mahatushita, the universal grinder, death, who is desire, and all diseases that have been created to ensure death.

You are he who is health and freedom from disease, who is subject to desire and passions, who is free from the influence of desire and passions, who is infinite as exhibited in species and forms, who is he that is chastised, who is he that is the chastiser,

You are he who is all the minor sacrifices of Agnihotra and others, who is all the principal sacrifices, those like Brahma, who is all the Ritvijas, who is the origin of all Vedic yagnas, who is fire, the very heart of all sacrifices, the mantras uttered in them, who is he who is revered in yagnas, who takes those shares of the arghya offered to him, who is the embodiment of the five sacrifices.

You are he who is the maker of the five divisions of time, day, night, month, season and year, who cannot be understood except by those shastras called Pancharatra, who fears nothing, who is unvanquished, who is only the mind, without a form, who is known only by name, who is the Lord of Brahma himself, who has completed all the vows and rituals told of in the Vedas.

You are he who is the Hamsa, bearer of the staff, who is the Paramahamsa without the staff, who is the foremost of all yagnas, who is Samkhya yoga, who is the embodiment of the Samkhya philosophy, who dwells in all Jivas, who lives in every heart, who resides in every sense, who floats on the ocean, who lives in the Vedas, who lies on the lotus as the egg from which the universe has sprung, who is the Lord of the universe, and whose forces spread far and wide to protect his devotees.

You take birth as all creatures. You are the origin of the universe. Your mouth is fire. You are that fire which courses through the waters of the ocean, gushing out from a horse's head. You are the sanctified ghee that is poured into the sacrificial fire. You are the charioteer, the fire and heat that charges the body and causes it to live and grow.

You are Vashat. You are the syllable AUM. You are Tapasya. You are Manas. You are Chandramas. You purify the sacrificial ghrita. You are Surya. You are the Dikgajas that are stationed at the four cardinal points of the horizon. You illuminate the cardinal points. You also brighten the subsidiary points. You are the Hayagriva and the Badava mukha.

You are the first three mantras of the Rig Veda. You are the protector of the varnas—Brahmanas, Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras. You are the five fires beginning with Garhapatya. You are he who has three times lit Nachi, the sacrificial fire.

You are the refuge of the six angas of the Vedas. You are the foremost of those Brahmanas that are employed to recite the Samans in yagnas and kriyas. You are Pragjyotisha, and you are he who sings the first Saman.

You keep the Vedic vratas and those observed by singers of the Samans. You are the embodiment of the Upanishad known as the Atharvasiras. You are he who is the subject of the five foremost scriptures, those that pertain to the worship of Surya, of Sakti, of Ganesa, of Siva and of Vishnu.

You are called the guru who subsists on only the froth of water. You are a Balakhilya. You are the embodiment of him who is steadfast in yoga. You are the epitome of the correct judgement of logic.

You are the beginning of the yugas, you the middle of the yugas and you are their end. You are Indra, Akhandala. You are the Rishis Prachinagarbha and Kausika. You are Purusthuta, You are Puruhuta, You are the Creator of the universe.

The universe has your form. Your movements are infinite. Your bodies are infinite; you are without end, without beginning and without middle. Your centre is unmanifest. Your end is unmanifest.

Your abode is in your vratas. You live in the ocean. Your home lies in fame, in penances, in self-restraint, in wealth, in knowledge, in grand achievements, and in everything belonging to the universe.

You are Vasudeva. You grant every wish. You are Hanuman who bore Rama on his shoulders. You are the mighty Aswamedha yagna. You receive your share of arghya in great sacrifices.

You bestow boons, joy and wealth. You are devoted to Hari. You are the subduer of the senses. You are vrata and kriya. You are mortifications, you are harsh mortifications, and you are the most relentless of mortifications.

You are he who observes vows and religious rites. You are free from all errors. You are a Brahmacharin. You were born in the womb of Prishni. From you have emerged all Vedic rites and karmas. You are unborn.

You pervade all things. Your eyes are on all things. You cannot be grasped by the senses. You are not subject to decay. You possess infinite power. Your body is inconceivably vast.

You are holy, beyond the ken of logic or argument. You are unknowable. You are the foremost of causes. You are the Creator of all creatures and you are their destroyer. You hold immense powers of maya. You are called Chitra-sikhandin.

You are the giver of boons. You take your share of the sacrificial offerings. You have acquired the punya of all yagnas. You are he who has been freed from all doubts. You are omnipresent. You have the form of a Brahmana. You are devoted to the Brahmanas.

The universe is your form. Your body is immeasurable. You are the greatest friend. You are kind to all your devotees. You are Brahmanyadeva, the great deity of the Brahmanas.

I am your devoted sishya. I seek to behold you. Salutations to you who are mukti.'"

"Bhishma says, 'Thus worshipped with names unknown to others, the Divine Narayana, having the universe for his form, revealed himself to the ascetic Narada.

His form, though purer than the moon, differed from the moon in some ways. He somewhat resembled a blazing fire in hue. The puissant Lord was somewhat of the form of Vishti.

He resembled in some respects the feathers of the parrot, and in some a mass of pure crystal. He appeared like a hill of antimony and also like a mass of pure gold.

His colour somewhat resembled the first formed coral, and was somewhat white. In some respects that complexion shone with the colour of gold and in some that of lapis lazuli. To some extent it radiated the blue of lapis lazuli and in some that of sapphire. In some respects it resembled the hue of the peacock's neck, and in some that of a string of pearls.

Bearing these diverse hues on his person, Narayana appeared before Narada. He had a thousand eyes and was splendid to behold. He had a hundred heads and a hundred feet. He had a thousand bellies and a thousand arms.

He was still inconceivable to the mind. With one of his mouths he uttered the syllable AUM and then the Gayatri following Pranava. With the mind under complete control, the great deity, called by the names of Hari and Narayana, by his other countless mouths, chanted many mantras from the Aranyaka of the four Vedas.

The Lord of all the Devas, he who is adorned in sacrifices, held a kamandalu in his hands, some awesome and sparkling jewels, a pair of sandals, and a bundle of kusa grass, a deer-skin, a staff and a small blazing fire.

With blissful soul, that foremost of Brahmans, Narada, bowed before Narayana and revered him. And he, the foremost of all the Devas, spoke the following words to Narada who bowed low in worship.

Narayana said, "The great Rishis Ekata, Dwita and Trita came to this realm to behold me. However, their wish remained unfulfilled. Nor can anyone have a vision of me other than those who are devoted to me with their whole being.

As for you, you are truly the foremost of all men who love and worship me with all their souls. These are my forms, the best ones that I assume. These were born, O Dvija, in the house of Dharma. Worship them always, and perform those kriyas that are laid down in the Vedas regarding that worship.

O Brahmana, ask of me the boons you desire. I am gratified with you today, and I appear to you now in my universal form free from decay and death."

Narada said, "Since, Holy One, I have succeeded in seeing you today, I consider that I have instantly gained the fruits of all my penances, of my self-restraint, and of all my vratas and punya karmas.

This, indeed, is the highest boon you have granted me for you have revealed yourself to me today. Eternal Lord, holiest one, the universe is your eye. You are Narasimha. Your form is identifiable with everything. Narayana, you are mighty and infinite."'

Bhishma continues, 'Having thus shown himself unto Narada, the son of Paramesthi, Narayana said to that Rishi, "Narada, go hence, do not delay! My devotees with moonlike complexions are without any senses and do not live on any food. They are, again, all emancipated. With minds wholly fixed on me, men should think only of me.

Such worshippers will never face any obstacles. These men are all crowned with ascetic success and are highly blessed. In ancient times, they deeply revered me. They have been freed from rajas and tamas. Without doubt, they are proficient to merge into my self.

He is that One who cannot be seen with the eye, touched with the sense of touch, smelt with the sense of scent, and who is beyond the sense of taste, who is untouched by sattva, rajas and tamas, who pervades all things and is the one witness of the universe, and who is described as the Soul of the entire universe.

He is that which is not annihilated upon the destruction of the bodies of all created things, who is unborn and unchangeable and eternal, who is freed from all attributes, who is indivisible and undivided; He who transcends the twenty-four tattvas, is regarded as the twenty-fifth.

He who is called by the name of Purusha, who is inactive, and who can only be grasped by true gyana, he into whom the foremost of the regenerate enter and attain mukti. He who is the eternal Paramatman is known by the name of Vasudeva.

Behold, O Narada, the greatness and puissance of Narayana. He is never touched by dharma and adharma, good and evil deeds.

Sattva, rajas and tamas are said to be the three original gunas. These dwell and act in the bodies of all creatures. The Jivatman, called Kshetrajna, enjoys and sanctions the action of these gunas. He, however, transcends them and they cannot touch him.

Freed from these attributes, he supports them and gets pleasure from them. Having created them himself, the Jivatman is above them all. Devarishi, when the hour of universal dissolution arrives, Bhumi, which is the refuge of the universe, disappears into Jala, Jala disappears into Agni, Agni into Vayu, Vayu disappears into Akasa, and Akasa into Manas.

Manas is a wondrous creature, and it disappears into Avyakta Prakriti. Unmanifest Prakriti disappears into inert Purusha. There is nothing higher than Purusha, which is eternal. There is nothing among mobile and immobile things in the universe that is immutable, other than Vasudeva, the eternal Purusha. Imbued with great power, Vasudeva is the Atman of all creatures.

Earth, wind, space, water and light are the Panchamahabhutas of great power. Merging together they form the body. Having subtle potency and invisible to all eyes, Vasudeva then enters the body, the combination of the five primal elements. This is called his birth, and taking birth.

He causes the body to move about and act. Without a combination of the five Mahabhutas, no body can be created. Without the entry of the Jiva into the body, the mind dwelling within it cannot cause it to move and act. He that enters the body is powerful and is called Jiva.

He is known also by other names, Sesha and Samkarshana. He that arises from that Samkarshana, by his own actions, Sanatkumara, and in whom all creatures merge at the end of the yuga, is the mind of all creatures, and is called by the name Pradyumna.

From Pradyumna arises he who is the Creator, and who is both cause and effect. It is from this that the mobile and immobile universe originates. This one is called Aniruddha. He is otherwise called Isana, and he is manifest in all deeds.

That illustrious one, Vasudeva, who is called Kshetrajna, and who is without gunas, should be known as the puissant Samkarshana, when he takes birth as the Jiva. From Samkarshana arises Pradyumna who is called 'He that is born as Manas.' From Pradyumna is he who is Aniruddha. He is Chit, Consciousness, he is Iswara, Supreme Lord.

It is from me, that the entire mobile and immobile universe springs. It is from me, Narada, that the indestructible and destructible, the existent and the non-existent, flow. They that are devoted to me enter into me and become free.

I am known as Purusha. Without karma, I am the twenty-fifth tattva. Transcending attributes, I am complete and indivisible. I am above all pairs of contradictions and free from all attachments. Narada, this you will not understand.

You see me as having a body. If I so wish I can dissolve this form in a moment. I am the Paramatman and the Jagadguru, the preceptor of the universe. What you see is only maya, an illusion. I appear to be endowed with the attributes of all created things. You are not consummate enough to know me.

I have now revealed my fourfold form to you. I am, Narada, the doer, I am cause, and I am effect. I am the sum of all living creatures. All beings have their refuge in me. Do not think that you have seen the Kshetrajna.

I pervade all things. I am the Jivatman of all creatures. However, when their bodies are destroyed, I am not annihilated. Those blessed ascetics who become wholly devoted to me are liberated from the rajas and tamas gunas, and succeed in uniting with me.

He who is called Hiranyagarbha, Brahma who is the beginning of the world, who has four faces, who cannot be understood through Nirukta, who is an eternal deity, attends to my work. Rudra, born of my wrath, springs from my forehead.

Behold, the eleven Rudras protrude on the right side of my body. The twelve Adityas are on the left. Behold, the eight Vasus, those best of Devas, are in my front, and look, the Aswini Kumaras, Nasatya and Dasra, the two divine physicians, are at my back.

Behold all the Prajapatis and the Saptarishis also in my body. Behold the Vedas, and all the countless yagnas, the amrita and all the medicinal plants and herbs, the tapasyas, and all the diverse vratas and kriyas. Behold the eight attributes of puissance, particularly those of sovereignty, all dwelling together in my body in their united and embodied forms.

Behold also Sree and Lakshmi, and Kirti, and Bhumi Devi with her mountainous undulations, and Saraswati, the mother of the Vedas, dwelling in me. Behold Dhruva, that foremost of luminaries ranging the skies, as also all the oceans and lakes and rivers dwelling in me. Behold the four most excellent Pitris in their embodied forms, and the three gunas, sattva, rajas and tamas, dwelling formlessly within me.

The actions performed to honour the Pitris are superior in punya to those done in honour of the Devas. I am the Pitri of both the Devas and the Pitris, and have existed before even them. Becoming the Badava mukha, I course through the western and the northern oceans, drinking sacrificial libations duly poured with mantras and arghya offered with devotion.

In ancient times, I created Brahma who adored me in sacrifices. Gratified with him, I granted him many excellent boons. I said to him that in the beginning of the kalpa he would be born to me as my son, and the sovereignty of all the worlds would be vested in him, and that diverse names would be bestowed on diverse objects that mark the creation of Ahamkara.

I also told him that none would ever violate the limits and boundaries he would assign for all creatures to observe and, further, that he would grant boons to those who asked him through yagnas and fitting deeds. I further assured him that he would be revered by all the Devas and Asuras, all the Rishis and Pitris, and the diverse beings of creation.

I also explained that I would always manifest myself to accomplish the ends of the Devas and that I would suffer myself to be commanded by him even as a son by his father. Gratified with Brahma, I granted these and other agreeable boons to him and once more embraced the course dictated by Nivritti.

The highest Nivritti is identical with the annihilation of all dharma and karma. By adopting Nivritti one should conduct oneself in complete felicity. Learned gurus, with firm convictions deduced from the truths of the Samkhya philosophy, have spoken of me as Kapila full of gyana, dwelling within the effulgence of Surya, and concentrated in yoga.

In the Chchandas, I have been repeatedly addressed as Hiranyagarbha. In the yoga shastras, I have been spoken of as one who delights in yoga. I am eternal. Assuming a form that is manifest, I dwell now in swarga.

At the end of a thousand yugas I shall once more withdraw the universe into myself. Having withdrawn all beings, mobile and immobile into myself, I shall exist all alone with only gyana for my companion. After the passing of time I will once again create the universe, with the help of that knowledge.

My fourth form creates the indestructible Sesha. That Sesha is called by the name of Samkarshana. Samkarshana creates Pradyumna. From Pradyumna I am born as Aniruddha. Repeatedly, I create myself. From Aniruddha springs Brahma, from Aniruddha's navel. From Brahma are born all creatures.

Know that creation springs forth in this way repeatedly at the beginning of every kalpa. Creation and destruction succeed each other even as do sunrise and sunset. As time, infused with immeasurable energy, forcefully brings back the sun after his disappearance, in the same way I will assume the form of Varaha, the boar, and bring back the earth from her submergence, with her girdle of oceans, to her rightful place, for the benefit of all creatures.

I will then kill the proud powerful son of Diti, Hiranyaksha. For the good of the Devas, I will assume the form of Narasimha and slay Hiranyakasipu, the other son of Diti, who is a great destroyer of sacrifices.

Unto Virochana, the son of Prahlada, will be born a mighty son named Bali. That great Asura will be indestructible by the Devas, Asuras and Rakshasas. He will wrest sovereignty from Sakra.

After overthrowing the Lord of Sachi, when that Asura usurps the sovereignty of the three worlds, I will be born in Aditi's womb, by Kasyapa, as the twelfth Aditya. I will seize overlordship of the three worlds, restore it to Indra, and reinstate the Devas to their rightful places. As for Bali, that foremost of Danavas, who cannot be slain by all the Devas, I will thrust him down into patala.

In the Treta yuga, I will be born as Rama in the Bhrigu vamsa and annihilate the arrogant Kshatriyas, who boast of their strength and possessions. Towards the close of Treta and the beginning of Dwapara, I shall be born as Rama, the son of Dasaratha, in the Ikshvaku vamsa, in the royal house of the sun.

In that yuga the two sons of Prajapati, the Rishis Ekata and Dwita, harmed by their brother Trita, must be born as vanaras, losing their beautiful human forms.

Those vanaras that are born in the Ekata and Dwita vamsa, will be suffused with strength and tejas, equalling Sakra himself in prowess. They will become my allies for accomplishing the work of the Devas. I shall then slay the awesome ruler of the Rakshasas, that wretch of Pulastya's vamsa, the ferocious Ravana, along with his progeny and his followers.

Towards the close of the Dwapara and beginning of the Kali yuga, I will reappear in the world, taking birth in the city of Mathura for the purpose of slaying Kamsa. There, after destroying countless Danavas who incense the Devas, I will live in Kusasthali in Dwaraka.

While dwelling in that city I will slay the Asura Naraka, the son of Bhumi, who will assail Aditi and other Danavas, Muru and Pitha. Slaying also the king of Pragjyotisha, I will transplant his delightful city filled with diverse kinds of wealth into Dwaraka.

I will then subjugate Maheswara and Mahasena, who will become fond of the Danava Bana, their devotee, and protect him and exert themselves vigorously for him. Next defeating Bana, the son of the Danava Bali, with a thousand arms, I will obliterate all the inhabitants of the airborne Danava city called Saubha.

I will next, O foremost of Brahmanas, cause the death of Kalayavana, a mighty Danava endowed with the energy of Gargya. A proud Asura will appear as a king in Girivraja, his name Jarasandha, and he will oppose all the other kings of the world. His death will be compassed by me through another guided by my intelligence.

I will next annihilate Sisupala at the sacrifice of Dharmaraja Yudhishtira, a yagna to which all the kings of the world will bring tribute. In some of these feats, only Arjuna, the son of Vasava, will be my equal. I will establish Yudhishtira with all his brothers in his ancestral kingdom.

The people will call Arjuna and me Nara-Narayana, when we put forth our might and consume an untold number of Kshatriyas, for the good of the world. Having lightened the burden of the earth according to our wishes, I will absorb all the principal sattvas, and Dwaraka, my beloved city, into my own self, recollecting my all-embracing knowledge.

In this way I will accomplish many marvellous feats and finally attain those blessed realms of felicity created by me and honoured by all Brahmanas. Appearing in the forms of Hamsa, a swan; Matsya, a fish; Kurma, a tortoise; Narasimha, a man-lion; and Vamana, a dwarf, I will then incarnate myself as Rama of Bhrigu's race, then as Rama, the son of Dasaratha, then as Krishna the son of the Sattvata vamsa, and finally as Kalki the Destroyer.

When the auditions in the Vedas disappeared from the world, I brought them back. The Vedas with their auditions were recreated by me in the Krita yuga. They have again vanished or may only be partially heard scattered in the Puranas.

Many of my finest appearances in the world have become events of the past. Having achieved the good of the worlds in those forms in which I appeared, they have merged into my own Prakriti. Brahma himself has not seen this form of mine, which you, O Narada, have seen today because of your absolute devotion to me. I have now told you everything, you who are so totally devoted to me; I have disclosed my past and future incarnations to you, together with all their mysteries."'

Bhishma continues, 'The holy and illustrious deity, of universal and immutable form, having said these words unto Narada, disappeared instantly. Narada, having obtained the high favour that he had sought, went swiftly to the hermitage called Badari, to have a vision of Nara and Narayana.

This great Upanishad, perfectly consistent with the four Vedas, in harmony with Samkhya yoga, named the Pancharatra scriptures, and recited by Narayana himself, was repeated by Narada in the presence of many in the abode of his father, Brahma, in exactly the same way in which Narayana, when he had revealed himself to him, had recited it, and which he had himself heard.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Was not Brahma, the Creator of all things, acquainted with this wonderful narrative of the glory and wisdom of Narayana that he had to hear it first from the mouth of Narada? Is the illustrious Pitamaha of all the worlds in any way different from or inferior to the great Narayana? How then is it that he was unfamiliar with the puissance of Narayana of immeasurable energy?'

Bhishma continues, 'Hundreds and thousands of Mahakalpas, hundreds and thousands of creations and dissolutions have come and gone in the past.

In the beginning of every cycle of creation, Brahma, puissant Creator of all things, is remembered by Narayana.

Rajan, Brahma knows well that Narayana, that foremost of all Devas, is superior to him. He knows that Narayana is the Paramatman, that he is the Supreme Lord, that he is the Creator of Brahma himself.

This ancient story, perfectly consistent with the Vedas, was recited by Narada to that conclave of Rishis crowned with ascetic success. Surya Deva, having heard that account from those blessed Rishis, repeated it to the sixty-six thousand Rishis that follow in his train.

And Surya, who gives light to all worlds, repeated that narrative to those pure Beings who have been created by Brahma to always journey alongside him. The high-souled Rishis that follow in Surya's train, repeated that excellent tale unto the Devas assembled on the breast of Meru.

The best of Rishis, the regenerate Asita, having heard this from the Devas, repeated it to the Pitris. I heard it from my sire Shantanu who recited it to me. Myself having heard it from my father, I have repeated it to you, O Bhaarata.

Devas and Munis, who have heard this venerable Purana all adore the Supreme Soul. This narrative, belonging to the Rishis and thus handed down from one to another, should not be passed on by you to anyone who is not a devotee of Vasudeva. This one is really the essence of the hundreds of other narratives that you have heard from me.

In ancient times the Devas and the Asuras united to churn the ocean and to bring forth the amrita. In the same way, the Brahmanas united and churned all the scriptures and raised this narrative which resembles the nectar of immortality. He who frequently reads this narrative, and he who listens to it, with concentration and devotion, in a secluded place, succeeds in becoming an inhabitant possessing a lunar complexion of the vast island known as Sweta dwipa, the White Island.

Without doubt, such a man enters into Narayana of a thousand rays. By listening to this narrative from the beginning, a sick man is freed from his illness. The man who simply desires to read or listen to this narrative obtains the fruition of all his wishes. By reading or listening to it, the bhakta attains to the highest end that is kept for devout worshippers.

You, too, must always adore and worship that foremost of all Beings. He is the father and the mother of all creatures, and he is an object of reverence for the entire universe. Mahabaho Yudhishtira, let the illustrious and Eternal God of the Brahmanas, Janardana of high intelligence, be pleased with you!'"

Vaisampayana continued, "Having listened to the best of narratives, O Janamejaya, Dharmaraja Yudhishtira and all his brothers became devoted to Narayana. And from that day on, all of them began to practise silently meditating upon Narayana, and uttered these words to adore him, 'Victory to that holy and illustrious Being.'

Rishi Vyasa, best of gurus, devoted to tapasya, recited the word 'Narayana', that sublime mantra which is worthy of being recited in silence. Coursing through the sky to the ocean of milk which is always the abode of nectar, and worshipping the great God there, he came back to his own hermitage.

Bhishma continues, 'I have now repeated to you the tale that was told by Narada to the assembly of Rishis in the abode of Brahma. That narrative has descended from one person to another from the most ancient times. I heard it from my sire who told it to me.'"

In the Naimisa vana, among the Rishi Saunaka's sages, the Suta Romaharshana continued, 'I have now told you all that Vaisampayana narrated to Janamejaya. Having listened to Vaisampayana's narration, King Janamejaya discharged all his duties according to the rules laid down in the shastras.

You have all undergone severe tapasya and observed many high and excellent vratas. Living in this sacred forest of Naimisa, you are conversant with the Vedas. Foremost of regenerate ones, you all have come to this great yagna of Saunaka.

Adore and worship that Eternal and Supreme Lord of the universe in yagnas, properly pouring offerings of ghee into the fire, reciting mantras, and dedicating them to Narayana. As for myself, I heard this excellent account that has descended from generation to generation from my father who narrated it to me in earlier times.'

CANTO 341

Saunaka said, ‘How is Narayana, fully conversant with the Vedas and their branches, at once the doer and the enjoyer of sacrifices? Ever forgiving, he has adopted the religion of Nivritti, abstention. He himself has established the duties of Nivritti.

Why then has he made many Devas take shares in yagnas, which, of course, are all due to the disposition of Pravritti? Why has he created some with a contrary disposition, for they follow the rules of Nivritti?

O Suta, dispel our doubt. This doubt seems to be eternal and intertwined with a great mystery. You have heard all discourses on Narayana, discourses that are consistent with the shastras.’

Sauti said, ‘Excellent Saunaka, I shall recite to you what Vaisampayana, the disciple of the intelligent Vyasa, said when questioned on these very subjects by King Janamejaya. Having heard the discourse on the glory of Narayana who is the Soul of all embodied creatures, wise Janamejaya asked Vaisampayana these very questions.

Janamejaya said, “The whole world of Beings, with Brahma, the Devas, the Asuras and humans, is one that is deeply attached to actions which produce prosperity. You have said that mukti is the highest felicity marked by the end of existence.

Those who are without both paapa and punya succeed in becoming liberated when they enter the great God of a thousand rays. Brahmana, it appears that this mukti dharma is exceedingly difficult to practise. Turning away from it, all the Devas now take pleasure in the pouring of ghee on sacrificial fires along with the chanting of mantras, and offering other customary havis.

Brahma, Rudra, the puissant Sakra the slayer of Bala, Surya, Chandramas, Vayu, Agni, Varuna, the living Akasa, the universe as conscious agent, and the other inhabitants of swarga, all seem to be ignorant of the way to make an end to conscious existence, which can be had through Atmagyana, self-realisation.

This is perhaps why they have not be taken themselves to the path that is certain, indestructible, and immutable. Hence perhaps, turning away from that path, they have adopted the religion of Pravritti which leads to conscious existence measured by time. This, indeed, is one great flaw in those attached to karma, for all their gains are terminable.

This doubt, regenerate one, is planted in my heart like a dagger. Remove it by narrating some old discourses on this subject. I am profoundly curious to listen to you.

Why do the Devas take their respective shares of havis offered to them with the help of mantras in yagnas of diverse kinds? Why are the Swargavasis revered in sacrifices? And, O Dvijottama, to whom do they, who take their shares of offerings in sacrifices performed in their honour, themselves make offerings when they perform mahayagnas?"

Vaisampayana said, "Rajan, the question you have asked me relates to another deep mystery. One who has not undergone tapasya and is not familiar with the Puranas, cannot answer it. I will answer you, however, by narrating what my guru Vyasa, the island-born Krishna, the Maharishi who divided the original Veda, said to us when we once questioned him.

Sumanta, Jaimini and Paila of firm vows, Suka and I were Vyasa's sishyas. Numbering five in all, endowed with self-restraint and purity of rituals, we had completely subdued wrath and controlled our senses. Our guru used to teach us the four Vedas, and the Mahabharata as the fifth.

Once while we were engaged in studying the Vedas on Mount Meru, inhabited by the Siddhas and Charanas, this very doubt, as expressed by you today, arose in our minds. We questioned Vyasa about it. I heard his reply.

I will now narrate that answer to you, O Bhaarata. Hearing these words addressed to him by his disciples, that dispeller of all kinds of darkness represented by avidya, the blessed Vyasa, the son of Parasara, said, 'I have undergone most severe, the austerest of tapasya. I am fully aware of the past, the present and the future.

On account of my tapasya and self-restraint, as I lived on the shores of the ocean of milk, Narayana was gratified with me. His pleasure granted me my desire for this Trikalagyana, perfect knowledge of the past, the present and the future. Listen now to me as I address this great doubt that has disturbed your minds.

With the eye of knowledge, I have seen all that has happened since the beginning of the kalpa. He whom both the Samkhyas and yogis call by the name of Paramatman comes to be regarded as Mahapurusha as a consequence of his own actions.

From him springs forth the unmanifest, Avyakta, whom the learned call Pradhana. From the unmanifest rises the manifest, Vyakta, for the creation of all the words. He is called Aniruddha. That Aniruddha is known among all creatures by the name of Mahat Atman.

It is that Aniruddha who, becoming manifest, created the Pitamaha Brahma. Aniruddha is known by another name, Ahamkara, endowed with every kind of energy. Bhumi, Vayu, Akasa, Jala and Agni are the five Mahabhutas that have sprung from Ahamkara. Having created these five Mahabhutas, he then created their attributes.

Combining the Mahabhutas, he created diverse embodied beings. Listen to me as I recount them to you. Marichi, Angiras, Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, Vasishta and the Swayambhu Manu, these should be known as the eight Prakritis. Upon these rest all the worlds.

Then, for the fulfilment of all creatures, Brahma created the Vedas with all their angas, as also the yagnas with their constituent limbs. From these eight Prakritis have sprung all this vast universe.

Then emerged Rudra from the principle of wrath, and he created ten others like him. These eleven Rudras are called Vikara Purushas. The Rudras, the eight Prakritis, and the several Devarishis, having being born, approached Brahma with the objective of upholding the universe and its workings.

Addressing the grandsire, they said, ‘Holy One, we have been created by you. Pitamaha, tell us about our respective spheres of influence and authority. What particular jurisdictions have been created by you for supervising the various affairs of creation?

What kind of consciousness should each of us have, and which of these areas should we take charge of? Also endow each of us the measure of power that we are to have to discharge our duties.’

Thus addressed by them, Brahma replied unto them in the following way: ‘You deities have done well in speaking to me of this matter. Blessed be you all! I was thinking of this very matter that has engaged your attention. How should the three worlds be upheld and kept stable? How should your powers and mine be employed towards that end?

Let all of us leave this place and repair to that unmanifest and foremost of Beings, who is the witness of the world, to seek his protection. He will inform us what is for our good.’

Those Devas and Rishis, with Brahma, went to the northern shores of the ocean of milk, wishing to do good to the three worlds.

Arriving there, they began to practise those austere tapasyas advocated by Brahma in the Vedas, those penances known by the name of Mahaniyama. They stood there with minds fixed, unmoving as wooden posts, with eyes and hands raised up above their heads.

For a thousand celestial years they engaged in rigorous tapasya. At the end of that period they heard these sweet words in harmony with the Vedas and their angas.

‘I welcome you Devas and Rishis, blessed with the wealth of asceticism, with Brahma in your company, and to you I say that I know what is in your hearts. Your thoughts are indeed for the good of the three worlds.

I will increase your energy and strength with Pravritti, the propensity for action. You have devoutly worshipped me with tapasya. Foremost of Beings, enjoy now the fruits of your austerities.

This Brahma is the Lord of all the worlds. Endued with puissance, he is Prajapati of all creatures. You too are the best of the Devas. With dhyana, perform yagnas for my glory.

In these sacrifices always give me a portion of the sacrificial offerings. I will then assign to each of you your respective jurisdictions and ordain what will be for your good!’”

Vaisampayana continued, “Vyasa said, ‘Hearing these words of the God of gods, all those Devas, Maharishis and Brahma were filled with such delight that the hair on their bodies stood on end. They immediately made arrangements for a yagna in honour of Vishnu according to the niyamas laid down in the Vedas.

In that sacrifice, Brahma himself dedicated a portion of the offerings to Vishnu. The Devas and Devarishis also dedicated similar portions each unto him. These portions, offered with great reverence, were in accordance with the rules established for the Krita yuga, both in measure and excellence.

In that yagna, the Devas and the Rishis and Brahma worshipped Vishnu Narayana as one with the complexion of the sun, as the foremost of Beings, situated beyond the reach of tamas, vast and infinite, pervading all things, the Supreme Lord of all, the giver of boons. Thus adored by them, invisible and formless, bodiless, He addressed those assembled divinities, saying to them:

"The offerings dedicated by you in this sacrifice have all reached me. I am gratified with all of you. I shall bestow rewards on you that will however be fraught with destinations from which there will be return.

Devas, because of my grace and compassion for you this shall be your distinctive feature from this day onwards. Performing sacrifices in every yuga, with large gifts, you will enjoy the fruits born of Pravritti. Men who perform yagnas according to the rules of the Vedas will give unto all of you shares of their havis.

In such yagnas, according to the Veda-sutras I compel a man to receive a share similar to that which he has himself offered in that sacrifice. You have been created to look after those affairs within your respective domains; uphold the worlds according to the measures of your power, which depend on the shares you receive in those sacrifices.

Indeed, drawing strength from those rites and rituals prevailing in the several worlds, arising from the fruits of Pravritti, and continue to uphold the affairs of those worlds. Strengthened by the yagnas that will be performed by men, you will strengthen me.

This is what I intend for you all. It is for this purpose that I have created the Vedas and sacrifices and plants and herbs. Duly revered by humans on earth, the Devas will be gratified. Foremost of deities, till the end of this kalpa I have ordained your creation, making your constitution depend upon the consequence of Pravritti dharma. Now, with regard to your respective spheres of influence, engage yourselves in seeking the good of the three worlds.

Marichi, Angiras, Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu and Vasishta, these seven Rishis have been created by a fiat of the will, Manas. They will become the foremost of those conversant with the Vedas. In fact, they will become the teachers of the Vedas. They will be wedded to Pravritti dharma, for they are intended to devote themselves to procreation.

I reveal to you this eternal path of creatures engaged in kriyas and karmas. The puissant Lord who is charged with the creation of all the worlds is Aniruddha; Sana, Sanatsujata, Sanaka, Sanandana, Sanatkumara, Kapila and Sanatana, these seven Rishis are known as the spiritual sons of Brahma.

Their knowledge comes to them of itself, not dependent on study or exertion. These seven are wedded to Nivritti dharma. They are the foremost of all yogis. They possess deep knowledge of the Samkhya philosophy.

They teach the dharma of the shastras, and it is they who introduce the duties of Nivritti and cause them to arise in the worlds. From unmanifest Prakriti has flowed Consciousness and the three great gunas of sattva, rajas, and tamas. Transcending Prakriti is he called Kshetrajna. I myself am that Kshetrajna.

The path of those wedded to karma emerging out of Ahamkara is fraught with return. That path does not reach the place from where there is no return. Different creatures have been created with different ends. Some are intended for the path of Pravritti and some for that of Nivritti. One enjoys the reward of the particular path he follows.

This Brahma is the master of all the worlds. With his power he creates the universe. He is your mother and father, and he is your grandfather. At my command, he will be the giver of boons unto all creatures.

His son Rudra, who has sprung from his brow at his command, will uphold all created beings. Go to your respective realms and, according to the laws, seek the good of the worlds. Let all the karma based on the shastras flow in all the worlds. Do not delay.

Most excellent divinities, ordain the deeds of all creatures and their goals. Determine also the limits of the periods for which all creatures are to live. This present yuga that has begun is the foremost of all, and should be known by the name of Krita.

In this yuga, living creatures should not be killed in the yagnas that may be performed. It should be as I command and not otherwise. In this age, righteousness, dharma, will flourish in its fullness.

After this age will come the Treta yuga. In that yuga, the Vedas will lose one quarter of themselves. Only three of them will exist. In the sacrifices performed in that epoch, animals, after dedication with sacred mantras, will be killed. Dharma, too, will lose one quarter; only three quarters of righteousness will flourish.

At the end of the Treta will come Dwapara, the mixed yuga. In that age, dharma will lose two quarters and only two quarters will thrive.

Upon the end of Dwapara, Kali yuga, under the influence of the Tisya constellation. Righteousness will lose full three quarters. Only a quarter thereof will exist in all places."

When Narayana spoke these words, the Devas and the Devarishis said to him, "If only a fourth part of dharma is to exist in that yuga in every place, tell us where shall we then go and what shall we do?"

The blessed and Holy One said, "In that yuga, you should repair to such places where the Vedas and yagnas, tapasya and satya and self-restraint, accompanied by duties filled with compassion for all creatures, still continue to flourish. Evil will never be able to touch you at all!"'

Vyasa continued, 'Thus commanded by the great God, the Devas with all the Rishis bowed their heads and went away to their destinations. After the Rishis and Devas had left, Brahma remained there, desirous of beholding the great deity in the form of Aniruddha.

The foremost of Devas then manifested himself to Brahma, having assumed a form that had a gigantic equine head. Bearing a kamandalu and the tridanda, he manifested himself before Brahma, reciting the while the Vedas with all their angas.

Beholding him in that form crowned with a badava mukha, a horse's head, Brahma, the creator of all the worlds, moved by the desire of doing good to his Creation, worshipped him with bowed head and folded hands. The great Deity embraced Brahma and then said:

"O Brahma, duly think of the paths of karma that creatures are to follow. You are the great ordainer of all created beings. You are the lord of the universe. Placing this burden on you I will soon be free from anxiety.

When it becomes difficult for you to achieve the purposes of the Devas I will appear in incarnate forms according to my Atmagyana." Having said these words that grand form with the horse's head disappeared in a flash. Having received his command, Brahma too, went swiftly to his own realm.

It is for this that Vishnu, Padmanabha with the lotus in his navel, accepted the first share offered in sacrifices and because of this he came to be called the eternal upholder of all yagnas. He himself adopted Nivritti dharma, the goal of those seeking everlasting felicity.

At the same time, he established Pravritti dharma for others, in order to furnish variety to the universe. He is the beginning, he is the middle, and he is the end of all created Beings.

He is their Creator and he is their one object of meditation. He is the actor and he is the act. Having withdrawn the universe into himself at the end of the yuga, he falls asleep, and awakening at the beginning of another yuga, he once again creates the universe.

Bow unto that illustrious one of high soul and who transcends the three gunas, who is un-born, whose form is the universe, and who is the abode or refuge of all the inhabitants of swarga. Bow unto him who is the Supreme Lord of all creatures, who is the Lord of the Adityas, and of the Vasus as well.

Bow unto him who is the Lord of the Aswins, and the Lord of the Maruts, who is the Lord of all the sacrifices ordained in the Vedas, and the Lord of the Vedangas. Bow unto him who always resides in the ocean, and who is called Hari, and whose hair is like the blades of the munja grass.

Bow unto him who is peace and serenity, and who imparts mukti dharma to all. Bow to him who is the Lord of penances, of all kinds of energy, and of fame, who is ever the Lord of speech and the Lord of all the rivers.

Bow unto him who is called Kapardin, Rudra, who is the Great Boar, and who possesses great intelligence, who is the sun, and who took the form with the horse's head; he Lord who is always displayed in a fourfold form. Bow unto him who is unrevealed, who is capable of being grasped through gyana alone, and who is both Akshara and Kshara.

The Supreme Deity, who is immutable, pervades all things. He is the Supreme Lord who can be only known with the eye of knowledge. It was with gyana that I perceived him in ancient times.

Sishyas, I have told you all that you asked me; now act according to what I have said and serve the Supreme Lord called Hari. Sing his praises in Vedic mantras; adore and worship him with all due rites!'" Vaisampayana continued, "It was thus that Vyasa, the arranger of the Vedas, discoursed to us, when we questioned him. His son, the righteous Suka, and us, all his sishyas, listened avidly to him as he addressed us. We and our gurus then adored the great deity with verses, Riks extracted from the four Vedas.

I have now told you all that you asked me. Rajan, thus did our island-born preceptor instruct us.

He who has surrendered to Narayana and listens, with dhyana, to this discourse or reads or recites it to others, is filled with intelligence and health, beauty and strength. If ill, he is freed from that illness; if bound, he is freed from his bonds.

The man who desires receives the fruits of all his desires, and also attains to a long life. By doing this, a Brahmana becomes conversant with all the Vedas, and a Kshatriya is crowned with success. Following this a Vaisya makes vast profits, and a Sudra attains great felicity.

A sonless man obtains a son. A woman finds a desirable husband. A woman that has conceived gives birth to a son. A barren woman conceives and attains to the wealth of sons and grandsons.

He who recites this discourse on the way succeeds in passing joyfully along this path without any obstacles. If one reads or recites this story, he attains whatever objects he cherishes.

Hearing these assured and true words of the Maharishi, embodying the gunas of that high-souled one, listening to this narrative of the great assembly of Rishis and other inhabitants of swarga, men devoted to the Supreme Deity find great bliss."

CANTO 342

Janamejaya said, "Holy one, tell me the significance of those diverse names uttered by Maharishi Vyasa and his disciples to praise Madhusudana, the slayer of Madhu. I am keen to hear those names of Hari, that Supreme Lord of all creatures. By listening to those names, I shall be purified and cleansed like the bright autumn moon."

Vaisampayana said, "Listen, Rajan, to the significance of those names, diverse because of the many attributes and actions of Hari, as the puissant Hari himself explained them to Arjuna. That Parantapa once asked Krishna about the importance and meaning of some of the names by which he was adored.

Arjuna said, 'Krishna, Supreme ordainer of the past and the future, Creator of all Beings, immutable One, Refuge of all the worlds, Lord of the universe, dispeller of the fears of all men, from you I desire to know in detail the significance of all your names which have been enumerated by the great Rishis in the Vedas and the Puranas because of your awesome and diverse deeds. None other than you, Kesava, is competent to explain this.'

Krishna said, 'Arjuna, in the Rig Veda, in the Yajur Veda, in the Atharvans and the Samans, in the Puranas and the Upanishads, as also in the treatises on jyotisha, astrology, in the Samkhya and yoga shastras, and in the treatises on Ayurveda, the science of life, many are the names that have been mentioned by the great Rishis.

Some of those names are derived from my attributes and some of them relate to my deeds. Listen with concentration of the import of each of those names with reference to my exploits. I will recite them to you.

It is said that in ancient times you were half my body. Salutations to him of great glory, who is the Paramatman of all embodied creatures. Salutations to Narayana, unto him who is the universe, unto him that transcends the three primal gunas of sattva, rajas and tamas, unto him that is the Soul of those attributes.

From his grace has arisen Brahma and from his wrath Rudra. He is the source from which all mobile and immobile creatures emerge. Sattva is made up of eighteen qualities.

That attribute is Supreme Nature; her soul consists of Akasa and Bhumi and she upholds the universe with her creative forces. That Prakriti is identical with the fruit of all karma, in the form of the diverse realms of felicity which creatures attain through their actions.

She is also the pure Chit. She is immortal, and invincible, and is called the Soul of the universe. From her flows all the modifications of both creation and destruction. She is identical with my nature. Without sex, she or he is the tapasya that men undergo.

He is both the yagna performed and the sacrificer that performs it. He is the ancient and the infinite Purusha. He is otherwise called Aniruddha and is the source of the creation and the destruction of the universe.

When Brahma's night ended, through the grace of that Being of immeasurable energy, a lotus appeared, O you of eyes like lotus-petals. Within that lotus Brahma was born, springing from Aniruddha's grace.

Towards the evening of Brahma's day, Aniruddha was filled with anger, and from this there sprang from his forehead a son called Rudra with the power of destroying everything at the hour of Pralaya. Brahma and Rudra are the foremost of all the Devas, having sprung respectively from the auspiciousness and the wrath of Aniruddha.

Acting according to Aniruddha's command, these two Devas create and destroy. Although capable of granting boons to all creatures, in the matter of creation and destruction, they are mere instruments in the hands of Aniruddha. It is Aniruddha that does everything, making Brahma and Rudra the visible driving forces in the universe.

Rudra is otherwise called Kapardin. He sometimes has matted locks of hair; at other times he reveals a shorn head. He favours living in samsanas, cremation grounds, which are indeed his home.

He is an observer of the austerest vratas. He is a yogin of great power and energy. He is the destroyer of Daksha's sacrifice and of Bhaga's eyes.

Son of Pandu, it should be understood that Rudra always has Narayana for his Atman. If Maheswara is worshipped, then the puissant Narayana is also worshipped. I am the soul of all the worlds, of all the universe. Rudra, again, is my Soul.

It is for this that I always venerate him. If I do not adore the auspicious and boon-giving Isana nobody would then adore me. The laws I establish are followed by all the worlds. These must always be revered and for this reason I do adore them.

He who knows Rudra knows me, and he who knows me knows Rudra. He who follows Rudra follows me, Rudra is Narayana. Both are one; and the one is displayed in two different forms. Rudra and Narayana, forming one person, pervade all visible things and cause them to act.

Son of Pandu, no one other than Rudra can grant me a boon. Having realised this, in olden times, I revered Rudra to obtain the boon of a son. In adoring Rudra thus I adored my own self. Vishnu never bows his head to any god other than his own self. It is for this reason that I adore Rudra, for Rudra is my own self.

All the Devas, including Brahma and Indra, and the Maharishis worship Narayana, that foremost of deities, also known by the name of Hari. Vishnu is the foremost of all Beings past, present or future, and as such should always be adored and revered.

Bow to Vishnu. Bow your head unto him who protects everyone. Arjuna, bow to that great boon-giving God, that foremost of deities, who consumes the offerings made to him in yagnas.

I have heard that there are four kinds of worshippers: those who are eager for a religious life, those who are seekers, those who strive to understand what they learn, and those who are wise. Among them all, they who devote themselves to realising the self and do not adore any other deity, are the best. I am the end they seek, and though engaged in karma, they never seek its fruits.

The three other categories of my worshippers are those that desire the fruits of their actions. They attain to realms of great felicity, but once they have exhausted their punya they must fall from those realms. Those amongst my devotees who are fully awakened, and know that all happiness is transitory, other than what is attained by those who become united with me, obtain what is most invaluable.

Those enlightened ones may be engaged in adoring Brahma or Siva or the other Devas in heaven but they succeed at last in realising me. I have now told you about my diverse devotees.

Arjuna, you and I are known as Nara and Narayana. Both of us have assumed human bodies only for the purpose of lightening the burden of the earth. I am fully aware of my self.

I know who I am and from where I come. I know Nivritti dharma, and all that is responsible for the prosperity of all creatures. I am eternal and the sole refuge of all men. The waters have been called by the name Naara, for they sprang from him called Nara. And since the waters, in former times, were my refuge, I am, therefore, referred to as Narayana.

Assuming the form of the sun, I envelop the universe with my rays. And because I am home to all creatures, I am called by the name of Vasudeva. I am the end of all creatures and their beginning, Bhaarata.

I pervade the entire firmament and the earth, and my splendour transcends every other splendour. I am he whom all creatures wish to attain to at the hour of death. And because I pervade all the universe, I have been called the name Vishnu. Desiring mukti through subduing their senses, people seek to me, I who am swarga and Bhumi and the sky between the two. For this I am called Damodara.

The word prishni includes food, water, the Vedas and amrita. These four are always in my belly. Hence am I called Prishnigarbha. The Rishis once said that when the Rishi Trita was thrown into a well by Ekata and Dwiti, the distressed Trita invoked me, saying, "O Prishnigarbha, rescue the fallen Trita!" Having thus implored me, Trita, the spiritual son of Brahma, was indeed rescued from the fathomless well.

The rays that emanate from the sun who gives heat to the world, from the blazing fire, and from the moon, constitute my hair. Hence do learned Brahmanas call me by the name of Kesava.

The Mahatman Utathya having impregnated his wife disappeared from her side through an illusion of the gods. The younger brother Brihaspati then appeared before her. To him who had approached Utathya's wife with the desire of sexual union, the child in her womb, whose body had already been formed of the five primal elements, said, "Giver of boons, I have already entered into this womb. It befits you not to assail my mother."

Hearing these words of the unborn child, Brihaspati was angered and cursed him, "Since you obstruct me so when I have come to you from desire of the pleasures of union, I curse you to be born blind!"

Through this curse the child of Utathya was born blind, and blind he remained for a long time. It was for this reason that that Rishi came to be known by the name of Dirghatamas, or long darkness.

He, however, acquired the four Vedas with their angas and subsidiary angas. After that he frequently invoked me by this secret name of mine. Indeed, according to the established rules, he repeatedly called upon me by the name Kesava.

Through the punya he acquired by uttering this name repeatedly, he was cured of his blindness and came to be called Gotama. Arjuna, this name of mine gives boons to them who that utter it, among all the Devas and the Devarishis.

Agni and Soma combine and fuse into one substance. It is for this reason that the entire universe of mobile and immobile creatures is said to be pervaded by them.

In the Puranas, Agni and Soma are spoken of as complementary to one another. They have Agni for their mouth. As their natures lead to their mingling, they balance each other and uphold the universe.'"

CANTO 343

"Arjuna said, 'How did Agni and Soma come to be so similar in their original natures? This doubt has arisen in my mind. Dispel it, slayer of Madhu.'

Krishna said, 'I shall narrate to you an ancient story of events originating from my own energy. Listen carefully.

When four thousand yugas according to divine measure pass, the dissolution of the universe comes. The Vyakta, manifest, disappears into the Avyakta, unmanifest. All creatures, mobile and immobile, are destroyed. Agni, Bhumi and Vayu disappear. Tamas, darkness, spreads over the universe which becomes one infinite expanse of water.

When that vast expanse of water, Ekarnava, exists like Brahman without another, it is neither day nor night. Neither all nor nothing nor aught exists; neither the manifest nor the unmanifest. Then only undifferentiated Brahman exists.

When this is the condition of the universe, the foremost of Beings emerges from tamas—the eternal and immutable Hari who is the combination of all the attributes, including omnipotence, of Narayana, who is indestructible and eternal, without senses, inconceivable and unborn, who is truth's self fraught with compassion, who exists like the rays of the Chintamani jewel.

He is One that causes diverse kinds of desires to flow in many directions, who is devoid of hostility, and decay, death and destruction, who is formless and all-pervading, and who is endowed with the principle of universal creation and of eternity without beginning, middle or end.

There is a basis for this assertion. The Sruti declares: Day was not. Night was not. All was not. Nothing was not. In the beginning there was only tamas in the form of the universe, and she is the night of Narayana of universal form. This is the meaning of the word tamas.

That Purusha called Hari, thus born of tamas and having Brahman for his sire, gave birth to Brahma. Wishing to create creatures, Brahma caused Agni and Soma to spring from his own eyes.

After this, men were created in their proper order as Brahmanas and Kshatriyas. He who began life as Soma was none other than Brahma; and they who were born as Brahmanas were in reality all Soma. Those who started into being as Kshatriyas were none other than Agni.

The Brahmanas gained greater energy than the Kshatriyas. If you ask why, the answer is that this superiority of the Brahmanas to the Kshatriyas is manifest through the whole world. It happened thus.

With regards to men, the Brahmanas represent the oldest creation. None higher than them were created before. He who offers food into the mouth of a Brahmana pours libations into a blazing fire to gratify the Devas.

I say that having ordained things in this manner, Brahma then created all creatures. Having established all created beings in their respective places, he upholds the three worlds.

There is a similar declaration in the mantras of the Srutis: Agni, you are the Hotri in yagnas and the benefactor of the universe. You support the Devas, all men and all the worlds. There is no other authority for this purpose.

Agni, you are the Hotri of the universe and of sacrifices. You are the one through which the Devas and men do good to the universe. Agni is truly the Hotri and the performer of sacrifices.

Agni is again the Brahma of the yagna. No libations can be poured into the sacrificial fire without uttering mantras; there can be no tapasyas without someone to perform them; the Devas, Rishis and Manavas are worshipped by these offerings accompanied by mantras. Hence, O Agni, you have been regarded as the Hotri in sacrifices.

You are, again, all the other mantras that are have been associated with the Homa rites. It is the ordained duty of the Brahmanas to preside over yagnas.

The other two twice-born varnas, the Kshatriyas and Vaisyas, do not have the same duty. Brahmanas, like Agni, uphold sacrifices. The yagnas performed by them strengthen the Devas. Thus maintained they fructify the earth thereby supporting all living creatures.

But the result that may be achieved by the best of yagnas may as well be accomplished through the mouth of the Brahmanas. That learned man who offers food into the mouth of a Brahmana is said to pour libations into the sacred fire to gratify the Devas. In this way the Brahmanas have come to be regarded as Agni.

Those who are wise adore Agni. Agni is, again, Vishnu. Entering all creatures, he upholds their life-breaths.

In this regard there is a verse sung by Sanatkumara. Brahma, in creating the universe, first created the Brahmanas. The Brahmanas become immortal and ascend into swarga by studying the Vedas. Their Buddhi, kriyas and karmas, tapasyas, speech and faith, sustain both the earth and heaven like ropes of strings holding up nectarine milk.

There is no dharma higher than truth. There is no one more worthy of reverence than the mother. There is none more efficient than the Brahmana for conferring felicity both in this life and the next.

In places where Brahmanas are unsupported by gifts of land, the inhabitants become dejected. There, oxen do not carry the people or draw the plough, nor are they borne by carts or chariots. There milk kept in jars is never churned to yield butter.

On the other hand, the people become destitute and take to stealing instead of being able to enjoy the blessings of peace.

In the Vedas, the Puranas and other authoritative texts, it is said that Brahmanas, who are the souls of all creatures, who are the creators of all things, and who can be identified with all existing beings, sprang from the mouth of Narayana. It is said that the Brahmanas originated when he subdued his speech as a penance; the other varnas arose from the Brahmanas.

The Brahmanas are honoured above the Devas and Asuras, since they were created by me in my ineffable form as Brahma. As I have created the Devas and the Asuras and the Maharishis so have I placed the Brahmanas in their respective stations and have at times to punish them.

On account of his licentious assault on Ahalya, Indra was cursed by her husband Gautama, and had a green beard. Through that curse Indra also lost his testicles, which were later replaced by the testicles of a ram out of the compassion of the other Devas.

At the yagna of King Sarjati, when Maharishi Chyavana wanted to make the Aswins share in the Soma rasa, Indra objected. When Chyavana insisted, Indra wanted to hurl his thunderbolt at the sage. The Rishi paralysed Indra's arms.

Incensed at the destruction of his sacrifice by Rudra, Daksha once more began to practise severe tapasya and, attaining to high puissance, caused a third eye to appear on Rudra's forehead for the destruction of Tripurasura.

When Rudra tried to destroy this city of the Asuras, Sukra Usanas, the acharya of the Asuras, was provoked to tear a matted lock from his own head and cast it at Rudra. From that matted lock of Usanas sprang many serpents. Those serpents bit Rudra turning his throat blue.

In the ancient times of Swayambhuva Manu, it is said that Narayana seized Rudra by the throat, turning it blue. When the ocean was churned to raise up the amrita, Brihaspati of Angira's vamsa sat on its shores to perform the Puruscharana rite. When he took up a little water for the initial achamana, the water appeared murky.

Brihaspati was enraged and cursed the ocean, saying, "Since you continue to be so filthy despite my having come to you to touch you, since you have not become clear and transparent, from this day on you will be defiled with fish, sharks, tortoises and other aquatic creatures." From that time, the waters of the ocean have been infested with diverse kinds of sea creatures and monsters.

Viswarupa, the son of Tvashtri, once was the Hotri priest of the Devas. On his mother's side he was related to the Asuras, his mother being the daughter of a Danava. While publicly offering the Devas their shares of sacrificial offerings, he privately offered havis to the Asuras.

The Asuras, led by Hiranyakasipu, then went to their sister, the mother of Viswarupa, and obtained a boon from her, saying, "Viswarupa by Tvashtri, otherwise called Trisiras, is now the priest of the Devas. While he gives them their shares of sacrificial offerings publicly, he gives us our shares secretly. Thus the Devas are strengthened and we are weakened. Sister, prevail upon him to take up our cause."

The mother of Viswarupa went to her son who was dwelling in the Nandana forests of Indra and said to him, "How is it, son, that you advance the cause of your enemies and weaken that of your maternal uncles? It is not fitting for you to act in this manner."

Thus entreated by his mother, Viswarupa reflected on her words, paid his respects to her, and went over to the side of Hiranyakasipu. Upon his arrival, King Hiranyakasipu dismissed his old Hotri, Vasishta, the son of Brahma, and appointed Trisiras to that office.

Incensed, Vasishta cursed Hiranyakasipu, “Since you have dismissed me and appointed another as your Hotri, your yagna will not be completed, and some Being the like of whom has not existed before will destroy you!” As a result of this curse, Hiranyakasipu was slain by Vishnu in the form of a manticore, the Narasimha.

Viswarupa, having gone over to the side of his maternal relations, employed himself in severe tapasyas to elevate them. In order to distract him from his vows, Indra sent many beautiful Apsaras to him. Seeing these divine nymphs of transcendent beauty, Viswarupa’s heart was agitated. Soon he became exceedingly attached to them.

Recognising this, one day these Apsaras said to him, “We will not stay here any longer. We will return to the place from where we came.” The son of Tvashtri said to them, “Where will you go? Stay with me. I shall be good to you.”

Hearing him say this, the Apsaras rejoined, “We are divine Apsaras. In the past we chose the illustrious and boon-giving Indra of great puissance.”

Viswarupa then said to them. “This very day I will make all the Devas with Indra at their head cease to exist.”

Saying this, Trisiras began to inwardly recite certain powerful sacred mantras. By virtue of those mantras he began to grow in tejas. With one of his mouths he began to drink all the Soma that Brahmanas poured on their sacred fires in their yagnas. With a second mouth he began to eat all food offered in those sacrifices. With his third mouth he began to consume the energy of all the Devas with Indra at their head.

Seeing him swelling with power and energy in every part of his body strengthened by the Soma he swallowed, all the Devas led by Indra flew to Pitamaha Brahma. Arriving in his presence, they said to him, “All the Soma that is offered in the yagnas performed everywhere is being drunk by Viswarupa. We no longer receive our due shares. The Asuras are being empowered while we are being weakened. Ordain what is for our good.”

The Pitamaha replied, “The Maharishi Dadichi of Bhrigu’s vamsa is even now engaged in performing severe austerities. Go to him and ask him for a boon. Do so that he may cast off his body. With his bones let a new weapon, the vajra, an adamantine thunderbolt, be created."

Thus instructed, the Devas set off for where the holy Dadichi was engaged in his tapasya. The Devas addressed the sage, saying, "Holy one, we hope that your austerities are being performed without hindrances."

Dadhichi said, "Welcome to all of you. Tell me what I may do for you. I will certainly do what you ask."

They said to him, "Cast off your body for the good of all the worlds."

The sage Dadhichi, who was a great yogin who regarded joy and sorrow equably, calmly focused his Atmashakti using his yoga and cast off his body.

When his soul left its temporary home, Dhatri took his bones and created an irresistible weapon, the vajra. Made with the bones of a Brahmana, it was indestructible, inexorable and pervaded by the energy of Vishnu; using that weapon, Indra struck Viswarupa, the son of Tvashtri.

Having slain the son of Tvashtri, Indra severed his head from the body. The energy still dwelling in the lifeless body of Viswarupa, when it was kneaded, gave birth to a mighty Asura by the name of Vritra. Vritra became Indra's enemy, but Indra killed him also with the vajra and with deceit.

With this doubling of the sin of Brahmahatya, Indra was overcome with a great fear and he had to forsake the sovereignty of swarga. He entered a cool lotus stalk that grew in the Manasa Lake. Using the yoga siddhi of anima, he became minute and entered the fibres of that lotus-stalk.

When the Lord of the three worlds, the husband of Sachi, had thus vanished through the fear of the consequences of the sin of killing a Brahmana, the universe became lordless. The gunas, rajas and tamas, assailed the Devas. The mantras uttered by the great Rishis lost all efficacy. Rakshasas appeared everywhere. The Vedas were about to disappear.

Without a king, the inhabitants of all the worlds lost their strength and Rakshasas and other evil beings began to attack them. Then the Devas and the Rishis united and crowned Nahusha, the son of Ayusha, king of the three worlds.

Nahusha had on his forehead full five hundred luminaries of blazing effulgence, which had the power to destroy every fell creature of energy. Thus endowed he continued to rule heaven. The three worlds were restored to balance. Their inhabitants once more became happy and cheerful.

Nahusha then said, “Everything that Indra used to enjoy is mine. Only his wife Sachi is not.” Saying this, he went to Sachi and said to her, “Blessed Devi, I have become the Lord of the Devas. You too, accept me.”

Sachi replied, “You are, by your very nature, wedded to righteous behaviour. You also belong to the vamsa of Soma. It is not right for you to importune another’s wife.”

Nahusha said, “I now hold Indra’s position and wield his power. I deserve to enjoy his dominions and all his precious possessions. Hence there can be no sin in my desiring to enjoy you. You were Indra’s and should, therefore, now be mine.

Sachi said to him, “I am observing a vrata that has not yet been completed. After performing the final ablutions I will come to you, in a few days.” Extracting this promise from Sachi, Nahusha left.

Sachi, indignant and grief-stricken, anxious to find her husband, and fearing Nahusha, she went to Brihaspati. Brihaspati instantly understood her agitation. Through the power of yoga, he understood that she was determined to restore her husband to his rightful place.

Brihaspati said to her, “With your tapasya and punya as a result of your vow, pray to the boon-giving Goddess Upasruti. Invoked by you, she will appear and show you where Indra dwells.

Sachi, observing her strict vrata, with the help of appropriate mantras, invoked the Devi. The goddess appeared before her and said, “I am here at your bidding. What is your wish?”

Bowing before her, Sachi said, “O Devi, show me where my husband is. You are truth. You are Rita.”

Thus addressed, the Devi Upasruti took her to the Manasa Lake. Arriving there, she pointed out to Sachi her Lord Indra dwelling within the fibres of a lotus-stalk. Seeing his wife looking pale and emaciated, Indra was alarmed.

And the Lord of heaven said to himself, “Alas, great is my sorrow. I have fallen from the position that is mine. My wife, afflicted with grief on my account, seeks my lost self and comes to me.”

Reflecting in this train, Indra said to Sachi, “In what condition are you now? What is your situation?” She answered him, “Nahusha called me to make me his wife. I obtained a week’s brief respite from him, which has already elapsed.”

Indra said to her, “Go and say to Nahusha that he should come to you on a chariot never used before—one yoked to some great Rishis; arriving in that manner he should marry you. Indra has many kinds of beautiful and wondrous chariots. All these have borne you. Nahusha should come on one such that Indra himself does not possess.”

Thus advised by her husband, Sachi left that place with a hopeful heart. Indra once more entered the fibres of the lotus-stalk.

Seeing Indra’s queen return to swarga, Nahusha said to her, “The time you had fixed to become mine has passed.” Sachi repeated to him what Indra had directed her to say. Harnessing a number of great Rishis to his chariot, Nahusha set out from his palace for where Sachi lived.

Agastya, born in a jar, of the vital seed of Mitra and Varuna, saw those Maharishis being insulted by Nahusha in that way. Nahusha kicked him with his foot.

Agastya said, “Wretch, you have acted vilely and you will plunge down to the earth. You will be transformed into a snake and will continue to live in that form as long as the earth and her mountains exist.”

As soon as these words were uttered by the great Rishi, Nahusha fell out of his chariot. The three worlds once more lost a master. The Devas and the Rishis united and went to Vishnu and appealed to him to restore Indra.

Approaching him, they said, “Holy one, it is right for you to rescue Indra who is blighted by the sin of killing a Brahmana.”

Vishnu replied, “Let Sakra perform an Aswamedha yagna in my honour and he will be restored to his former position and glory.”

The Devas and the Rishis began to search for Indra; not finding him, they went to Sachi and said to her, “O blessed one, go to Indra and bring him here.”

Sachi went once more to the Manasa Lake. Indra rose from the waters and came to Brihaspati.

Devaguru Brihaspati made arrangements for a great Aswamedha, substituting a black deer for a regal back steed fit in every way to be offered up in sacrifice. Brihaspati had Indra, the Lord of the Maruts, ride on that horse he saved from slaughter, stole away, and led him to his own palace for Indra to perform his Aswamedha yagna. The king of swarga was then adored with mantras by all the Devas and the Rishis.

He continued to rule in swarga, cleansed of his sin; that paapa of Brahmahatya, the killing of the Brahmana Asura Vritra, was divided into four parts and ordained to dwell in woman, fire, trees and cows. It was thus that Indra, strengthened by the energy of a Brahmana, succeeded in slaying his enemy, and when, as the result of that act of his, he was overpowered by sin, it was the energy of another Brahmana that rescued him. In this manner Indra once again regained his place as the ruler of heaven.'

Krishna continued, 'Once, in olden times, while the great Rishi Bharadwaja was saying his prayers beside the celestial Ganga, one of the three feet of Vishnu, in his three-footed form, came to that place. Seeing that strange sight, Bharadwaja splashed Vishnu with a handful of water, upon which Vishnu's breast received a mark called the srivatsa.

Cursed by Rishi Bhrigu, Agni was obliged to become a devourer of all things.

Once upon a time, Aditi, the mother of the deities, cooked some food for her sons. She thought that, eating that food and being strengthened by it, the Devas would succeed in slaying the Asuras. After the food had been cooked, Budha, the presiding deity of the planet known by that name, having completed the observance of an austere vow, came before Aditi and asked her for dana.

Aditi did not offer him the food she had cooked, thinking that no one should eat it before her sons, the Devas, did. Enraged at her refusing him alms, Budha, who was Brahma's self through his vrata, cursed her, saying that she would have a pain in her womb when Vivaswat, in his second birth in her womb, was born in the form of an egg.

Aditi reminded Vivaswat at the time of his birth of Budha's curse, and it is for this reason that Vivaswat, who is adored in sraddhas, on emerging from Aditi's womb came to be called by the name of Martanda.

Prajapati Daksha became the father of sixty daughters. Of them, he gave thirteen to Kasyapa, ten to Dharma, ten to Manu and twenty-seven to Soma. Though all the twenty-seven, called Nakshatras, bestowed upon Soma were equal in beauty and accomplishments, Soma became most attached to just one, Rohini.

His other wives became jealous and left him; they went to their father and told him of Soma's conduct. "Father, although all of us are equally beautiful, Soma is attached only to our sister Rohini."

Angered by this treatment of his daughters, Prajapati Daksha cursed Soma, declaring that his son-in-law would be beset with phthisis and that disease would dwell in him. Through Daksha's curse, phthisis assailed the mighty Soma and entered into his body. Suffering, Soma came to Daksha.

Daksha said to him, "I have cursed you because of your unequal treatment of your wives. You are being weakened by this disease. There is a sacred body of water called Hiranyasara in the western ocean. Go and bathe there."

Reaching Hiranyasaras, Soma bathed in its holy waters. Performing his ablutions he washed away his sin. And because those waters were illumined, abhasita, by Soma, from that day they were called Prabhasa.

As a result, however, of Daksha's ancient curse, to this day Soma begins to wane from the night of the full moon until his total disappearance on the night of the new moon when he once more he begins to wax until the night of the full moon.

From that time on the bright moon was blemished, for since then the body of Soma has shown some dark spots, and has been tarnished by these. In fact, the splendid disc of the moon has, from then on revealed the mark of a hare.

Once upon a time, a Rishi called Sthulasiras was engaged in severe austerities on the northern breast of the mountains of Meru. While engaged in those tapasyas a pure breeze, suffused with many fragrant perfumes, began to blow and fan his body.

Scorched as he was by his rigorous tapasya, and living as he did only upon air, he was gratified by that delightful air which wafted around him. While he enjoyed this cool breeze that fanned him, the trees around him became envious and burst into a display of flowers to win his heart. Annoyed at this display, because it was prompted by jealousy, the Rishi cursed the trees, "Henceforth, you will not be able to flower in all seasons."

Once Narayana took birth as the Maharishi Badavamukha for the benefit of the world. While practising severe austerities upon the breast of Meru, he summoned the ocean into his presence. The ocean ignored his call. Infuriated at this, the Rishi, with the heat of his body, caused the waters of the ocean to become as salty as human sweat.

The sage said, "From now your waters will be undrinkable. Only when the equine-head eddying within you drinks from you, will they again become as sweet as honey. On account of this curse, the waters of the ocean remain salty to this day and are drunk by no one other than the Badavamukha.

Uma, the daughter of Himavat, was desired by Siva. After Himavat had promised her hand in marriage to Mahadeva, Maharishi Bhrigu approached Himavat, and said, “Give your daughter to me in marriage.”

Himavat replied, “Siva is the bridegroom I have chosen for my daughter.” Angered by this reply, Bhrigu said, “Since you refuse my proposal for your daughter’s hand and insult me, you will lose your wealth of jewels and precious stones.” And to this day the mountains of Himavat are without any jewels.

Such is the glory of the Brahmanas. It is through their favour that the Kshatriyas are able to possess the undecaying and eternal Bhumi Devi as their wife and enjoy her. The power of the Brahmanas is also made up of Agni and Soma. The universe is upheld by their united power.

It is said that Surya and Chandramas are the eyes of Narayana. The rays of Surya are my eyes. The sun and the moon respectively warm and rejuvenate the universe. And for this reason they have come to be regarded as the joy, the harsha, of the worlds.

Arjuna, it is because these actions of Agni and Soma that uphold the universe that I have come to be called Hrishikesa. Indeed, I am the boon-giving Isana, the Creator of the universe.

Through the punya of the mantras with which libations of ghee are poured into the sacred fire, I receive and imbibe the principal share of the sacrificial havis. My colour too is that of the most excellent of jewels called Harita. For these reasons I am known as Hari. I am the highest abode of all creatures and am known by knowers of the shastras to be identical with truth or amrita. For this reason I am called Ritadhama, the abode of truth, by learned Brahmanas.

When the Earth was submerged in the waters and disappeared from view, I retrieved her and raised her from the depths of the ocean. For this reason the Devas adore me by the name of Govinda. Sipivishta is another name of mine. Sipi means one without hair on his body. He who pervades all things in the form of Sipi is known by the name of Sipivishta.

The Rishi Yaksha in many a sacrifice invoked me by the name Sipivishta. It is for this that I bear this secret name. The Yaksha of great intelligence, having worshipped by the name Sipivishta, succeeded in restoring the Niruktas who had disappeared from the surface of the earth and sunk into the patalas.

I was never born. I never take birth. Nor shall I ever be born. I am the Kshetrajna of all creatures. Hence am I called by the name of Aja, unborn, birthless.

I have never spoken anything dishonourable or dissolute. The divine Saraswati who is truth's self, who is the daughter of Brahma and is otherwise known as Rita, represents my speech and always dwells in my tongue. The existent and the non-existent are united by me in my Atman.

The Rishis in Pushkara, the abode of Brahma, called me by the name of truth. I have never swerved from the attribute of sattva; know that this guna has flowed from me. Arjuna, even in this birth, my ancient sattva guna has not left me, so that in this life, establishing myself in sattva, I perform my karmas without wishing for their fruit.

Free of all sins through sattva, which is my nature, I can be perceived only by the knowledge that arises from the pursuit of sattva. I am counted among those who are devoted to this guna. For these reasons I am known as sattvata.

I plough the earth, taking the form of a large ploughshare of black iron. And because my complexion is black, I am called Krishna.

I have united Bhumi with Jala, Akasa with Manas, and Vayu with Agni. Therefore I am called Vaikuntha. The highest state for a living being to attain is the cessation of separate conscious existence by union with Supreme Brahman. And since I have never swerved from that state I am Achyuta.

The earth and the sky are known to extend in all directions. And because I uphold them both, I called Adhokshaja. Those who know the Vedas and engage in interpreting their words adore me in yagnas by invoking me by this name. In elder days, while practising severe tapasyas, Maharishis said, "No one in the universe other than Narayana can be called by the name of Adhokshaja.

Sustaining the lives of all creatures in the universe, ghrita, ghee, constitutes my effulgence. It is for this reason that Brahmanas learned in the Vedas call me Ghritarchis.

There are three well-known constituent elements of the body. They have their origin in karma, and are called vata, pitha and kapham, or wind, bile and phlegm. The body is a union of these three. All living creatures are upheld by them, and when they abate, living creatures are also weakened. It is for this that those who know the shastra on Ayurveda call me Tridhatu.

Dharma is known among all creatures by the name of Vrisha. Hence I am called Vrisha in the Vedic text, Nighantuka. The word Kapi signifies the foremost of boars, and dharma means Vrisha. It is for this reason that that lord of all creatures, Kasyapa, the father of both the Devas and the Asuras, called me Vrishakapi.

The Devas and the Asuras have never been able to ascertain my beginning, my middle or my end. For this reason that I am praised as Anadi, Amadhya and Ananta. I am the Supreme Lord imbued with absolute puissance, and I am the eternal witness of the universe, for I witness its successive creations and destructions.

I always listen to words that are pious, pure and holy, Dhananjaya, and never speak anything that is sinful. Hence I am called Suchisravas.

Assuming the form of a boar with a single tusk, I raised the submerged earth from the bottom of the sea. For this reason am I named Ekasringa. In this form of a mighty boar I had three humps on my back. On account of this peculiarity I have come to be called by the name Trikakud.

Those conversant with the Samkhya expounded by Kapila call the Paramatman Virincha. That Virincha is otherwise called Prajapati or Brahma. Verily I am identical with Virincha, since I breathe life into all living creatures, for I am the Creator of the universe.

The teachers of the Samkhya philosophy have clear knowledge of all subjects, and they call me the eternal Kapila dwelling in the sun with only gyana as my companion. On earth I am identified with him who has been revered in the Vedic mantras as the effulgent Hiranyagarbha who is worshipped by yogins.

I am regarded as the embodied form of the Rig Veda, which has twenty-one thousand verses. Men that know the Vedas also call me the embodiment of the Samans of a thousand branches. Learned Brahmanas who are my faithful devotees sing my praises in the Aranyakas.

In the Adhyaryus I am sung of as the Yajur Veda of six and fifty, and eight and seven, and thirty branches. Brahmanas conversant with the Atharvans regard me as identical with the Atharvans consisting of five kalpas and all the krityas.

Arjuna, know that all the angas of the Vedas and all their verses, and all the vowels in those verses, and all the rules in respect of their pronunciation, are my work. I am he who emerges at the beginning of creation from the ocean of milk at the earnest invocation of Brahma and all the Devas, and he who grants boons to all the Devas.

I am he who is the repository of the science of pronunciation contained in the angas of the Vedas. It was through my grace that, following the path indicated by Vamadeva, the Maharishi Panchala obtained from that eternal Being the techniques for reading the Vedas with respect to the division of syllables and words.

Born into the Babhravya vamsa, and having achieved great ascetic victory and obtained a boon from Narayana, Galava compiled the rules regarding the division of syllables and words for reading the Vedas. He also compiled the rules about the required emphasis and accent in reciting them, and shone as the first scholar who became knowledgeable in these two subjects.

Favoured by me, Kundrika and King Brahmadatta, thinking of the sorrow that attends birth and death, attained to that prosperity which is achieved by those devoted to yoga in the course of seven births. In ancient times, I was born as the son of Dharma, and in consequence of this birth I was celebrated as Dharmaja.

I took birth in two forms—Nara and Narayana. Riding on the vahana that helps in the performance of scriptural and other duties, I practised, in those two forms, undying austerities on the breast of Gandhamadana.

At that time Daksha performed his great yagna of Daksha. However, he refused to give a share of the havis to Rudra. Urged by the sage Dadichi, Rudra destroyed that sacrifice. He cast an arrow of blazing flames that consumed all the preparations for Daksha's yagna, and then coursed forcefully towards us, Nara and Narayana at Badari's asrama. That brutal barb fell squarely upon the chest of Narayana. Assailed by its energy the hair on Narayana's head became green. As a result of this change in the colour of my hair I came to be called Munjakesa.

Narayana blew off this arrow, its energy spent, and it returned to Siva. Enraged and fired by the power of his tapasya, Siva charged towards the Rishis Nara and Narayana. Narayana seized the advancing Rudra by his throat. Held by Narayana, the Lord of the universe, Rudra's neck changed colour and became dark. From that time Rudra came to be called Sitikantha.

Meanwhile, Nara pulled up a blade of grass and suffused it with mantras to kill Rudra. The blade of grass was transformed into a mighty battle-axe.

Nara cast the axe at Rudra but it shattered into pieces. Because of that weapon being smashed, I received the name Khandaparasu.'

Arjuna said, 'Krishna, in that battle which could destroy the three worlds, who was victorious? Tell me this!'

Krishna said, 'When Rudra and Narayana were engaged in battle, all the universe trembled with anxious. Agni ceased to accept libations of even the purest ghee offered with Vedic mantras in yagnas. The Vedas no longer shone inward light in the minds of the Rishis of cleansed souls.

Rajas and tamas possessed the Devas. The earth shook. The vault of the sky appeared to be rent in two. All the stars were deprived of their brilliance. Brahma himself fell from his throne.

The ocean became dry. The Himavat Mountains were riven. When such terrible omens appeared everywhere, Brahma surrounded by all the Devas and the Devarishis, rushed to the raging battleground.

Brahma, who can be grasped only with the help of the Niruktas, joined his hands and said to Siva, "Bestow good upon the three worlds. Discard your weapons, Lord of the universe, and benefit all the Akhanda.

That which is unmanifest, indestructible, immutable, supreme, the origin of the universe, uniform, and the supreme actor, that which transcends all pairs of opposites, and is inactive, choosing to be manifested, has assumed this one blessed form, though it appears as two. This Nara and Narayana, the manifest forms of Supreme Brahman, have taken birth in the vamsa of Dharma.

The foremost of all deities, these two observe the highest vratas and severest tapasyas. Through some reason best known to him, I myself have sprung from his grace. Eternal as you are, for you have existed ever since all the past creations, you too, have sprung from his wrath.

Along with me, the Devas and all the Maharishis revere this form of Brahma, and let peace prevail in all the worlds without any delay."

Thus addressed by Brahma, Rudra instantly cast off the fire of his anger, and began to worship Narayana. Indeed, he placed surrendered himself to Narayana. And Narayana, with his anger and senses subdued, was gratified and reconciled with Rudra.

Adored by the Rishis, by Brahma and by all the Devas, the Lord of the universe, also known as Hari, then addressed the illustrious Isana, "He that knows you, knows me. He that follows you, follows me. There is no difference between you and me. Never think otherwise.

The mark that your spear made on my chest will from this day assume the form of a beautiful whorl; and the mark of my hand on your neck will also assume a beautiful shape and for this you shall from this day be called Sreekantha."

Krishna continued, 'Having mutually made marks on each other's bodies, the two Rishis Nara and Narayana were reconciled with Rudra; dismissing the Devas, they once more set themselves to the practice of penances with tranquil souls.

Son of Pritha, I have now told you how, in that ancient battle between Rudra and Narayana, the latter triumphed. I have also told you the many secret names of Narayana and the significance of one of those names which the Rishis bestowed upon him.

Arjuna, assuming diverse forms I roam the earth, the realm of Brahma himself and Golaka, that other high and eternal realm of felicity. Protected by me in the maha yuddha, you have won a great victory.

That Being whom you saw lurking in your chariot, during your battles, is none other than Rudra Kapardin. Otherwise known by the name Kaala, he should be known as one that has sprung from my wrath. Those enemies whom you have killed were all, in the first instance, slain by him.

Bow your head before that powerful God of gods, that Lord of Uma. With concentrated soul, bow unto that illustrious Lord of the universe, that indestructible deity, otherwise called by the name of Hara.

As I have told you, he is none other than one who has manifested from my anger. Arjuna, you have, before this, heard of his puissance and energy!'"

CANTO 344

Saunaka said, 'O Sauti, how excellent is this story that you have narrated. Verily, these ascetics, having heard it, have all been amazed. It is said that a discourse on Narayana is rewarded with more punya than pilgrimages to all the sacred asramas and ablutions performed in all the holy tirthas on earth. Having listened to your divine discourse on Narayana, which can cleanse one of every sin, all of us have certainly been blessed.

Adored in all the worlds, even the Rishis and the Devas, even Brahma, cannot easily behold that most celebrated of all gods. That Narada was able to obtain a glimpse of Narayana, otherwise called Hari, was because his of the special grace of that divine and powerful Lord.

Why then did Devarishi Narada, having succeeded in seeing the Supreme Lord of the universe, dwelling in the form of Aniruddha, go swiftly to Badarikasrama on the breast of Himavat to behold Nara and Narayana? O Sauti, tell us the reason for this.'

Sauti said, 'During his snake-sacrifice, Janamejaya, the royal son of Parikshita, availing himself of an interval in the sacrificial rites, when all the learned Brahmanas were resting, addressed the grandfather of his grandfather, the island-born Krishna, otherwise called Vyasa, that ocean of Vedic lore, that foremost of ascetics endued with power, with these words. Janamejaya said, "What did Devarishi Narada do next when he returned from the White Island, reflecting, as he came, on the words spoken to him by Narayana? Arriving at Badarikasrama upon the breast of the Himavat Mountains, and seeing the two Rishis Nara and Narayana engaged in stern tapasya, how long did Narada dwell there and on what subjects did they speak?

This discourse on Narayana, that is really an ocean of knowledge, has been culled by you by churning that vast histories of a hundred thousand verses, the Mahabharata. As butter is raised from curds, sandalwood from the mountains of Malaya, the Aranyakas from the Vedas, and amrita from medicinal plants, in the same manner, O Tapodhana, you have raised this ambrosial discourse that has Narayana for its subject from diverse itihasas and Puranas existing in the world.

Narayana is the Supreme Lord. Illustrious and formidable, he is the soul of all creatures. Indeed, Dvijottama, the energy of Narayana is irresistible. At the end of the kalpa, all the Devas led by Brahma, all the Rishis with the Gandharvas, and all things living and non-living enter into Narayana.

There is nothing holier on earth or in heaven, and nothing higher, than Narayana. A pilgrimage to all the sacred asramas on earth, and ablutions performed in all the holy waters, will not yield as much punya as a discourse on Narayana. Having listened from the beginning to this discourse on Hari, the Lord of the universe, which destroys all sins, we feel that we have been completely purified and sanctified.

It was not my ancestor Arjuna who was the real victor in the great battle on Kurukshetra; it should be remembered that Krishna was his ally. There is nothing unattainable in the three worlds for a man who has Vishnu himself for his ally. My forebears were extremely fortunate and worthy, for they had Krishna safeguarding their temporal and spiritual prosperity.

Adored by all the worlds, the holy Narayana can be seen only through tapasya. They, however, succeeded in seeing him, Narayana, adorned with the beautiful srivatsa on his chest. More fortunate than my ancestors was the Devarishi Narada, the son of Paramesthi. I am thankful that Mahatejasvin Narada, who transcends all destruction, went to Sweta dwipa, and that he had succeeded in seeing Hari.

It is clear he saw the Supreme Lord as a result only of the grace of that immortal Being. Fortunate was Narada to behold Narayana as existing in the form of Aniruddha.

Having seen Narayana in that form, why did Narada hasten once more to the asrama of Badari to behold Nara and Narayana? What was the reason for this? After his return from the White Island and on his arrival at Badari, where he met with the two Rishis? How long did Narada continue to live there, and what conversations did he have with them? What did those two Mahatman Rishis say to him? It is fitting that you tell me!”

Vaisampayana said, "Salutations unto the holy Vyasa of immeasurable energy. Through his grace I will relate this story of Narayana.

Arriving at the White Island, Narada beheld the immutable Hari. Leaving that place he hurried to the mountains of Meru, bearing in his mind the momentous words spoken by the Paramatman Narayana. Arriving at Meru he was struck at the thought of what he had achieved. And he said to himself, 'How wonderful it is! The journey I undertook was a long one. Having journeyed so far, I have returned safely.'

From the Meru mountains he moved towards Gandhamadana. Coursing through the skies he descended upon the vast retreat of Badari. There he beheld those ancient deities Nara and Narayana, engaged in tapasya while observing high vratas, and devoted to the worship of their own selves.

Both those revered beings bore the beautiful whorls called srivatsa on their chests, and both had matted jata on their heads. And because of their dazzling radiance with which they illumined the world they seemed to surpass even the energy of the sun. Their hands bore the mark of the swan's foot. The soles of their feet bore the sign of the discus.

Their chests were broad; their arms reached down to their knees. Each of them had four mushkas. Each had sixty teeth and four arms. Their voices were deep like rolling thunder.

Their faces were striking, their foreheads broad, their brows fair, their cheeks well-formed, and their noses aquiline. The heads of those two deities were big and round like parasols unfurled. All these features gave them a magnificent appearance.

Seeing them, Narada was filled with joy. He saluted them with reverence and was saluted by them in return. They received the Devarishi, welcomed him and enquired after his wellbeing.

Seeing them, Narada began to reflect, 'These two foremost of Rishis seem to be very alike in appearance to those I have seen in Sweta dwipa.' Thoughtfully, he circled around them in pradakshina and then sat down to rest on the seat made of kusa grass offered to him.

After this, those two famed Rishis, who were the abode of tapasya and tejas, of tranquil hearts and self-restraint, went through their morning rituals. With subdued senses, they worshipped Narada with arghya and water to wash his feet. Having finished their morning kriyas, necessary for receiving their guest, they sat down on two seats made of wooden planks.

When those two Rishis sat, that place began to glow with an unusual beauty even as the sacrificial altar does with the beauty of sacred fires when libations of ghee are poured upon them. Seeing Narada refreshed from fatigue, seated at his ease and gratified with the hospitality he had received, Nara and Narayana spoke to him.

Nara and Narayana said, 'In Sweta dwipa have you seen the Paramatman, who is eternal and divine, and who is the source from which we have sprung?'

Narada said, 'I have seen that beautiful Being who is immutable and who has the universe for his form. In him dwell all the worlds, and all the Devas with the Rishis. Even now I behold him in you two. Those marks and indications that characterise Hari of unrevealed form, characterise you that now have forms revealed to the senses.

Indeed, I see both of you by his side. Sent by the Paramatman, I have come here today. In energy and fame and beauty, who else in the three worlds can equal him than you both that have been born into the dharma vamsa? He has related to me the entire course of Kshetrajna dharma. He has also instructed me in all his future incarnations in this world.

The inhabitants of the White Island, whom I have seen, are without the five senses that ordinary men possess. All of them are of awakened souls, endowed with true gyana. They are entirely devoted to the foremost of Beings, the Supreme Lord of the universe.

They are always engaged in worshipping that great deity, and he always sports with them. The Holy and Supreme Soul loves those that are devoted to him. He also cares for such Dvijas. Compassionate to his bhaktas, he dallies with them.

Enjoyer of the universe, pervading everything, Madhava is ever loving towards his worshippers. He is the actor; he is the Cause; and he is the Effect. He is omnipotent and magnificent.

He is the Cause from which all beings originate. He is the embodiment of all the rules of the shastras. He is the embodiment of all the tattvas. He is renowned. Uniting himself with tapasya, he radiates a splendour that is said to represent an energy that is higher than what is found in Sweta dwipa. Of the Soul cleansed by tapasya, he has ordained peace and tranquillity in the three worlds.

With such an auspicious intellect, he is observes a very superior vrata which is the very embodiment of holiness. The sun does not warm and the moon does not shine in his realm where he lives engaged in austere penance. There the Wind does not blow.

Having built a vedi measuring eight fingers' breadth there, the Creator of the universe is engaged in rigorous tapasya, standing on one foot, with arms raised and with his face turned towards the east, reciting the Vedas with their angas.

All libations of ghee or meat poured on the sacrificial fire according to the decrees of Brahma, by the Rishis, by Pasupati himself, by the rest of the principal Devas, by the Daityas, the Danavas and the Rakshasas, all reach the feet of that Great Divinity. Whatever karmas and kriyas are performed by those souls who are entirely devoted to him, are all received by him on his head.

No one is dearer to him in the three worlds than those who are awakened and enlightened. Dearer even is one completely devoted to him. Sent by him who is the Paramatman, I have come here at his command.

Henceforth, I shall dwell with you two, devoted to Narayana in the form of Aniruddha.'" Vaisampayana said, "Nara and Narayana said, 'You are deserving of the highest praise, and have been highly favoured, since you have seen the puissant Narayana himself in the form of Aniruddha. No one else, not even Brahma who was born from the primal lotus, has been able to behold him. That foremost of Purushas is of unmanifest origin and cannot be seen.

What we say to you is the truth, O Narada. There exists no one in the universe that is dearer to him than one that adores him with devotion. It is for this that he revealed himself to you.

No one can repair to that realm where the Paramatman is engaged in tapasya other than us. The splendour of the place adorned by him resembles the effulgence of a thousand suns gathered together.

From him who is the origin of the creator of the universe springs the attribute of forgiveness which attaches to the earth. It is from that illustrious Being who seeks the welfare of all beings, that the rasa of taste has arisen. That rasa attaches to the waters which are liquid.

It is from him that Agni, having the attribute of form or sight, has arisen. It attaches itself to the sun which then is able to shine and radiate heat. It is from that illustrious and foremost of Beings that touch also has arisen. It is attached to Vayu, which enables it to move about in the world producing the sensation of touch.

It is from that Lord of the entire universe that sound has arisen. It attaches to Akasa, which allows it to exist uncovered and unconfined. It is from him that Manas, Mind, which pervades all Beings, has arisen. It attaches to Chandramas, and so Chandramas has the quality of revealing all things. In the Vedas, where Narayana, that partaker of the libations and other offerings, resides, with gyana alone for his companion, has been called Sat, the generative cause of all things.

The path of those who are stainless and free from both virtue and sin, is fraught with auspiciousness and felicity. Aditya, who is the dispeller of the darkness of all the worlds, is said to be the doorway through which the emancipated must pass. Entering Aditya, the bodies of such men are consumed by his fire. They then become invisible and cannot be seen by anyone at any time.

Reduced into invisible atoms, they pass into the form of Aniruddha, Narayana in manifested form, who dwells in the heart of the realm of Aditya. Losing all physical attributes and being transformed into pure mind, they then enter into Pradyumna. Passing out of Pradyumna, those that are conversant with Samkhya yoga and those that are devoted to the Supreme Deity then enter Samkarsana otherwise called Jiva.

After this, divested of the three primal gunas of sattva, rajas and tamas, those foremost of regenerate beings quickly enter the Paramatman, also called Kshetrajna, and which itself transcends these three primal attributes. Know that Vasudeva is he when called Kshetrajna.

Surely you must know that Vasudeva is the abode or original refuge of all things in the universe. Only those whose minds are focused, who practise restraint and subdue their senses, and who are devoted to him, succeed in entering Vasudeva.

We two have taken birth in the house of Dharma. Living in this delightful and vast hermitage we undergo the austerest tapasya. We are thus engaged being moved by the desire to benefit those manifestations of the Supreme Deity, dear to all the Devas, which will occur in the three worlds to achieve diverse and unrivalled feats.

In accordance with such rare rules that apply to us two only, we observe all excellent and high vratas fraught with the most rigorous of penances. O Devarishi, with the power of our tapasya, we saw you when you were in the White Island.

Having met Narayana, you have made a particular resolution, which is known to us. In the three worlds consisting of mobile and immobile beings, there is nothing that is unknown to us. Maharishi, of the good or evil that will occur or has occurred or is occurring, that Devadeva has informed you.'"

Vaisampayana continued, "Having heard these words of Nara and Narayana, Narada joined his hands in reverence and became entirely devoted to Narayana. He spent his time in mentally reciting countless sacred mantras that are in praise of Narayana.

Worshipping him, and adoring those two ancient Rishis who were born in the dharma vamsa, Rishi Narada continued to dwell in Nara and Narayana's asrama of Badari on Himavat for a thousand years of the Devas.'" Vaisampayana said, "On one occasion, while dwelling with Nara and Narayana, Narada the son of Paramesthi, having duly completed the rites and rituals to honour the Devas, set himself to perform the kriyas in honour of the Pitris.

CANTO 345

Seeing him thus prepared, the eldest son of Dharma, Nara, addressed him, saying, 'Which Devas and Pitris are you worshipping with these rites and rituals? O foremost of all wise men, tell me this, in accordance with the shastras. What is this that you are doing? What are the fruits you desire by performing these rites?'

Narada said, 'On an earlier occasion you said to me that rites and rituals in honour of the Devas should be done. You said that the kriyas in their honour constitute the highest sacrifice equal to the worship of the eternal Paramatman. Instructed by that teaching, I perform these rites in honour of the immutable Vishnu.

It is from that Supreme Deity that Brahma, the Pitamaha of all the worlds, arose in the ancient times. That Brahma, or Paramesthi, filled with ananda, caused my father Daksha to come into being. I was the son of Brahma, created before all others, by a command of his will, although later, through the curse of that Rishi, I had to be born as the son of Daksha

O righteous and illustrious one, I am performing these kriyas in honour of the Pitris for the sake of Narayana, and conforming to the rules that were laid down by him. Narayana is the father, mother and grandfather of all creatures. In all yagnas performed in honour of the Pitris, it is that Lord of the universe who is adored and worshipped.

On one occasion, the Devas taught their children the Srutis. Having lost this knowledge themselves they had to again acquire it from those very sons unto whom they had communicated it. In this manner, the sons, who had to thus convey the mantras to their sires, achieved the status of fathers, and the fathers, who received the mantras from their sons, attained the status of sons.

Without doubt, what the Devas did on that occasion is known to you two. Sons and fathers had thus to worship each other. Having first spread some blades of kusa grass on the ground, the Devas and the Pitris, their children, placed three pindas there and worshipped each other. I now wish to know why the Pitris in ancient days acquired the name of Pindas.'

Nara and Narayana said, 'In the past, the earth, with her belt of seas, disappeared. Govinda, assumed the form of a colossal boar and raised her with his mighty tusk. Having restored the earth to her former position, that foremost of Purushas, his body smeared with water and mud, set himself to do what was necessary for the world and its inhabitants.

When the sun reached the meridian, and it was the hour for saying the morning prayers, Vishnu suddenly shook off three lumps of mud from his tusk and set them upon the earth in the place where he had spread blades of the kusa grass. He dedicated those lumps of mud to his own self, according to the rules laid down in the shastras.

After shaking off those lumps from his tusks as Pindas, he sat facing the east and himself performed the rites of dedication with the oil of sesame seeds that arose from the heat of his own body. Impelled by the desire to establish rules of conduct for the inhabitants of the three worlds, Vishnu, Vrishakapi, said these words: "I am the Creator of the worlds. I have resolved to create the Pitris."

Saying this, he began to think of those worthy laws that should regulate the rituals to be performed in honour of the Pitris. While thus engaged, he saw that the Pindas had fallen towards the south.

He then said to himself, "These Pindas have fallen on the surface of the earth towards the south. Based on this, I declare that these should from now on be known by the name of Pitris. Let these three round lumps come to be regarded as Pitris in the world.

In this way I am creating the eternal Pitris. I am the father, the grandfather and the great-grandfather, and I should be regarded as dwelling in these three Pindas. There is no one that is higher than me. Who can I worship and adore? Who is my father in the universe? I myself am my grandfather. I am, indeed, the Pitamaha and the sire. I am the one cause of all the universe."

Learned Brahmana, having said these words, Vrishakapi offered those Pindas on the breast of the Varaha Mountains, with elaborate rituals. With these he worshipped his own self, and having finished the worship, vanished. Hence the Pitris came to be called by the name of Pinda.

In accordance with these words of Vrishakapi on that occasion, the Pitris receive the worship offered by all. They who perform yagnas in honour of and adore the Pitris, the Devas, gurus or other revered elder guests, cows, superior Brahmanas, Devi Bhumi, and their mothers, in thought, word and deed are said to adore and sacrifice to Vishnu himself.

Pervading the bodies of all existent creatures, the illustrious Lord is the Soul of all things. Detached from happiness or misery, he regards all equally. Narayana has been said to be the Soul of all things in the universe.'"

'Vaisampayana said, "Having heard these words of Nara and Narayana, Narada was filled with bhakti for the Supreme Being. With his whole being he devoted himself to Narayana. Having lived a full thousand years in the retreat of Nara and Narayana, having beheld the immutable Hari, and heard the excellent discourse on the subject of Narayana, the Devarishi repaired to his own asrama on the breast of Himavat.

Those foremost of Munis, Nara and Narayana, however continued to dwell in the delightful Badarikasrama, engaged in the practice of the severest tapasyas. You are born into the Pandava vamsa. You are of immeasurable energy. Having heard this discourse on Narayana from the beginning, you have certainly been cleansed of all your sins and your soul has been sanctified.

He who hates instead of loving and worshipping Hari, his is neither this world nor the world hereafter. The ancestors of those who hate Narayana, the foremost of gods, plunge into naraka forever.

Vishnu is the soul of all beings. How, then, can Vishnu be hated, for in hating him one would hate one's own self. He who is our guru, the Rishi Vyasa, the son of Gandhavati, has himself recited this discourse on the glory of Narayana to us, that glory which is the highest. I heard it from him and have narrated it to you exactly as I heard it.

Rajan this dharma, with its mysteries and the summary of its details, was obtained by Narada from Narayana himself. Such are the particulars of this great sect. I have earlier explained this to you in the Hari-Gita, with a brief reference to its niyamas.

Know that the island-born Vyasa is Narayana on earth. Who other than he could compile such an itihasa as the Mahabharata? Who else than that puissant Rishi could discourse upon the diverse kinds of duties and religions for men to adopt and follow?

You have resolved upon performing a great sacrifice. Let your yagna continue as determined by you. Having listened to the many kinds of duties and paths, let your yagna proceed."'

Sauti continued, 'Having heard this great discourse, Janamejaya began all those kriyas established in the shastras for the completion of his mahayagna. Saunaka, I have duly narrated that great sermon on Narayana to you and all these Rishis who dwell in the Naimisa vana. Formerly Narada recited it to my guru in the hearing of many Rishis and the sons of Pandu, and in the presence of Krishna and Bhishma also.

Narayana is the Lord of all the foremost of Rishis, and of the three worlds. He is the upholder of this vast Bhumi herself. He is the vessel that holds the Srutis and of the attribute of humility.

He is the great receptacle of all those laws that must be adhered to in order to attain peace of mind, as also of all those with the name Yama. He is always accompanied by the foremost of Dvijas. Let that Great Deity be your refuge.

Hari always does what is agreeable and beneficial to the inhabitants of swarga. He is the slayer of Asuras who trouble the three worlds. He is the receptacle of tapasya. He has great renown.

Known as Madhu and Kaitabha, he is also the slayer of the Daityas. He ordains the goals of those who know and observe scriptural and other duties. He dispels the fears of all. He takes the best of the havis offered in sacrifices. He is your refuge and protection.

He is Saguna, blessed with gunas; he is Nirguna, free from gunas. He has a quadruple form. He shares the punya arising from the dedication of holy tanks and the observance of similar religious rites. Unvanquished and mighty, it is he that always proclaims the goal of the Atmans of righteous Rishis.

He is the witness of the worlds. He is unborn. He is the one ancient Purusha. With the radiance of the sun, he is the Supreme Lord and is the refuge of all. Do all of you bow your heads before him, since Narayana himself who sprang from the primordial waters bows before him.

He is the origin of the universe. He is that Being who is called amrita, deathless. He is minute. He is the refuge upon whom all things depend. He is the one Being to whom the attribute of immutability attaches. The Samkhyas and yogins, of restrained souls, uphold him to be their eternal knowledge.’

CANTO 347

Sauti said, 'Janamejaya said, "I have heard from you of the glory of the divine Paramatman. I have heard also of the birth of the Supreme Deity in the house of Dharma, in the forms of Nara and Narayana. I have also heard about the origin of the Pinda from the mighty Varaha, the form that Vishnu assumed to raise the submerged earth.

I have heard from you about the Devas and Rishis that were ordained for Pravritti dharma and of those that were ordained for Nivritti dharma. You have also discoursed to us on other subjects. You have spoken to us of that vast form, Hayagriva with the equine head, of Vishnu, that partaker of the libations and other offerings, the form that appeared in the great ocean towards the north-east.

That form was seen by Paramesthi, the illustrious Brahma. What were the exact features, and what was the tejas, the like of which had never been seen before, of that form which Hari, upholder of the universe, revealed on that occasion? What did Brahma do after having seen him, whose likeness had never been seen before, him of immeasurable energy, him with the equine head, and who was sacredness itself?

On this ancient subject, this question arises in our mind. Why did the Supreme Deity assume that form and display himself in it to Brahma? You have certainly sanctified us by speaking to us on these diverse sacred subjects!"'

Sauti said, 'I shall recite to you that itihasa which is perfectly consistent with the Vedas, and which Vaisampayana recited to the son of Parikshita on the occasion of the great snake-sacrifice. Having heard the account of this mighty form of Vishnu, with the horse's head, the royal son of Parikshita too, had the same doubt and put the same questions to Vaisampayana.

Janamejaya said, "Tell me for what reason did Hari appear in that mighty form with a horse-head, which Brahma saw on the shores of the great northern ocean?"

Vaisampayana said, "Rajan, all existing objects in this world are the result of a combination of the five primal elements, a combination caused by the intelligence of the Supreme Lord. The puissant and infinite Narayana is the Supreme Lord and Creator of the universe.

He is the inner Soul of all things, and the giver of boons. Without gunas, he also possesses them. Listen now to me as I tell you about the Pralaya and how all things are destroyed.

At first, Bhumi merges in Jala and then nothing is seen save one vast expanse of water on all sides – the Ekarnava. Jala then merges into Agni, and Agni into Vayu. Vayu merges into Akasa which in turn merges into Manas, mind. Manas merges into the Vyakta, the manifest, or Chitta, Consciousness. The Vyakta merges into the Avyakta, the unmanifest or Prakriti. Prakriti merges into Purusha, the Jivatman, and Purusha merges into the Paramatman, or Brahman.

Then tamas spreads over the face of the universe, and nothing can be seen. From that primal darkness arises Brahma endowed with the principle of creation. Tamas is primeval and immortal. Brahma arising from this darkness develops by his own power into the idea of the universe, and assumes the form of Purusha.

This Purusha is called Aniruddha. Without gender, it is otherwise called Pradhana, supreme or primary. Rajan, It is also known by the name of Vyakta, a combination of the triguna. He exists with only gyana for his companion.

That renowned Being is otherwise called by the name of Viswaksena or Hari. Yielding to yoga-nidra, he lays himself down on the waters of the ocean Ekarnava. He then thinks of the creation of the universe with its diverse phenomena and immeasurable attributes. While engaged in thinking of creation, he recollects his own lofty gunas.

From this springs the four-faced Brahma who represents the consciousness of Aniruddha. Brahma, otherwise called Hiranyagarbha, is the Pitamaha of all the worlds. With eyes like lotus-petals, he is born within the lotus that springs from the navel of Aniruddha.

Seated on that lotus, the illustrious eternal Brahma saw himself surrounded by water. Adopting the attribute of sattva, Brahma Paramesthi, then began to create the universe.

In the primeval lotus, radiant like the Sun, two drops of holy water had been cast by Narayana. He, Narayana, looked at those two drops of water.

One of those two drops, beautiful and bright in form looked like a drop of honey. At the command of Narayana, a Daitya of the name of Madhu, with the attribute of tamas, sprang from that drop. The other drop of water within the lotus was very hard. From it sprang the Daitya Kaitabha composed of the attribute of rajas.

As soon as they were born, imbued with tamas and rajas, the two mighty Daityas armed with maces began to roam within that vast primeval lotus. In it they beheld the effulgent Brahma, engaged in creating the four Vedas, each with the most delightful form.

Seeing the four Vedas, the powerful Asuras suddenly seized the Vedas before the very eyes of their Creator. With the Vedas, the two Danavas dived into the ocean and swam to its bottom. Seeing the Vedas forcibly taken from him, Brahma was grief-stricken and addressed the Supreme Lord Narayana in these words.

Brahma said, 'The Vedas are my great eyes. The Vedas are my great strength. The Vedas are my great refuge. The Vedas are my high Brahman. They have been taken from me by the two Danavas. Deprived of the Vedas, the worlds I have created are plunged in darkness.

Without the Vedas, how can I bring creation into existence? Alas, great is the grief I suffer because of the loss of the Vedas. My heart is wounded and has become the home of a great sorrow.

Who is there that will rescue me from this ocean of grief in which I am drowning? Who is there that will bring me the Vedas I have lost? Who is there that will take pity on me?'

While he spoke, Brahma decided to sing the praises of Hari in these words. He joined his hands in reverence, grasped the feet of his Progenitor, and sang this hymn in honour of Narayana.

Brahma said, 'I bow to you, O heart of Brahman. I bow to you that was born before me. You are the origin of the universe. You are the foremost of all abodes. You are the ocean of yoga with all its angas. You are the Creator of both the Vyakta and the Avyakta.

You walk the path of vast and immeasurable auspiciousness. You devour the universe. You are the Antaraloka, the Inner Soul, of all creatures. You have no origin. You are the refuge of the universe. You are Svayambhu; your origin is none other than yourself.

As for myself, I have sprung through your grace. I have been born from you. My first birth, which is regarded sacred by all regenerate persons, was from a fiat of your mind. My second birth was from your eyes. Through your grace, my third birth was from your speech.

My fourth birth was from your ears. My fifth birth was from your nose. O Lord, My sixth birth was, through you, from an egg. This is my seventh birth. It has occurred, O Lord, within this lotus, and it is meant to stimulate the intellect and desires of all creatures.

In each birth I am born as your son. Indeed, I take birth as your eldest son constituted of sattva, the purest of the three gunas. Your own nature is Supreme. You are born from yourself.

I have been created by you. The Vedas are my eyes. Hence, I transcend Time itself. Those Vedas, which care my eyes, have been taken from me and I have become blind. Awaken from your yoga-nidra. Give me back my eyes. I am dear to you as you are to me.'

Thus praised by Brahma, the illustrious Purusha, with face turned in every direction, shook off his slumber and resolved to recover the Vedas from the Daityas that had taken them. With his yoga-shakti, he assumed a second form. His body, with an excellent nose, became as luminous as the moon. He assumed an equine head of great effulgence, which was the abode of the Vedas.

The sky, with all its stars and constellations, became the crown of his head. His locks of hair were long and flowing, and had the splendour of the rays of the sun. The realms above and below became his two ears. The earth became his forehead. The two rivers Ganga and Saraswati became his two hips.

The two oceans became his two eyebrows. The sun and the moon became his two eyes. The twilight became his nose. The AUM became his memory and intelligence. Lightning became his tongue. The Soma-drinking Pitris became his teeth. Goloka and Brahmaloka became his upper and lower lips.

The terrible night that follows the Pralaya, transcending the three attributes, became his neck. Having assumed this form with the horse's head and having diverse things for its diverse limbs, the Lord of the universe disappeared in an instant, and plunged down into patala.

Having reached that realm, he set himself to high yoga. Adopting a voice regulated by the rules of the science called siksha, he began to recite the Vedic mantras aloud. His enunciation was distinct and melodious, and reverberated through the air. The sound of his voice filled patala from end to end. Suffused with the properties of all the elements, it produced great grace and merit.

The two Asuras determined to return to the Vedas quickly, flung them aside and ran towards the place from where those sweet sounds issued.

Meanwhile, the Supreme Lord with the horse's head, otherwise called Hari, picked up all four Vedas. Returning to Brahma, he gave him Vedas to him. Having restored the Vedas to Brahma, Narayana once more returned to his own nature.

Narayana returned to his form with the equine head in the northeastern region of the great ocean. Having re-established Brahma who was the abode of the Vedas, he once more became the equine-headed form that he was. The two Danavas, Madhu and Kaitabha, did not find the source of the sounds and swiftly returned to that place. They looked around but did not find the Vedas. The Asuras rapidly rose from the nether region. Returning to the primeval lotus from which they had taken birth, they saw the puissant Being, the original Creator, dwelling in the form of Aniruddha of fair complexion and the splendour of the moon.

Of immeasurable prowess, he was under the influence of yoga-nidra, asleep, his body stretched on the waters and occupying a space as vast as itself. Glowing with great effulgence and the stainless sattva guna, the body of Vishnu lay on the hood of a resplendent snake that emitted flames of fire.

Beholding the Lord thus, the two Danavas roared with laughter. Imbued with the attributes of rajas and tamas, they said, 'This is that Being of white complexion. He now lies asleep. Without doubt, this one has brought the Vedas away from patala. Whose is he? Who is he? Why is he thus asleep on the hood of a snake?'

These words of the two Danavas awakened Hari from his yoga-slumber. Narayana, thus awakened, understood that the two Danavas intended to fight him. Seeing this, he also set his mind to gratify their desire.

A battle broke out between those two on one side and Narayana on the other. The Asuras Madhu and Kaitabha were embodiments of rajas and tamas. To please Brahma, Narayana killed them both. Thus he came to be called Madhusudana, the slayer of Madhu. Having destroyed the two Asuras and restored the Vedas to Brahma, Vishnu assuaged Brahma's grief.

With the help of Hari and the Vedas, Brahma created all the worlds with their mobile and immobile creatures. Granting the intelligence of creation to Brahma, Hari disappeared from there and returned to where he had come from.

It was thus that Narayana, having assumed the form with the horse-head, slew the two Danavas Madhu and Kaitabha. Once more he assumed the same form to cause Pravritti dharma to flow in the universe. Thus did the blessed Hari assume that grand form of Hayasiras. This is celebrated as the oldest and most powerful of all his forms. He who frequently listens or mentally recites the story of how Narayana assumed that form will never lose his Vedic knowledge.

Having adored this illustrious deity with rigorous tapasya, the Rishi Panchala, also known as Galava, acquired the knowledge of Krama by treading the path shown by Rudra. Rajan, I have now recited to you the ancient story of Hayasiras, consistent with the Vedas, about which you asked me.

Whatever forms the Supreme Deity desires to assume with a view to ordain the affairs of the universe, he assumes those forms within himself by exercising his own inherent powers. Narayana is the receptacle of the Vedas. He is the receptacle of tapasya as well. Hari is yoga.

He is the embodiment of the Samkhya yoga. He is that Parabrahman of which we hear. Truth has Narayana for its refuge. Rita has Narayana for its Atman. Nivritti, from which there is no return, has Narayana for its abode. The basis of Pravritti equally has Narayana for its soul.

The foremost of all the attributes that belong to the earth is smell. Scent has Narayana for its soul. The attributes of water are various kinds of tastes. These too have Narayana for their soul.

The foremost attribute of light is form. Form also has Narayana for its soul. Touch, which is the attribute of wind, also has Narayana for its soul. Sound, which is an attribute of space, has like the others Narayana for its soul. Mind also, which is the attribute of the unmanifest Prakriti, has Narayana for its soul.

Time which is computed by the movement of the celestial luminaries has similarly Narayana for its soul. The Devas of fame, of beauty and of wealth have him for their soul. Both the Samkhya philosophy and yoga have Narayana for their soul.

As Purusha, the Supreme Being is the cause of all this. He is the origin of everything, as Pradhana or Prakriti. He is Svabhava, the basis on which all things rest. Through his agency we witness the variety in the universe.

He is the various kinds of energy that act in the universe. In these five ways he is that all-controlling invisible influence of which men speak. Those who study the many areas of knowledge regard Hari to be identical with these five causes and as the final refuge of all things.

Narayana, endowed with the highest yoga-shakti is the only one topic of enquiry. The thoughts of the all the inhabitants of all the worlds, including Brahma and the high-souled Rishis, of those that are Samkhyas and yogins, of those that are Yatis, and of those that are conversant with the Atman are fully known to Kesava, but none of these can know what his thoughts are.

Whatever deeds are performed in honour of the Devas or the Pitris, whatever gifts are made, whatever penances are performed, have Vishnu established by his own laws for their refuge. He is named Vasudeva because he is the abode of all creatures. He is immutable. He is Supreme.

He is the foremost of Rishis. He is mighty. He transcends the three gunas. Just as time which runs seamlessly manifests itself in the form of succeeding seasons, even so, though nirguna, does he manifest himself.

Even they that are Mahatmans cannot understand what he does. Only those foremost of Rishis with knowledge of their Atmans succeed in beholding in their hearts that Purusha who transcends all gunas.'" Janamejaya said, "The illustrious Hari is gracious to those who are devoted to him with their entire beings. He accepts also all that is offered to him in accordance with the shastras.

CANTO 348

Men who have burnt away their karma, those without paapa and punya, and those who have attained the knowledge handed down from guru to guru always attain that fourth and highest end, the essence of the Purushottama or Vasudeva. Devoted to Narayana with their whole souls, they attain that highest goal instantly.

Undoubtedly, bhakti dharma seems to be superior to that of gyana, and is very dear to Narayana. Those who adhere to it, without going through the three successive stages of Aniruddha, Pradyumna, and Samkarshana, at once attain to the immutable Hari.

In my view, the end that is attained by Brahmanas, who duly study the Vedas with the Upanishads according to the niyamas regulating such study, and by those that adopt the religion of Yatis, is inferior to that attained by persons devoted to Hari with all their heart."

Janamejaya said, "Who first promulgated this bhakti dharma? Was it some Deva or some Rishi that declared it? What are the practices of those that are said to be devoted with their entire souls? When did those practices begin? I have questions about these subjects. Dispel these doubts. Great is my interest in hearing you explain these to me."

Vaisampayana said, "When the eighteen aksauhinis of the Pandava and the Kaurava armies were drawn up ready for the battle and when Arjuna became despondent, Krishna himself explained what is and what is not the end attained by persons of different characters. I have earlier narrated his words to you.

The dharma taught by the Holy One between two teeming armies is difficult to understand. Men of uncleansed souls cannot grasp it at all. Rajan, having created this dharma in the ancient Krita yuga, in perfect consonance with the Samans, it is borne by the Supreme Lord Narayana himself.

Arjuna asked this very question of Narada in the midst of the Rishis and in the presence of Krishna and Bhishma. My guru, Vyasa, heard what Narada said. Receiving it from the Devarishis, Vyasa imparted it to me in exactly the same way in which he had obtained it from Narada.

I will now tell it to you in the same way as it was received from Narada. Listen to me.

In that kalpa when Brahma took his birth in the mind of Narayana and emerged from his mouth, Narayana himself performed his Daiva and Paitra rites in accordance with bhakti dharma. Those Rishis that subsist upon the froth of water then obtained it from Narayana.

From the froth-eating Rishis, this dharma was obtained by the Vaikanasa Rishis. From the Vaikanasas, Soma had it. Later, it disappeared from the universe.

After his second birth, when he sprang from the eyes of Narayana, Brahma received this bhakti dharma from Soma. Having received it thus, Brahma instructed Rudra in it.

In the Krita yuga of that ancient kalpa, Rudra, devoted to yoga, imparted it to all the Balakhilya Rishis. Through the illusion of Narayana, it once more vanished from the universe.

In the third birth of Brahma, which was from the speech of Narayana, this dharma once more arose from Narayana himself. Rishi Suparna obtained it from that foremost of beings. Suparna used to recite it three times during the day. Hence it came to be called Trisauparna.

This religion has been referred to in the Rigveda. Its duties are strenuous to practise. Vayu, who sustains the lives of all creatures, obtained this eternal dharma from Rishi Suparna.

Vayu transmitted it to those Rishis who live on the sacrificial offerings that remain after feeding guests and others. From those Rishis this dharma was obtained by the Great Ocean. It once more disappeared from the universe and merged into Narayana.

Listen now to what happened in the kalpa when, in his next birth, Brahma sprang from the ear of Narayana. When Hari resolved upon creation, he thought of a being who would have the power to create the universe. While thinking of this, a being sprang from his ears, one that was competent to create the universe. The Lord called him by the name Brahma.

Addressing Brahma, the Supreme Narayana said to him, 'Son, create all kinds of creatures from your mouth and feet. I will do what benefits you, for I shall empower you with both energy and strength needed to make you equal to this task. You will also receive from me the sattvata dharma. With it you will create the Krita yuga and duly establish it.'

Thus addressed, Brahma bowed his head before Hari, and received from him that foremost of all paths with all its mysteries and its details, together with the Aranyakas, which emanated from Narayana's mouth.

Narayana then instructed Brahma in that dharma and said to him, 'You are the creator of the duties that are to be observed in the respective yugas.' Having said this, Narayana disappeared and went to the place which is beyond the reach of tamas, where the Avyakta, unmanifest, resides and which is known to those whose deeds are without the desire for fruits.

After this, the boon-giving Brahma, the Pitamaha of the worlds, created the different worlds with their mobile and immobile creatures. The age that first commenced was perfectly auspicious and came to be called Krita. In that age, only the sattva dharma existed, pervading the entire universe. With that primeval religion of righteousness, Brahma, the Creator of all the worlds, worshipped the puissant Hari Narayana.

To spread that dharma for the welfare of the worlds, Brahma instructed that Manu who is known by the name of Svarochisha in that dharma. Svarochisha Manu gave that knowledge to his own son Sankhapada.

Sankhapada communicated this knowledge to his own son Suvarnabha who was the ruler of the cardinal and subsidiary directions. When the Krita yuga ended, the Treta yuga began and the dharma once more disappeared from the world.

In a subsequent birth of Brahma, which was derived from the nose of Narayana, with eyes like lotus petals, the Lord himself recited this doctrine in the presence of Brahma. Then Sanatkumara, the son of Brahma, created from his thought, studied this doctrine.

From Sanatkumara, in the beginning of the Krita yuga, the Prajapati Virana learned the dharma. Having studied it, Virana taught it to the ascetic Raivya. Raivya, in his turn, imparted it to his pure and wise son Kushki, of high vratas, that righteous ruler of the cardinal and subsidiary points of the horizon. Again, this dharma, born of the mouth of Narayana, vanished from the world.

In the next birth of Brahma, when he emerged from an egg which sprang from Hari, this doctrine once more issued from the mouth of Narayana. It was received by Brahma who practised it duly in all its aspects. Brahma then transmitted it to those Rishis known as Barhishada.

From the Barhishadas it was obtained by a Brahmana known as Jyeshtya, learned in the Sama Veda. And because he was knowledgeable about the Samans, he is also known by the name of Jyeshtya-Samavrata Hari. It was obtained by a king of the name of Avikampana from this Brahmana. After this, the doctrine once more disappeared from the world.

At the beginning of this kalpa, in the seventh birth of Brahma from the lotus that sprang from the navel of Narayana, this dharma was re-established by Narayana himself, and given to the creator of all the worlds. Brahma gave it to Daksha, one of his sons Created by a thought of his mind.

Daksha, in his turn, imparted it to the eldest of all the sons of his daughters, Aditya, who was older than Savitri. From Aditya, Vivaswat obtained it. In the beginning of the Treta yuga, Vivaswat transmitted this knowledge to Manu. To protect and support all the worlds, Manu gave it to his son Ikshvaku.

Promulgated by Ikshvaku, the bhakti dharma spreads across the whole world. When Pralaya comes, it will once more return to Narayana and be merged in him. The religion which is practised by the Yatis, has been earlier narrated to you in the Hari Gita, with a summary of all its rules.

Along with its mysteries and details, Devarishi Narada got it from Narayana himself. This foremost of doctrines is primeval and eternal. Difficult to grasp and arduous to practise, it is always upheld by persons devoted to the sattva guna.

Hari becomes gratified by actions performed with a full knowledge of dharma without injury to any creature. Some adore Narayana with only a single form, that of Aniruddha. Some adore him as having two forms, that of Aniruddha and Pradyumna.

Some adore him as having three forms, Aniruddha, Pradyumna and Samkarshana. Others revere him as consisting of four forms, Aniruddha, Pradyumna, Samkarshana, and Vasudeva.

Hari is himself the Kshetrajna. He is whole, without parts. He is the Jiva in all creatures, transcending the five Mahabhutas. He is Manas, the mind that directs and controls the five senses. Having the highest intelligence, He is the ordainer of the universe, and its Creator.

He is both active and inactive. He is both cause and the effect. He is the one immutable Purusha, who sports as he likes. Thus have I recited to you the dharma of those who worship without desire, one that cannot be understood by those of uncleansed souls; this knowledge I acquired through the grace of my guru.

Men who are devoted to Narayana with their whole souls are rare. If the world had been full of such men with universal compassion, having Atmagyana, always engaged in doing good to others, then the Krita yuga would have set in. All men would have set themselves to deeds without desire of fruit.

In this way, my preceptor, that foremost of regenerate ones, knower of all duties, Krishna-Dwaipayana Vyasa, discoursed to Dharmaraja Yudhishtira on this bhakti dharma, in the presence of many Rishis and in the hearing of Krishna and Bhishma. He himself had received it from Tapodhana Narada.

Those who worship Narayana with all their souls and are without desire, succeed in attaining to the realm identical with Brahma, pure in complexion, possessing the effulgence of the moon and immutable."

Janamejaya said, "I see that those Dvijas whose souls have been awakened practise diverse kinds of dharmas. Why is it that other Brahmanas, instead of practising these, observe other kinds of vratas and kriyas?"

Vaisampayana said, "Bhaarata, three kinds of dispositions have been created for all embodied creatures, that which relates to the attribute of sattva, that which relates to the attribute of rajas, and lastly that which relates to the attribute of tamas.

One who is devoted to the sattva guna will certainly attain mukti. This guna allows one to understand him who knows Brahman.

Mukti is entirely dependent upon Narayana. Hence those who strive for emancipation are considered to be endowed with this sattva guna. By thinking of Purushottama, the man who revers Narayana acquires great wisdom.

Those who are wise and have taken up the practices of Yatis and mukti dharma, and have quenched their longing, always find that Hari favours them with the fruits of their desire.

That mortal man subject to birth and death upon whom Hari looks kindly should be known as one endowed with the sattva guna and devoted to mukti. The dharma of one devoted to Narayana is regarded as similar or equal in merit to the system of the Samkhyas. By adopting that doctrine one attains to the highest end, moksha which has Narayana for its soul.

That person upon whom Narayana looks with compassion succeeds in becoming awakened. No one, Rajan, can become enlightened through his own wishes. That nature which partakes of both rajas and tamas is said to be mixed.

Hari is not benevolent towards one with such a mixed nature, with Pravritti dharma, who is subject to birth and death. Only Brahma, the Pitamaha of the worlds, looks kindly upon such a man because his mind is overwhelmed by the two inferior attributes of rajas and tamas.

Without doubt, the Devas and the Rishis are devoted to the sattva guna. But they do not have that attribute in its subtle form and hence are of a mutable nature."

Janamejaya said, "How can one that is fraught with the principle of change succeed in attaining to that Purushottama? Tell me this, which, no doubt, is known to you. Discourse to me also of Pravritti."

Vaisampayana said, "That which is the twenty-fifth tattva in the Samkhya system, when it becomes able to abstain entirely from karma, succeeds in attaining to the subtle Purushottama, which is invested with the sattva guna, and which is filled with the Spirit symbolised by the letters A, U and M. The Samkhya system, the Aranyaka Veda, and the Pancharatra shastras are all one and the same and form parts of one whole. This is the dharma of those devoted to Narayana with their whole souls, that which has Narayana for its essence.

As waves of the ocean, rising from the ocean, rush away from it only to return to it in the end, even so diverse kinds of knowledge, springing from Narayana, return to Narayana in the end. I have thus explained to you, son of the Kuru vamsa, what the sattva dharma is. If you are able, then practise it fittingly.

Thus did Narada explain to my guru Vyasa the eternal and immutable course, called Ekanta, followed by the white- as also by the yellow-robed Yatis. Vyasa, in turn, imparted this to the wise and just Yudhishtira.

I, too, received it from Vyasa and have passed it on to you. For these reasons this dharma is difficult to practise. Hearing it, others are as bewildered as you have been. It is Krishna who is the protector of the universe and its beguiler. It is he who is the destroyer and the cause."

CANTO 349

Janamejaya said, "The Samkhya yoga, the Pancharatra shastras and the Aranyaka-Vedas, all these different systems of gyana or dharma are prevalent in the world. Do they all teach the same course of duties, or are these different from one another? I ask you to instruct me on Pravritti in the proper order."

Vaisampayana said, "I bow to that great Rishi who dispels darkness, whom Satyavati bore to Parasara in the midst of an island, who possesses vast knowledge and who is endowed with a great and liberal soul.

The learned say that he is the origin of Brahma; that he is the sixth form of Narayana; that he is the foremost of Rishis; that he has the might of yoga; that as the only son of his parents he is an incarnate amsa of Narayana; and that, born under extraordinary circumstances on an island, he is the inexhaustible receptacle of the Vedas.

In the Krita yuga, Narayana of great tejas created him as his son. The Mahatman Vyasa is unborn and ancient, and the limitless vessel that contains the Vedas."

Janamejaya said, "Best of the regenerate, you earlier told me that the Rishi Vasishta had a son by the name Saktri and that Saktri had a son named Parasara, and that Parasara had a son named the Krishna Dwaipayana or Vyasa. Now you tell me that Vyasa is the son of Narayana. I ask you, was it in some former birth that Vyasa was born from Narayana? Tell me of that birth of Vyasa from Narayana."

Vaisampayana said, "Wanting to understand the meaning of the Srutis, my guru, that ocean of tapasya devoted to observing all scriptural duties and the acquisition of knowledge, lived for a while in a particular realm of the Himavat Mountains. Because of the great effort of composing the Mahabharata, he was worn out by his penances. At that time, Sumanta and Jaimini, and Paila, and myself the fourth, and Suka his own son, attended on him. All of us waited dutifully upon him, engaged in doing all that was necessary to dispel his exhaustion.

Surrounded by his five sishyas, Vyasa shone in beauty on the breast of the Himavat Mountains like Mahadeva in the midst of his ghostly ganas. One day, with great reverence, we approached our guru who, having divided and summarised the Vedas with all their angas, and also the meanings of all the verses in the Mahabharata, and having subdued his senses, was at that time immersed in thought.

Availing ourselves of an interval in the conversation, we asked him to expound to us the meanings of the Vedas and the verses in the Mahabharata, and also to narrate to us the events of his own birth from Narayana. Knowing as he was of all subjects of enquiry, he first spoke to us on the interpretations of the Srutis and the Mahabharata, and then began to tell us the following incidents.

Vyasa said, 'Listen, my sishyas, to this most excellent narrative, to this best of histories, which tells of the birth of a Rishi. Pertaining to the Krita yuga, I have learnt of it through my tapasya. On the occasion of the seventh creation, that which was due to the primeval lotus, Narayana, endowed with the austerest penances, transcending both good and evil, and possessing unrivalled splendour, at first created Brahma from his navel.

After Brahma was born, Narayana said to him, "You have sprung from my navel. You possess the powers of creation so set yourself to the task of creating diverse kinds of creatures, rational and irrational."

Thus addressed by his Creator, Brahma felt troubled by the magnitude of this charge and was reluctant to do as he was commanded.

Bowing his head before Hari, the Lord of the universe, Brahma said to him, "I bow to you, O Lord of the Devas, but what powers do I have to create diverse creatures? I have no wisdom. Knowing this, direct me to do what is possible."

Thus addressed by Brahma, Narayana vanished instantly from Brahma's sight. The Supreme Lord then began to meditate. The goddess of intelligence appeared before Narayana. Himself transcending all Yoga, Narayana, by dint of yoga, appealed to the goddess of intelligence.

The immutable Hari, said to the Devi who was endowed with the goodness and power of yoga, "To accomplish the task of creating all the worlds you must enter into Brahma." And she entered Brahma.

When Hari saw that Brahma had been united with intelligence, he once more addressed him, saying "Now create diverse kinds of creatures." Brahma reverently accepted the command of his creator.

Narayana then disappeared from Brahma's presence, and in a moment repaired to his own place, known by the name of Divya, light or effulgence. Returning to his own nature of being unmanifest, he remained in that state of oneness.

After the task of creation by Brahma, another thought arose in Narayana's mind. He reflected, "Brahma, otherwise called Paramesthi, has created all these creatures, Daityas and Danavas, Gandharvas and Rakshasas. The fragile earth has become burdened with the weight of these creatures.

Many among the Daityas and Danavas and Rakshasas will become mighty. With tapasya, they will at times succeed in acquiring many powerful boons. They will swell with pride and strength because of those boons, and will oppress and afflict the most powerful Devas and Rishis.

Thus, from time to time, it is fitting for me to lighten the burden of the earth by assuming diverse forms for each occasion. I will achieve this task by destroying the evil and upholding the righteous. In this manner, protected by me, the earth, the embodiment of truth, will succeed in bearing her load of creatures.

Assuming the form of a mighty snake I will have to uphold the earth in empty space. Thus, she will be able to support all creation, mobile and immobile. In the different ages, I will incarnate on Bhumi in different forms to rescue her from danger."

Having reflected in this way, Madhusudana created diverse forms in his mind in which to appear from time to time. And he thought, "Assuming the forms of Varaha, of Narasimha, of Vamana, and of men, I shall defeat and destroy all the enemies of the Devas." After this, Narayana once more uttered the syllable Bhoh, making the air resound with it. From this syllable, Saraswati, arose a Rishi named Saraswat. This son, born of the speech of Narayana, also came to be called Apantaratamas. Powerful and all-knowing of the past, the present and the future, he was firm in the observance of vratas and truthful in speech.

Narayana, the original Creator of the Devas, possessing an immutable nature, said to the Rishi Saraswat, “You must devote your attention to the dissemination of the Vedas. O Rishi, accomplish what I command.”

Obeying this command of the Supreme Lord from whose speech he had sprung into existence, Rishi Apantaratamas organised and distributed the Vedas in the Kalpa named after Swayambhuva Manu. Hari became gratified with the Rishi and his well-performed penances, his vows and observances, and his subduing of his senses and passions.

Narayana said, “In each Manvantara, you will disseminate the Vedas, and as a result you will be immutable and unsurpassable.

When the Kali yuga sets in, certain princes of Bharata’s vamsa, called the Kauravas, will be born from you. They will be celebrated over the earth as high-souled princes ruling over powerful kingdoms. However, dissensions will break out among them ending in their destruction at one another’s hands.

Dvijottama, in that age also, you will spread the Vedas to the diverse varnas. Indeed, in that dark age, your complexion, too, will darken. You will cause various kinds of dharma and gyana to surge.

Although steeped in austere penances, you will never be able to free yourself from desire and attachment to the world. Your son, however, through the grace of Madhava, will be freed from every attachment and be united with the Paramatman. It shall not be otherwise.

He whom learned Brahmanas call the mind-born son of the wise Vasishta, an ocean of tapasya, whose splendour exceeds that of the sun himself, will be the progenitor of a vamsa into which Maharishi Parasara, filled with tejas and prowess, will be born. That foremost of men, that ocean of Vedas, that abode of penances, will be your father in the Kali yuga.

You will be born to an unmarried woman through her union with Rishi Parasara. You will have no doubts about the significance of things past, present and future. Imbued with penances and instructed by me, you will be able to see the events of thousands of ages past. You will also see thousands of yugas into the future.

In that birth, you will behold me on earth, I who am without birth and death, as Krishna of the Yadava vamsa, armed with the Sudarsana Chakra. All this will occur through the punya you will have acquired as a result of your ceaseless devotion to me. These words of mine shall come true.

You will be among the foremost of all the created. Great will be your fame. Surya's son Sani, Saturn, will be born as the great Manu in a future Kalpa. During that Manvantara, your punya will be superior to all the Manus of the several ages. This you will be through my grace.

Whatever exists in the world is the outcome of my exertion. The thoughts of others may not correspond with their actions. As for me, I always ordain what I think, without the slightest hindrance!"'

Vyasa continued, 'Having said these words to the Rishi Apantaratamas, the Supreme Lord dismissed him. Sishyas, I am he that was born as Apantaratamas through Narayana's command. Once more I have been born as Krishna-Dwaipayana of the Vasishta vamsa.

I have thus told you the circumstances of my former birth, which was due to the grace of Narayana in so much that I was a very part of Narayana himself. In ancient times, I undertook the severest of penances with the help of the highest abstraction of the mind.

Moved by my great love for you who revere me, I have told you everything you wished to know about me, from my first birth to the present one!'"

Vaisampayana continued, "As desired by you, Rajan, I have told you about the circumstances connected with the former birth of our revered guru, Vyasa of unstained mind. Now listen to more. There are many kinds of doctrines that go by the names of Samkhya, yoga, the Pancharatra, Vedas and Pasupati.

The creator of the Samkhya yoga is the great Rishi Kapila. The primeval Hiranyagarbha is the promulgator of the yoga system. The Rishi Apantaratamas, also called Prachina-garbha, is said to be the teacher of the Vedas.

The Pasupata doctrine was disseminated by the son of Brahma, the Lord of Uma, that master of all creatures, the always joyful Siva, otherwise known as Sreekantha. Narayana himself is the promulgator of the contents of the Pancharatra shastras.

In all these, it is seen that Narayana is the sole subject of exposition. According to these shastras and the knowledge they contain, Narayana is the only object of worship.

Those who are blinded by tamas, fail to understand that Narayana is the Paramatman who pervades the entire universe. Those wise men, the authors of the shastras, say that Narayana, who is a Rishi, is the one object of reverent worship in the universe. I say that there is no other being like him. The Supreme Deity, called Hari, lives in the hearts of those who, with the help of the scriptures and of inference, have succeeded in dispelling all doubts.

Madhava never dwells in the hearts of those who doubt and dispute everything using false dialectics. They who are conversant with the Pancharatra shastras, who are duly observant of prescribed duties, and who are devoted to Narayana with their very souls, succeed in entering into Narayana.

The Samkhya and the yoga systems are eternal. All the Vedas are eternal. All the Rishis have declared that this universe existing from ancient times is Narayana's self. You must know that all actions, whether good or bad, are laid down in the Vedas and all events in heaven and earth, between the sky and the waters, are caused by and flow from that ancient Rishi Narayana."

Janamejaya said, “Regenerate one, are there many Purushas or is there only one? Who in the universe is the foremost of Purushas? What, again, is said to be the source of all things?”

Vaisampayana said, “In the speculations of the Samkhya and the yoga systems many Purushas have been spoken of. Those that follow these systems do not accept that there is but one Purusha in the universe. In the same manner in which the many Purushas are said to have one origin in the Supreme Purusha, it may be said that this entire universe is identical with that one Purusha of superior attributes.

I shall explain this now, after bowing to my guru Vyasa, who knows the Atman, who is observant of tapasya and self-restraint, and is worthy of reverence. Rajan, this speculation on Purusha occurs in all the Vedas. It is well known to be identical with Rita and Satya. Vyasa has reflected upon it.

Many Rishis, descended from Kapila, have contemplated about, and commented on what is called Adhyatma. Through the grace of Vyasa, I will expound to you what Vyasa has said on this subject of the Oneness of Purusha. There is an ancient story of the discourse between Brahma and the three-eyed Mahadeva on this matter.

In the midst of the ocean of milk, there is a lofty mountain of great golden radiance known as Vaijayanta. Going there alone, from his own abode of great splendour and felicity, Brahma would often spend his time contemplating the course of Adhyatma.

While the four-faced Brahma was seated there, his son Mahadeva, who had sprung from his forehead, encountered him in course of his wanderings through the universe. While coursing through the sky, Mahayogi Siva saw Brahma seated on that mountain and descended on its peak.

Joyfully he appeared before his Creator and worshipped his feet. Beholding Mahadeva prostrated at his feet, Brahma raised him up with his left hand. Having raised him up, Brahma, Lord of all creatures, on meeting his son after a long time, spoke to him.

Brahma said, ‘Mahabaho, you are welcome. It is my good fortune to see you after such a long time. I hope, my son, that all is well and proper with your penances and Vedic studies and your japa. You always observe the most austere tapasya. So I ask you about their practice and wellbeing.’

Rudra said, ‘Through your grace, all is well with my penances and Vedic studies. All is also well with the universe. I saw you long ago in your own dwelling of felicity and effulgence. I am come from there to this mountain that is now your abode.

I am curious about your withdrawal into such a solitary place from your usual realm of splendour. Great must the reason be, Pitamaha, for this.

Your own foremost abode is free from the pains of hunger and thirst, and inhabited by both Devas and Asuras, by Rishis of immeasurable radiance, as also by Gandharvas and Apsaras. Abandoning such a place of felicity, you live alone on this best of mountains. The reason for this must be grave.’

Brahma said, ‘This foremost of mountains called Vaijayanta is always my dwelling. Here, with my mind concentrated in dhyana, I meditate on the one universal Purusha of infinite proportions.’

Rudra said, ‘You are Swayambhu, self-born. Many are the Purushas that have been created by you. More yet are still being created by you. The Infinite Purusha, of whom you speak, is one and single. Who is that Purusha, Brahma, on whom you meditate? I am greatly curious about this. I beg you, dispel my doubt.’

Brahma said, ‘Son, many are those Purushas of whom you speak. The one Purusha, of whom I am thinking, is hidden and transcends all other Purushas. That one Purusha is the foundation of the many Purushas that exist in the universe; and since that one Purusha is the source of all the countless Purushas, the rest, if they succeed in divesting themselves of gunas, succeed in entering into that one Purusha who is all the universe, who is supreme, who is eternal, and who is himself without and above all attributes.”

CANTO 351

"Brahma said, 'Listen now to the description of that Purusha. He is eternal and immutable. He is undecaying and immeasurable. He pervades all things.

That Purusha cannot be seen by you, or by me, or any other. Those who are filled with the understanding and the senses but lacking in self-restraint and tranquillity of soul cannot catch a glimpse him. The Supreme Purusha is said to be one that can be seen only with the help of gyana.

Though without a form, he dwells in every body. Though he lives in bodies, he is never touched by the actions of men. He is my Antaratma, my inner soul. He is your inner soul. He is the all-seeing witness dwelling within every embodied creature and marks their deeds. No one can totally grasp him at any time.

The universe is the crown of his head. The universe is his arms. The universe is his feet. The universe is his eyes. The universe is his nose. Alone he ranges freely through all kshetras without any restriction.

Kshetra is another name for body. And because he knows all kshetras, as also all good and bad deeds, therefore he, who is the soul of yoga, is named Kshetrajna. No one can perceive how he enters into embodied creatures and how he leaves them.

In accordance with the Samkhya shastra, with the help of yoga, duly observing its rules, I am engaged in meditating upon the origin of that Purusha, but, alas, I cannot comprehend that cause. According to the measure of my knowledge, I will discourse to you upon that eternal Purusha and his Oneness and supreme greatness.

The learned speak of him as the singular Purusha. That one eternal Being deserves the name of Mahapurusha. Fire is an element, but it may be seen to blaze up in a thousand places under thousand different circumstances. The sun is one and single, but his rays spread over the universe. Penances are of diverse kinds, but they have one common origin from which they flow.

The wind is one, but it blows in many forms in the world. The great ocean is the one parent of all the waters in the world seen in different circumstances. Nirguna, that one Purusha, is the universe displayed in infinite forms and ways. Flowing from him, the infinite universe enters into him again at the time of the pralaya.

By casting off the consciousness of body and the senses, by casting off all acts good and bad, by casting off both truth and falsehood, one succeeds in ridding oneself of gunas. The person who realises that inconceivable Purusha and grasps his subtle existence in the four forms of Aniruddha, Pradyumna, Samkarshana and Vasudeva, and who, as a result of such understanding, attains perfect tranquillity of heart, succeeds in entering into and identifying himself with that one auspicious Purusha.

Some wise men speak of him as the Paramatman. Others regard him as the one Soul. A third class of learned men describe him just as the Atman. The truth is that he who is the Supreme Soul is always nirguna, without attributes. He is Narayana.

He is the universal soul, and he is the one Purusha. He is never affected by the fruits of actions even as the leaf of the lotus is never drenched by the water one may throw upon it.

The Karmatman, the soul of actions, is different. That soul is sometimes engaged in karma and when it succeeds in discarding karma, attains mukti or union with the Paramatman. The soul of karma has seventeen attributes.

Thus it is said that there are many kinds of Purushas in due order. In reality, however, there is but one Purusha. He is the abode of all the laws that govern the universe. He is the highest subject of knowledge. He is at once the knower and the object to be known. He is at once the thinker and the object of thought. He is the one that eats and the food that is eaten.

He is the smeller and the scent that is smelled. He is at once he that touches and the object that is touched. He is the agent that sees and the object that is seen. He is the hearer and what is heard. He is the conceiver and that which is conceived. He possesses attributes and is also free from them; he is both saguna and nirguna.

What has earlier been called Pradhana, and is the mother of the Mahat tattva, is no other than the effulgence of the Paramatman because he is eternal, without destruction, without end, and ever changeless. He it is who creates the prime ordinance in respect of Dhatri himself.

Learned Brahmanas call him by the name Aniruddha. All karma, possessing excellent merits and fraught with blessings, flowing in the world from the Vedas, have been caused by him. All the Devas and all the Rishis, with tranquil souls, occupying their places on the vedi, honour him with the first share of their sacrificial offerings.

I, Brahma, the primeval master of all creatures, was born from him, and you have been born from me. From me have flowed the universe with all its mobile and immobile creatures, and all the Vedas, with their mysteries. Divided into four parts, Aniruddha, Pradyumna, Samkarshana and Vasudeva, he sports as he pleases. That illustrious and divine Lord is awakened by his own knowledge.

I have answered your questions, my son, according to the manner in which the matter is expounded in the doctrines of Samkhya and yoga.'"

CANTO 352

Sauti said, 'After Vaisampayana had explained to king Janamejaya the glory of Narayana, he began to discourse on another subject by narrating Yudhishtira's question and the answer that Bhishma, who lay on his bed of arrows, gave in the presence of all the Pandavas and the Rishis, and also of Krishna himself.

Vaisampayana said, "Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, you have discoursed to us on the duties pertaining to mukti dharma. Now tell us about the foremost duties of men belonging to the various asramas.'

Bhishma says, 'The kartavyas or dharmas ordained for each asrama, if well performed, can lead to swarga and the high fruit of truth. Duties are like doors to yagnas, and none of their practices is futile. Bharatarishabha, one who adopts particular duties with dedication and reverence praises these to the exclusion of the rest.

This is the very subject which, in ancient times, was the focus of the conversation between Devarishi Narada and Indra. Narada, revered by all the world, is a siddha, one whose sadhana has been met with fulfilment. He wanders through all the worlds without hindrance, like the all-pervading wind itself.

Once upon a time he repaired to the abode of Indra. Duly honoured by the king of the Devas, he sat close to his host. Seeing him seated at his ease and free from fatigue, the Lord of Sachi addressed him, saying, "Maharishi, is there anything wonderful that you have beheld? Crowned with ascetic success, you roam through the universe of mobile and immobile objects, witnessing all things. There is nothing in the universe that is unknown to you. Do tell me, therefore, of any wonderful occurrence that you may have felt, seen or heard of."

Thus questioned, Narada began to recite to Indra the vast history that follows. Listen to me as I narrate that story which unfolded. I shall recount it in the same manner in which the Devarishi did, and for the same purpose that he had in mind.'"

CANTO 353

"Bhishma says, 'In the town of Mahapadma, situated on the southern side of the Ganga, there lived a Brahmana of concentrated Soul. Born into the Atri vamsa, he was blessed with an amiable nature. With his doubts dispelled by faith and contemplation, he was well conversant with the path he was to follow.

Ever observant of his dharma, he had his anger under perfect control. Always content, he was a master of his senses. Devoted to tapasya and the study of the Vedas, he was respected by all good men.

He earned wealth by righteous means and his conduct in all things was true to his varnasrama and svadharma. The family to which he belonged was large and celebrated. He had many kinsmen and relatives, and many wives and spouses. His behaviour was always respectable and faultless.

Seeing that he had many children, the Brahmana undertook religious karmas on a large scale. His observances were in accordance with the customs of his own family.

The Brahmana reflected that three kinds of duties have been laid down for observances. Firstly, there were the duties ordained in the Vedas with regard to one's varna and asrama, namely that of a Brahmana observing the rules of grihasta.

Secondly, there were the duties prescribed in the scriptures, namely in the Dharmashastras. And, thirdly, there were those duties that famed and revered men in earlier times had followed though these were not to be found in the Vedas or the Dharmashastras.

Which of these duties should I follow? Which of them, if followed by me, are likely to lead to my benefit? Which, indeed, should be my refuge?

Thoughts like these always troubled him. He could not resolve his doubts.

While troubled with such reflections, another great Brahmana came to his house as a guest. The grihasta duly honoured his atithi according to the niyamas of worship laid down in the shastras. When his guest appeared refreshed and was seated at ease, the Brahmana addressed him in the following words.

The Brahmana said, "Sinless one, I have become devoted to you because of your agreeable conversation. You have become my friend. Listen to me, for I want to ask something. After handing over the duties of a householder to my son, I wish to discharge the highest purushartha of man. What, O Dvija, should be my path?

Relying upon the Jivatman, I wish to live in the one Paramatman. Alas, bound to the ties of attachment, I do not have the will to actually set myself to accomplish that task. And since the best part of my life has passed away in the duties of a grihasta, I now want to devote the rest of my life to acquiring the means to meet the expenses of my future journey.

I desire to cross samsara, the illusory ocean of life. Where will I find the raft of dharma to realise my purpose? I hear that even the Devas must endure the fruits of their actions; beholding the rows of Yama's standards and flags floating over the heads of all creatures, my heart fails to derive pleasure from the diverse sensual objects with which it comes into contact.

I do not respect the dharma of the Yatis as they, too, depend upon alms for their sustenance. My revered guest, you who are endowed with intelligence and reason, set me on the right path of kartavya and karma!"'

Bhishma continues, 'The wise guest, hearing his host's righteous words, said these sweet words in a melodious voice.

The guest said, "I, too, am puzzled about this subject. The same thought occupies my mind and I am unable to arrive at any definite conclusions. Swarga has many doors.

There are some that commend mukti. Some praise the fruits attained by tapasya. Some take refuge in sannyasa way of life. Some follow grihastasrama.

Some rely upon the punya attained by an observance of Kshatriya dharma. Some rely upon the fruits of self-restraint. Some believe that the merits of dutiful obedience to gurus and elders are efficacious.

Some undertake to restrain their speech. Some have attained felicity by waiting dutifully upon their departed ancestors. Some have risen to swarga by practising compassion, and some by practising truth.

Some rush into battle and, after laying down their lives, attain heaven. Some attain it by practising the Unccha vrata. Some have devoted themselves to the study of the Vedas. These men, of intelligence and tranquil souls, having subdued their senses, attain swarga.

Others characterised by simplicity and truth have been slain by evil men. These have become honoured inhabitants of heaven. In this world, it is seen, that men attain swarga passing through a thousand doors of dharma, all standing wide open. My understanding has been troubled by your question, like a soft cloud by the wind.”””

"Bhishma says, 'The guest continued, "For all that, Brahmana, I will duly instruct you. Listen to me as I recite what I have heard from my guru. In the Naimisa forest situated on the banks of the Gomati, where the wheel of dharma was set in motion during a former age of creation, there is a city named after the Nagas. There, in ancient times, the assembled Devas had performed a mahayagna. There Mandhatri, the foremost of earthly kings, defeated Indra, the king of the gods.

In that city lives a mighty Naga. He is known by the name of Padmanabha or Padma. Walking in the triple path of karma, gyana and bhakti, he gratifies all creatures in thought, word and deed. Reflecting upon all things with great attention, he protects the good and punishes the evildoer with the fourfold system of conciliation, provoking dissensions, giving gifts or bribes, and using force.

Go there and ask him all the questions you want. He will show you what is truly the highest dharma. That Naga is welcoming towards all guests.

He is wise and knows the shastras. He has all the desirable virtues not to be seen in any other. By nature he is always observant of those duties which are performed with or in water.

He is devoted to the study of the Vedas. He is marked by penances and self-restraint. He has great wealth. He performs yagnas and offers dakshina, abstains from inflicting injury and practises forgiveness. His conduct in all respects is exemplary. Truthful in speech and free from malice, his behaviour is righteous and his senses are under control. He eats only after feeding all his guests and attendants.

He is kind of speech. He has knowledge of what is beneficial, and what is simple and right and what is censurable. He takes stock of what he does and what he leaves undone. He never acts with hostility towards anyone. He is always engaged in doing what is beneficial to all creatures. He belongs to a family that is as pure as the water of a lake in the midst of the Ganges.”’”

"Bhishma continues, 'The host replied, "I hear your comforting words with as much gratification as a heavily burdened man feels when his load is taken from his head or shoulders. I am filled with the delight that a traveller who has made a long journey on foot feels when he at last lies down on a bed, that which a man feels when he finds a seat after having stood for a long time, or that which is felt by one who is thirsty when he finds cold water to drink.

On hearing your words, I am suffused with the pleasure felt by a hungry man when he finds tasty food set before him, or that which a guest feels when satisfying food is placed before him at the proper time, or that felt by an old man when he gets a long coveted son, or that which is experienced by one when meeting a dear friend or kinsman about whom one has been anxious.

Like one with upturned gaze I have heard what has fallen from your lips and am reflecting upon their significance. With your wise words you have truly instructed me. Yes, I shall do what you have commanded me to.

You may leave tomorrow at dawn, after passing the night happily with me and dispelling your fatigue by resting. Behold, the rays of the divine Surya have been dimmed and he is setting."'

"Bhishma continues, 'Hospitably waited upon by that Brahmana, the learned guest passed that night in the company of his host. Both talked cheerfully with each other on the subject of the sannyasa dharma. So engrossing was the nature of their conversation that the night passed swiftly.

When morning came, the guest was worshipped with due rites by the Brahmana whose heart was now set upon the accomplishment of what would be beneficial for him, according to the discourse of the guest. The righteous Brahmana, resolved to achieve his purpose, took leave of his kinsmen, and soon set out for the abode of that foremost of Nagas, with his mind steadily directed towards it.'"

"Bhishma says, 'Passing through enchanted forests, lakes and sacred pools, the Brahmana at last arrived at the asrama of a certain sannyasi. On arriving there, he asked the ascetic, in fitting manner, about the Naga of whom he had heard from his guest, and instructed by him he continued on his journey. Focused upon his purpose, the Brahmana arrived at the dwelling of the Naga.

Entering, he announced himself, saying, "Ho! Who is within? I am a Brahmana, come here as a guest."

Hearing him, the virtuous wife of the Naga, of great beauty and devoted to the observance of every dharma, came out. Attentive to the duties of hospitality, she welcomed and revered her guest, and said, 'What can I do for you?'

The Brahmana said, 'I am sufficiently honoured by your gentle words. My weariness has also been dispelled. O blessed devi, I wish to see your husband. This is my goal and the one object of my desire. It is for this that I have come today to the abode of the Naga.'

The wife of the Naga said, 'Revered one, my husband has gone to draw Surya's chariot for a month. Learned Brahmana, he will be back in fifteen days, and will meet you then. I have now told you the reason of my husband's absence. What else can I do for you? Tell me.'

The Brahmana said, 'I have come here to see your husband. I will remain in the nearby forest and await his return. When he comes home, kindly tell him that I have arrived in this place driven by the fervent desire to meet him.

You should also inform me of his return. Devi, until then, I will dwell on the banks of the Gomati, waiting for his return and living upon frugal fare.'

Having said this repeatedly to the wife of the Naga that Brahmana went to the riverbank to live there until the Naga's return.'"

CANTO 357

"Bhishma continues, 'The Nagas of that city were distressed when they saw that Brahmana, devoted to tapasya, continued to live in the forest, entirely abstaining from food, as he waited for the return of the Naga lord. All the kinsmen and relatives of the great Naga, including his brother, children and wife, came together to the Brahmana.

Reaching the banks of the Gomati, they saw him seated in solitude, not eating but engaged in observing vratas and silently reciting certain mantras. Approaching, the Naga's kinsmen and family revered him, and then spoke to him words of simple sincerity.

"O Tapodhana, this is the sixth day since your arrival here but you have not said a word about your food. You are devoted to righteousness. You have come among us. We are here in attendance upon you. It is vital that we should fulfil our duties of hospitality towards you.

We are all kinsmen of our Naga lord whom you wish to see. Roots or fruits, leaves, or water, or rice or meat, you must partake of some food. By your living in this forest and completely abstaining from food, the entire community of Nagas, young and old, does suffer, since this your fast implies negligence on our part to discharge the duties of hospitality and we do not know the reason for it

None amongst us has been guilty of killing a Brahmana. None of us has ever lost a son immediately after birth. No one has been born in our vamsa that has eaten before serving the Devas or atithis or kinsmen coming to his house."

The Brahmana said, "I will break my fast for your entreaties. I will wait eight more days for the lord of the Nagas to return. If he does not come back with the passing of the eighth night, I will break this fast by eating. This vow of abstaining from all food that I am observing is on account of my high regard for the Naga lord.

You should not grieve for what I am doing. Return to your homes. This my vrata is on his account. You should not do anything to mar it."

Thus addressed, the assembled Nagas were dismissed by the Brahmana, and they returned to their homes.'"

CANTO 358

"Bhishma says, 'Upon the expiry of full fifteen days, the Naga Lord Padmanabha, having finished his task of drawing Surya's chariot and taking the sun god's leave, returned home. His wife washed his feet and dutifully discharged other tasks of a similar nature.

She then took her seat by his side. The Naga, refreshed and rested, addressed his wife, saying, "During my absence I trust that you have not been unmindful of worshipping the Devas and atithis in keeping with the instructions I gave you, and according to the laws laid down in the shastras.

I hope that during my absence, without yielding to your impure Buddhi, you have been firm in the observance of the duties of hospitality. I trust you have not transgressed the boundaries of karma and dharma."

The wife of the Naga said, "The duty of sishyas is to wait with reverence upon their guru doing his bidding; that of Brahmanas is to study and memorise the Vedas; that of servants is to obey the commands of their masters; that of the king is to protect his people by defending the good and punishing the evil.

It is said that Kshatriya dharma includes the protection of all creatures from wrong and oppression. The duty of the Sudra is to serve with humility persons of the three higher varnas, Brahmanas, Kshatriyas and Vaisyas.

The dharma of the householder, O my Lord of the Nagas, consists in doing good to all creatures. Frugality of fare and observance of vows in due order constitute punya for men of all classes, because of the connection that exists between the senses and the duties of religion.

Who am I? From where have I come? What are others to me and what am I to others? These are the thoughts to which the mind should ever be directed by him who leads a life which leads to mukti.

Chastity and obedience to the husband constitute the highest dharma of the wife. I have learnt this well through your teaching. I am fully conversant with my kartavya.

I have you, who are devoted to righteousness, for a husband; why then will I, swerving from the path of duty, walk on the path of disobedience and sin? During your absence from home, I have continued to worship the Devas. I have also, without the slightest negligence, attended to the duties of hospitality towards those who arrived as guests in your home.

Fifteen days ago a Brahmana has arrived here. He has not disclosed his purpose to me. He desires to speak with you. Dwelling on the banks of the Gomati he anxiously awaits your return. Of firm vows, that Brahmana sits there, engaged in chanting the Vedas.

Lord of the Nagas, I have given him my word that I will send you to him as soon as you return. Having heard what I have said, it is fitting for you to go to him. You who hear with your eyes, you must grant that Dvija whatever has brought him here!”””

"Bhishma continues, 'The Naga said, "O you of delightful smiles, what have you taken that Brahmana for? Is he really a human being or is he some god that has come here in the guise of a Brahmana? Who is there among humans that would want to see me and be fit to meet me?

Can a Manava who wishes to see me dare leave a command with you to send me to him? Among the Devas and Asuras and Devarishis, the Nagas are endowed with great tejas.

Nagas are swift and fragrant. They deserve to be revered for they can grant boons. Indeed, we too, are worthy of our followers. We cannot be seen by men."

The wife said, "Judging by his simplicity and openness I know that this Brahmana is not any Deva who lives on air. I also know that he reveres you with all his heart. His heart is set upon the accomplishment of some goal that depends on your help.

As the chataka waits eagerly for rain to quench its thirst, even so does that Brahmana keenly wait to meet you. Let no misfortune befall him on account of his failure to see you. No one born into an honourable family as you are can be considered worthy of honour if he neglects a guest arrived at his house.

Discard that anger that is so innate in you and go and meet the Brahmana. It befits you not to be consumed by sin through disappointing the Dvija. By refusing to wipe the tears of one who has come to him with hopes of succour, even a king incurs the sin of foeticide.

By abstaining from speech one attains wisdom. By giving generous dakshina one acquires great fame. By being truthful in speech, one acquires the gift of eloquence and is honoured in swarga. By giving away land one attains to that high end which is ordained for Rishis living in sannyasa.

By earning wealth through righteous means one attains many desirable rewards. By doing what is beneficial to oneself, one avoids going to naraka. That is what the wise say."

The Naga said, "I had no arrogance caused by conceit. However, because of my birth, my arrogance was once great but no more. Of wrath born of desire, I have none. It has all been destroyed by the fire of your profound instructions.

I do not consider any darkness to be more impenetrable than anger. As the Nagas have a surfeit of anger, they have become objects of reproach with all men. By succumbing to the influence of wrath, the ten-headed Ravana became the rival of Sakra, and for that reason was killed by Rama in battle.

Hearing that Rama of Bhrigu's vamsa had entered the inner rooms of their palace to take away their father's calf of the Homa cow, the sons of Kartavirya yielding to anger deeming it an insult to their royal house, and they met with destruction at the hands of Rama. Indeed, Kartavirya, who was like the thousand-eyed Indra himself, was slain in battle by Rama of Jamadagni's vamsa because he yielded to anger.

And so, my beloved wife, I have heeded your words and have curbed my fury, that enemy of tapasya that destroys all that is good. I am fortunate to have you for my wife, you who possess every virtue and have inexhaustible merits.

I will go at once to the Brahmana. I will address him in a respectful manner and he will leave only when his wishes have been fulfilled."""

CANTO 360

"Bhishma says, 'Having said these words to his wife, the lord of the Nagas went to that place where the Brahmana sat awaiting him. As he went, the Naga thought of the Brahmana and wondered about what had brought him to the Naga city.

When he arrived in the Brahmana's presence, that righteous Naga addressed his guest in sweet words, "O Brahmana, do not be angry for I come to you in peace. What has brought you here? What is your purpose? Dvijottama, whom do you worship in this secluded place on the banks of the Gomati?"

The Brahmana said, "Know that my name is Dharmaranya, and that I have come here to see the Naga Padmanabha. I have some work with him. I have heard that he is not at home and so I sit here waiting for him to return.

Like a chataka waiting in expectation of the clouds, I am waiting for him whom I esteem highly. To dispel all evil from him and bring about what is beneficial to him, I am engaged in reciting the Vedas until he comes, and I am engaged in yoga and pass my time blissfully."

The Naga said, "Your behaviour is upright. You are pious and devoted to the good of all righteous persons. Blessed Brahmana, every praise is due to you.

You behold the Naga with a loving gaze. Learned Rishi, I am that Naga whom you seek. Command me as you wish, tell me what is agreeable to you and what I can do for you. Having heard from my wife that you are here, I have come to meet you.

You have come here, and you are certain to return with your desire fulfilled. Use me for any task with full confidence. We are all in your service on account of your punya, for you have disregarded your own good and have spent your time in seeking our welfare."

The Brahmana said, "Most blessed Naga, I have come here driven by the desire to see you. I am ignorant, and I have come here to ask you something. I wish to attain to the Paramatman, the Supreme Soul that is the end of the Jivatman. I am neither attached to nor detached from samsara.

You shine with the effulgence of your punya with a radiance that is as enchanting as the moon's. You who live on air alone, first answer this question of mine. Afterwards, I will reveal to you the object of my visit!"""

"Bhishma continues, 'The Brahmana said, "You have been away to draw the single-wheeled chariot of Surya. Describe to me anything wonderful that you may have seen in those realms through which you journeyed."

The Naga said, "The divine Surya is the refuge of innumerable wonders. All the creatures that inhabit the three worlds have flowed from him. Countless Munis crowned with ascetic success, together with all the Devas, dwell in the rays of Surya like birds perching on the branches of trees.

What, again, can be more wonderful than this that the mighty Vayu, issuing from Surya, takes refuge in his rays and courses over the universe? What can be more wonderful than this that Surya, dividing Vayu into many parts to do good to all creatures, creates the rain that falls in the monsoon?

What can be more wonderful than this that the Paramatman, himself bathed in blazing effulgence, looks out upon the universe from within the solar orb? What can be more wonderful than this that Surya has a dark ray which transforms itself into clouds charged with rain and pours down that rain when the season comes?

What can be more wonderful than this that after absorbing water for eight months, he pours it down once again in the monsoon? The soul of the universe is said to dwell in certain rays of Surya. From him comes the seed of all things, and it is he that upholds the earth with all her mobile and immobile creatures.

Brahmana, what can be more wonderful than this that the foremost of Purushas, eternal, powerful and effulgent, and without beginning and without end, dwells in Surya? Listen to one more thing that I will now tell you. It is the most marvellous wonder. I have seen it in the clear sky, from having been close to Surya.

One day, at the hour of noon, while Surya was shining in all his glory and emanating heat we saw a Being come towards him, who seemed to shine with a brilliance equal to that of Surya himself. Causing all the worlds to blaze up with his glory and filling them with his energy, he came towards Surya, rending the sky, as it were, to make his path through it.

The rays of his body seemed to resemble the blazing radiance of libations of ghee poured into the sacrificial fire. His splendour did not allow anyone to look directly at him. His form was indescribable. Indeed, he did appear to us to be a second Surya.

As soon as he was near, Surya extended his two hands receiving him respectfully. To honour Surya in return, he also extended his right hand. Piercing through the sky, he entered into Surya's disc. Merging with Surya's energy, he seemed to be transformed into Surya's self.

When the two blinding energies thus united, we were so bewildered that we could not distinguish between them. We could not make out who was Surya we bore on his chariot, and who was the Being we had seen coming through the sky. Confused, we addressed Surya, saying, 'Illustrious One, who is this Being that has united himself with you and has been transformed into your second self?'""

"Bhishma says, 'The Naga continued, "Surya said, 'This Being is not Agni, and he is not an Asura. Nor is he a Naga. He is a Brahmana who has attained swarga because he has succeeded in observing the Unccha vrata.

This person had lived only upon fruits and roots and the fallen leaves of trees. He sometimes subsisted upon water, and sometimes upon air alone, passing his days in dhyana. Siva Mahadeva was gratified by his constant recitation of the Samhitas.

He had tried to accomplish those deeds that lead to heaven and bliss. Through their punya he has now attained swarga. Without wealth and without any desire, he kept the Unccha vrata to sustain himself. This learned Brahmana had been devoted to the good of all creatures.

Neither Devas nor Gandharvas, neither Asuras nor Nagas can be regarded as superior to those creatures that are merged into Surya. Such was the most wondrous incident I saw on high. That Brahmana, who was crowned with success by the observance of the Unccha vrata, continues, even to this day, to circle the earth, remaining within the body of the incandescent Surya Deva!'"'""

"Bhishma continues, 'The Brahmana said, "Naga, this is indeed marvellous and I am gratified by listening to you. With your words, subtle in their meaning, you have shown me the way I must follow. I wish to leave now; remember me occasionally and enquire after me by sending your servant."

The Naga said, "You have not yet revealed to me the reason that brought you here. Where will you go? Tell me, Dvija, what I can do for you, and what is it that brought you here?

After you have accomplished your task, whatever it may be, revealed or hidden in speech, you may take my leave, and I will let you go cheerfully. You have conceived a friendship for me.

O Rishi, sitting under the shade of this tree, do not leave so soon after merely seeing me. Certainly, you have become dear to me and I to you. All the inhabitants of this city are yours. What objection could you have to passing some time in my home?"

The Brahmana said, "You are wise, Naga, and have acquired a knowledge of the Atman. It is true that the Devas are not superior to you in any respect. He that is you is also me, as he that is me is truly you. You, I and all other creatures will all have to enter into the Paramatman.

Doubt had seized my mind, king of Nagas, with regard to the best means to win punya. What you said has dispelled that doubt, for I have learnt the value of the Unccha vrata. I will now practise that most efficacious vow and attain to my goal.

I am certain of this now and I take your leave. Blessings be upon you. O Naga, my objective has been achieved."'

CANTO 364

"Bhishma says, 'Having saluted that foremost of Nagas, and having firmly resolved to follow the Unccha way of life, Dharmaranya went to Chyavana of Bhrigu's vamsa, to seek formal instruction and to be initiated in that lofty and recondite vrata. Chyavana performed the samskara rites of the Brahmana and formally initiated him into the Unccha way of life.

Rajan, the son of Bhrigu recited this history to King Janaka in his palace. King Janaka, in his turn, narrated it to Devarishi Narada. Finding himself in the palace of Indra one day, Narada instructed Indra in this itihasa upon being asked by him.

Indra, having obtained it from Narada, recited this blessed history to an assembly of all the foremost Brahmanas. When I encountered Rama of Bhrigu's vamsa on Kurukshetra, the celestial Vasus narrated it to me.

Since you asked me, I have recited this history that is sacred and filled with great merit. You asked me what constitutes the highest dharma, Rajan. This itihasa is my answer to your question.

A brave man he was that practised the Unccha vrata in this way, without expectation of any reward. Instructed by Padmanabha, the Naga king about his dharma, that Brahmana Dharmaranya began the practice of Yama and Niyama; he lived only on such food as was allowed by the Unccha vow, and went away to another forest.'"

PART I

Anusasana Parva

CANTO 1

AUM! HAVING BOWED down to Narayana, and Nara the most exalted of Purushas, and also the Devi Saraswati, I invoke the spirit of Jaya!

Vaisampayana said, "Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, serenity is said to be subtle and of diverse forms. Despite listening to all your discourses, I have not achieved this tranquillity. You have spoken of many ways of stilling the mind, but how can actual peace of mind be had from mere knowledge of the various kinds of peace, when I myself am the means of realising this?

Seeing your body covered with arrows and festering with wounds, I cannot find any peace at the thought of the evil I have brought about. Great Kshatriya, seeing your body drenched in blood, like a mountain overrun with water from its springs, I suffer like a lotus in the rains.

What can be more agonising than this, that you, O Pitamaha, have been reduced to this plight because of me and my allies fighting our enemies on this Kurukshetra? Other princes also, with their sons and kinsmen, have been destroyed on my account. What can be more painful than this!

Pitamaha, tell us what is our destiny and that of the sons of Dhritarashtra, who, driven by fate and anger, have acted in this terrible manner? Master of men, I think Duryodhana fortunate that he does not see you like this. But I, who am the cause of your death as well as of that of our friends, am denied all peace of mind seeing you fallen on the bare earth in this wretched condition.

Evil Duryodhana, the most infamous of his vamsa, with all his forces and his brothers, has perished in battle, observing his Kshatriya dharma. That malevolent one does not see you lying on your cruel bed. And for this

I regard death as being preferable to life. Virtuous Kshatriya, if only I along with my brothers had been killed by our enemies on Kurukshetra, I would not see you like this, fallen and pierced with arrows. Surely, we were born to become perpetrators of evil deeds. Pitamaha, if your wish me well, instruct me so that my sins may be washed away at least in the next world.'

Bhishma replies, 'Fortunate one, why do you consider your Soul, which is dependent on God and destiny and time, to be the cause of your actions? Its inaction is subtle and imperceptible to the senses. Listen, in this regard to the ancient story of the conversation between Mrityu and Gautami with Kaala and the hunter and the serpent.

There was once an old woman called Gautami who was patient and tranquil. One day she found her son lying dead having been bitten by a snake. An angry hunter, Arjunaka, bound the snake with a rope and brought it before Gautami.

He said to her, "This wretched serpent caused your son's death. Tell me quickly how I should killed it. Shall I throw it into the fire or hack it into pieces? This killer of a child does not deserve to live."

Gautami replied, "Arjunaka of little understanding, release this serpent. It does not deserve death at your hands. Who is so foolish as to ignore inevitable destiny and burden himself with such folly to sink into sin?

Those who are virtuous manage to cross samsara as a ship crosses the ocean. But those who make themselves heavy with sin sink to the bottom, like an arrow shot into the water.

By killing the serpent, my son will not be restored to life, and by letting it live, no harm will come to you. Who would go to the realm of Yama by killing this living creature?"

The hunter said, "I know you know the difference between right and wrong, and that the great suffer the pain of all creatures. But these your words are filled with instruction for only a serene person and not for one plunged into sorrow. Therefore, I must kill this snake.

Those who value peace of mind assign the cause of everything to the passage of Kaala, but practical men assuage their grief with revenge. Through constant delusion, men fear the loss of grace in the next world for acts like these. Allay your grief by allowing me to kill this serpent."

Gautami replied, "People like us are never afflicted by such misfortune. Good men are always intent on virtue. The death of the boy was predestined; I cannot approve of your killing this snake. Brahmanas do not harbour resentment, because resentment leads to pain. Good hunter, forgive this serpent and release him out of compassion."

The hunter replied, "Let us earn great and inexhaustible punya hereafter by killing this creature, even as a man acquires great merit, and also confers it on his victim sacrificed upon the vedi. Punya is acquired by killing an enemy: by killing this despicable creature, you will acquire true merit in the hereafter."

Gautami replied, "What good is there in tormenting and killing an enemy, and what good is won by not releasing an enemy in our power? You of benign countenance, why should we not forgive this serpent and try to earn punya by releasing it?"

The hunter replied, "Many creatures ought to be protected from the evil of this one, instead of this single creature being spared. Virtuous men abandon the vicious to their doom; therefore, kill this evil snake."

Gautami replied, "By killing this serpent my son will not be restored to life, nor do I see that any other end will be attained by its death. Hunter, release this living creature."

The hunter said, "By killing Vritra, Indra secured the best part of the havis, and by destroying a yagna Siva secured his share of sacrificial offerings. You must destroy this snake immediately without any misgivings!"'

Bhishma continues, 'Though repeatedly incited by the hunter to kill the snake, Gautami was not swayed to that sin. Bound with the rope, the serpent wriggled and groaned in pain but then, finding its composure spoke slowly in a human voice.

The serpent said, "O foolish Arjunaka, what fault is mine? I have no independent will of my own. Mrityu sent me for this task. Directed by him I bit this child, not out of any anger or choice on my part. If there be any sin in this, it is Mrityu's."

The hunter said, "If you have been led by another to do this evil deed, the sin is yours also for you are the instrument in the act. As in the making of an earthen vessel the potter's wheel and axle are regarded as causes, so are you the cause that has produced this effect. He that is guilty deserves death at my hands. Serpent, you are guilty. Indeed, you have yourself confessed to it!"

The serpent said, "As all these, the potter's wheel and rod are not independent causes, even so I am not an independent cause. Therefore, you should concede that this is no fault of mine. If you think otherwise, then these are to be considered as causes working in unison with one another.

Working with one other, a doubt arises regarding their relation as cause and effect. This being the case, it is no fault of mine, nor do I deserve death on this account, nor am I guilty of any sin. Or, if you think that even in such causation there is sin, the sin lies in the aggregate of causes."

The hunter said, "Even if you are neither the prime cause nor the agent in this matter, you are still the cause of this child's death. And so you do deserve death. If you think that when an evil deed is done, the doer is not implicated in it, then there can be no cause in this matter; but having done this, you certainly deserve to die. What else do you think?"

The serpent said, "Whether any cause exists or not, no effect is produced without an intermediate act. Therefore, causation being of no moment in either case, only my agency as the cause ought to be considered in its proper context. If you truly think me to be the cause, then the guilt of this act of killing a living being rests on the shoulders of another who incited me."

The hunter said, "Wretch, you do not deserve to live; why do you rant so much? You deserve death at my hands. You have done a terrible thing by killing this child."

The serpent said, "Hunter, as the Brahmanas presiding at a yagna do not acquire the merit of their actions by making offerings of ghee into the fire, so should I be viewed with regard to the outcome in this matter."'

Bhishma continues, 'After this, Mrityu, who had sent the snake, himself appeared there and spoke to the creature.

Mrityu said, "Guided by Kaala, O serpent, I sent you to this task, but neither you nor I is the cause of this child's death. As the clouds are tossed in all directions by the wind, I, like the clouds, am influenced by Kaala. All deeds pertaining to sattva, rajas or tamas are goaded by Kaala, in all creatures.

All creatures, mobile and immobile, in heaven and on earth, are influenced by Kaala. The whole universe is imbued with this influence of time. All actions in this world and all abstentions, as also all their modifications, are provoked by Kaala.

Surya, Soma, Vishnu, Jala, Vayu, Agni, Varuna, Bhumi, Mitra and Parjanya, Aditi and the Vasus, rivers and oceans, all existent and non-existent objects, are created and destroyed by Kaala. Knowing this, why do you, O serpent, consider me to be guilty? If any fault attaches to me, then you, too, are to be blamed."

The serpent said, "Mrityu, I do not blame you, nor do I absolve you from all blame. I only insist that I am directed and influenced by you in my actions. If any blame attaches to Kaala, or it does not, is not for me to decide. We have no right to do so. Just as I want to absolve myself of this charge, so is it my duty to see that no blame attaches to Mrityu."

The serpent then said to Arjunaka, "You have listened to what Mrityu has said. Since I am innocent it is not right that you bind me with this rope and torment me." The hunter said, "I have listened to you and to Mrityu, but these words, serpent, do not absolve you from all blame. Mrityu and you are the causes of the child's death. I consider both of you to be the cause and you truly are that cause. Cursed be the evil and vengeful Mrityu that brings affliction to the innocent and the good. And you who are guilty of sinful deeds, I shall kill you too!"

Mrityu said, "We are both not free agents, but are dependent on Kaala, and ordained to do our appointed work. If you think carefully about this, you will not find fault with us."

The hunter said, "If both Mrityu and you are dependent on Kaala, I am curious to know how pleasure, arising from doing good, and anger, arising from doing evil, are caused."

Mrityu said, "Everything is done under the influence of Kaala. Kaala is the cause of all, and that for this reason we both, acting under Kaala's command, do our appointed work; hence we do not deserve to be censured by you in any way!"'

Bhishma continues, 'Then Kaala arrived at that place where the serpent and Mrityu and Arjunaka were disputing this point of dharma and spoke to them.

Kaala said, "Hunter, neither Mrityu nor this serpent nor I are guilty of the death of any creature. We are merely the immediate causes of the event. Arjunaka, the karma of this very child is the existing cause of our action. There is no other cause of this child's death. It was killed as a result of its own karma.

It has met with death as the result of its karma of the past. Its own karma has been the cause of its dying. We all are subject to the influence of our respective karma. Karma is a means to salvation even as sons are, and karma also is an indicator of virtue and vice in man. We incite one another even as acts provoke one another.

As men make what they wish from a lump of clay, even so do they achieve the results determined by karma. As light and shadow are related to each other, so are men related to karma through their own actions. Therefore, neither you nor I, neither Mrityu nor the serpent, nor this old Brahmana woman is the cause of this child's death. He himself is the cause."

When Kaala expounded the matter in this way, Gautami, convinced that men suffer according to their deeds, said to Arjunaka, "Neither Kaala nor Mrityu, nor the serpent is the cause. This child met with death as the result of its own karma. That my son has died is also the consequence of my past actions. Let Kaala and Mrityu now leave this place, and Arjunaka, you must release this snake."'

Bhishma continues, 'Then Kaala and Mrityu and the serpent went back to their respective abodes, and Gautami and the hunter were pacified. Rajan, having heard this, put aside all grief, and find peace of mind.

Men attain swarga or naraka as the result of their own karma. This evil is neither your creation nor Duryodhana's. Know this that these lords of earth have all been slain in this war as a result of the actions of Kaala.'"

Vaisampayana said, "Having heard all this, Yudhishtira was appeased, and asks his next question."

"Yudhishtira says, 'Wisest Pitamaha, you are learned in all the shastras, and I have listened to this mahakatha. I want now to hear some story full of religious instruction, and you must satisfy my craving. Tell me if any grihasta has ever succeeded in conquering Mrityu through the practice of dharma.'

Bhishma says, 'This ancient story is told to illustrate the subject of a grihasta's victory over Mrityu through the practice of virtue. Prajapati Manu had a son called Ikshvaku. Illustrious as Surya, a hundred sons were born to him.

His tenth son was named Dasaswa, and this virtuous prince of infallible prowess became the king of Mahismati. Dasaswa's son was a righteous ruler who was devoted to the practice of truth, devotion and benevolence. He was known as Madiraswa and ruled over the earth as her lord. He was devoted to the study of the Vedas and of the science of arms. Madiraswa's son was King Dyutimat who had great fortune and power, strength and energy. Dyutimat's son was the devout and pious king famed in all the worlds as Suvira. His soul was dedicated to dharma and he possessed wealth like another Indra.

Suvira, too, had a son who was invincible in battle; known by the name Sudurjaya, he was the best of all warriors. And Durjaya, too, possessed of a body like that of Indra, and had a son who radiated the splendour of Agni. He was the great King Duryodhana who was among the foremost of royal sages. Indra would send down timely and ample rain into the kingdom of this king who was brave and heroic as Vasava himself.

His cities and all his lands overflowed with wealth and jewels, and cows and grain. There was no miser in his kingdom nor any person afflicted by suffering or poverty. Nor was there in his kingdom any person who had a weak or sickly body.

Duryodhana was intelligent and skilled, eloquent in speech, without envy, a master of his passions, of a righteous soul, full of compassion, and humble. He performed sacrifices, and was self-restrained, devoted to Brahmanas and truth. He never humiliated others, was charitable, and learned in the Vedas and the Vedanta.

The celestial river Narmada, auspicious and sacred and of cool waters came embodied and courted him. She gave birth to a lotus-eyed daughter named Sudarsana. Yudhishtira, no woman had ever borne such a beautiful child as the daughter of Duryodhana.

Agni himself courted the exquisite princess Sudarsana, and coming as a Brahmana, sought her hand from the king. The king was unwilling to give his daughter in marriage to the Brahmana, who was poor and not of the same status as himself. Thereupon Agni disappeared from his mahayagna.

The sorrowful king said to the Brahmanas, "What sin have I or you, excellent Brahmanas, been guilty of that Agni should disappear from this yagna, as good done to sinful men vanishes from their estimation. Our sin must be great for Agni to thus disappear. Either the sin must be yours or mine. Do you fully examine the reason for this."

The Brahmanas silently concentrated their minds on seeking the protection of the god of fire. Agni, resplendent as the autumnal sun, appeared before them, enveloped in glorious radiance.

Agni said to the Brahmanas, "I seek the daughter of Duryodhana for myself."

Those Brahmanas were astounded, and the next day they told the king what Agni had said. The wise ruler was delighted and said, "Let it be so!"

The king asked the fire god for a boon, "You, O Agni, remain here with us always."

"Tathaastu," said the divine Agni to that Lord of the earth. For this reason, to this very day, Agni has always been present in the kingdom of Mahishmati and was seen by Sahadeva in course of his southern conquests.

King Duryodhana gave his daughter, dressed in new clothes and decked with jewels, to the Mahatman Deva, and Agni too, accepted, according to Vedic rites, the princess Sudarsana as his bride, even as he accepts libations of ghee at yagnas. Agni was well pleased with her appearance, her beauty, grace, character and nobility of birth, and was eager to beget offspring upon her.

And a son by Agni was soon born to her. Also named Sudarsana, he, too, was as handsome as the full moon, and even in his childhood he attained to a knowledge of the supreme and everlasting Brahman.

There was another king called Oghavat, who was the grandfather of Nriga. He had a daughter named Oghavati, and a son by the name of Ogharatha. King Oghavat gave his daughter Oghavati, with goddess-like beauty, to the learned Sudarsana for his wife. Sudarsana lived the life of a grihasta with her in Kurukshetra. He took a vow to conquer Mrityu even while leading the life of a householder.

Sudarsana said to Oghavati, "You never act contrary to the wishes of those that seek our hospitality. You should not have any misgivings about the means by which guests are to be welcomed, even if you have to offer your own person to an atithi. Beautiful one, this vrata must always be remembered, since there is no higher virtue for grihastas than hospitality accorded to guests.

If my words carry any authority with you, always bear this in mind without ever doubting it. Sinless and blessed one, if you have any faith in me, you must never disregard a guest whether I am at your side or far away!"

With hands folded and placed on her head, Oghavati replied, "I will do everything that you have commanded."

Mrityu, wanting to trick Sudarsana, began to watch him to discover his lapses. Once, when the son of Agni went out to collect firewood from the forest, a handsome Brahmana sought the hospitality of Oghavati saying, "O beautiful devi, if you have any you faith in the virtue of hospitality as laid down for householders, then I ask you to extend that hospitality to me today."

Oghavati welcomed him according to the rites prescribed in the Vedas. Having offered him a seat, and water to wash his feet, she asked, "What is your wish? What can I offer you?"

The Brahmana said to her, "I desire you. Give yourself to me without any hesitation in your mind. If the duties established for grihastas are acceptable to you, gratify me."

Though tempted by Oghavati with offers of other gifts, the Brahmana refused to accept any dakshina other than the offer of her own person. Seeing his resolve, and remembering her husband's instructions, although overcome with shame, she said to the Brahmana, "Let it be so."

Remembering the words of her husband who wished to attain the virtue of grihastas, she calmly approached the visiting Rishi. Meanwhile, having collected his firewood, the son of Agni returned home. The fierce and inexorable Mrityu was constantly by his side, as one attending upon a devoted friend.

Reaching his asrama, Sudarsana called out to Oghavati repeatedly, and receiving no answer, exclaimed, "Where have you gone?" Locked in the Brahmana's embrace, the chaste woman, devoted to her husband, did not reply. Indeed, that virtuous woman, regarding herself defiled, was overcome with shame and remained silent.

Sudarsana again exclaimed, "Where can my faithful wife be? Where has she gone? Nothing can be of greater importance to me than her. Why does my simple and dutiful wife not answer my call today with sweet smiles as she has always done?"

Then that Brahmana, who was within the hut, replied to Sudarsana, "Son of Pavaka, know that a Brahmana guest has arrived, and though tempted by your wife with many offers of welcome I desired only her person, and the beautiful woman is engaged in satisfying me. You are free to do whatever you think to be appropriate."

Mrityu, armed with his iron mace, pursued the Rishi at that moment, wanting to destroy him who would, he thought, deviate from his promise. Sudarsana was astonished, but discarding all jealousy and anger of gaze, word, deed or thought, said, "Enjoy yourself, Brahmana. It gives me great pleasure. A grihasta gains the highest punya by honouring a guest.

The wise say that there is no higher merit for a householder than what accrues to him from a guest departing from his house after having been duly honoured. My life, my wife, and my other worldly possessions are all dedicated for the use of my guests.

This is the vow I have taken. With this I will attain to the knowledge of the Atman. The five elements of fire, air, earth, water and sky, and the mind, the intellect and the soul, and time and space, and the ten organs of sense, all exist in the bodies of men, and always witness the good and evil deeds that men do.

I have uttered this truth today, and let the gods bless me for it, or destroy me if I have spoken falsely.” At this, Bhaarata, a voice arose in all directions, in repeated echoes, crying: This is true, this is not false.

Then the Brahmana came out of the hut and, like the wind rising and encompassing both earth and sky, and making the three worlds echo with Veda nadam, called out to that virtuous man by name and praised him saying, “Sinless one, I am Dharma. All glory to you. I came here to test you, and I am pleased to know that you are virtuous.

You have subdued and conquered Mrityu, who always pursued you, seeking your lapses. No one in the three worlds has the ability to insult this chaste woman, devoted to her husband, even with looks, far less to touch her person. She has been protected from defilement by your virtue and by her own purity.

There can be nothing contrary to what this honourable woman will say. Imbued with austere tapasya, she will metamorphose into a mighty river for the salvation of the world. And you will attain to all the worlds in this your body, and, as truly as the vigyana of yoga is within her control, this blessed woman will follow you with only half of her earthly self, and with the other half she will be celebrated as the river Oghavati!

And along with her, you will attain all the worlds that are acquired through penances; and even in your gross body you will attain those eternal and everlasting worlds from which no one returns. You have conquered Mrityu, and attained to the highest of all felicities, and with your own power of mind, with the speed of thought, you have risen above the power of the five elements!

By thus cleaving to the duties of a grihasta, you have subdued your passions, desires and anger, and Oghavati by serving you has conquered affliction, desire, illusion, enmity and lassitude!”’

Bhishma continues, ‘Riding a fine chariot drawn by a thousand white horses, the glorious Vasava then approached that Brahmana. Mrityu and Yama, all the worlds, all the elements, Buddhi, Manas, Kaala and Akasa, as also kama and krodha were all conquered. And so, bear this in mind that to a householder there is no higher divinity than the guest.

It is said by sages that the blessings of an honoured guest are more valuable than the merit of a hundred yagnas. Whenever a deserving guest seeks the hospitality of a householder and is not honoured by him, he takes away with him all the virtues of the grihasta and leaves behind his sins.

I have now told you this ancient story about Mrityu was defeated by a grihasta. This narration confers glory, fame and a long life upon those who listen to it. The man that seeks worldly prosperity should consider it useful for removing every evil.

Bhaarata, he who recites this story of the life of Sudarsana every day attains the realms of the blessed.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Rajan, if Brahmanatva is so difficult to attain by Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras, how did the high-souled Viswamitra, though a Kshatriya by birth, become a Brahmarishi? I want to know this. I beg you, tell me all about it.

With his tapasya shakti, Viswamitra instantly annihilated the hundred sons of the Mahatman Vasishta. Under the influence of his rage, he created countless mighty Rakshasas who resembled the great destroyer Kaala himself.

He established the great and learned Kusika vamsa, numbering hundreds of regenerate sages praised by all Brahmanas. Sunashepa of austere penances, the son of Richika, was to be sacrificed as a yagnapasu in the Ambarisha mahayagna, but found deliverance through the grace of Viswamitra.

Having pleased the gods at a sacrifice, Harishchandra became a son of the wise Viswamitra. For not honouring their eldest brother Devarata, whom Viswamitra got as a son from the Devas, his other fifty brothers were cursed by their father, and all of them became Chandalas.

Trisanku, the son of Ikshvaku, also became a Chandala through the curse of Vasishta; when he was abandoned by his friends and remained suspended head down in the sky it was Viswamitra who sent him up into swarga. Kaushika, the sacred and most auspicious river of Viswamitra, was frequented by Devarishis, Devas and Rishis.

For disturbing his devotions, the famed Apsara Rambha was cursed and turned into a rock. In olden times, fearing Viswamitra, the glorious Vasishta bound himself with creepers and threw himself into a river, but he rose up released from his bonds. Because of this, that mighty and holy river became celebrated by the name Vipasa.

Viswamitra prayed to the glorious and puissant Indra who, gratified by him, released him from a curse. Remaining in the northern sky, he sheds his lustre from a position in the midst of the Saptarishi and Dhruva, the son of Uttanapada. These, among others, are his achievements.

Descendant of Kuru, as all these were performed by a Kshatriya, my curiosity has been roused. So do I ask you to explain this to me truly. Without casting off his body and taking on another, how could Viswamitra become a Brahmana?

Pitamaha, tell me about this just as you narrated to the story of Matanga. Matanga was born as a Chandala, and, despite all his tapasya, could not become a Brahmana; so how could this Kaushika become a Brahmarishi?'"

CANTO 4

"Bhishma says, 'Listen truly in detail as to how in olden times Viswamitra attained the status of a Brahmana Rishi.

In the Bharata vamsa there was a king named Ajamida, who performed many yagnas and was a virtuous man. His son was the great King Jahnu. Ganga was the daughter of this righteous Kshatriya. The famed and equally virtuous Sindhudwipa was the son of this prince.

From Sindhudwipa sprang the great Rajarishi Balakaswa. His son was named Vallabha and was like a second Dharma. His son was Kusika who had radiant glory like the thousand-eyed Indra. Kusika's son was the illustrious King Gadhi who, being childless and wanting to have a son, went into the forest.

Whilst living there, a daughter was born to him. She was called Satyavati, and in beauty she had no equal on earth. The illustrious son of Chyavana, celebrated by the name of Richika, of the Bhrigu vamsa, of austere penances, sought the hand of this woman to be his wife. Gadhi, thinking him to be poor, did not give her in marriage to Richika.

But when the latter, thus dismissed, was leaving, the king said to him, "If your give me a marriage dowry you will you have my daughter for your wife."

Richika said, "Rajan, what dowry can I offer you for the hand of your daughter? Tell me truly, without feeling any hesitation."

Gadhi said, "Descendant of Bhrigu, give me a thousand horses as swift as the wind, with the colour of moonlight, and each having one ear black."'

Bhishma said, 'That mighty son of Chyavana, who was the foremost of Bhrigu's race, entreated Varuna, the son of Aditi, who was the lord of all the waters, “Best of Devas, I pray to you to give me a thousand horses, all swift as the wind, with a complexion as luminous as the moon’s, but each having one black ear.” Varuna said to Richika, “Be it so. Wherever you are, the horses will appear before you.”

As soon as Richika thought of them, there arose from the waters of the Ganga a thousand high-mettled horses, as lustrous as the moon. Not far from Kanyakubja, the sacred bank of Ganga is still famed among men as Aswatirtha because of the appearance of those horses at that place.

The delighted Richika, that best of sannyasis, gave those thousand excellent horses to Gadhi as the marriage offering. King Gadhi was filled with wonder and, fearing that he would be cursed, gave his daughter, decked with jewels, to that son of Bhrigu. And he accepted her hand in marriage according to the prescribed rites.

The princess, too, was pleased becoming the wife of that Brahmana. That foremost of Rishis was happy with her conduct and expressed a wish to grant her a boon. She related this to her mother.

The mother said to her unassuming daughter who stood before her, “My daughter, it is fitting for you to secure a favour for me also from your husband. That sage of austere tapasya has the power to grant me a boon: the birth of a son.”

Returning to her husband, the princess told him what her mother had asked for. Richika said, “By my favour, blessed one, she will soon give birth to a virtuous son. From you, too, there will be born a mighty and glorious son who, full of dharma, shall perpetuate my vasma. Truly do I say this to you!

When you two shall bathe in your fertile season, she should embrace a pipal tree, and you should likewise embrace a ficus tree, and by doing so you will attain the object of your desire. Both she and you will partake of these two portions of charu, along with mantras, and then you will have your sons.”

Satyavati was delighted and told her mother all that Richika had said and also about the two balls of charu. Then the mother said to her daughter Satyavati, “Daughter, as I deserve greater consideration from you than from your husband, you must do as I say.

You must give me the charu which your husband has given you and take the one that has was meant for me. O joyful and pure daughter, if you have any respect for me, let us exchange the trees designated for us.

Everyone desires to possess an excellent and stainless being for his own son. The glorious Richika, too, must have acted from a similar motive, as will be revealed later. For this reason, my heart inclines towards your charu, and your tree, and you too, must consider how to secure an exceptional brother for yourself."

The mother and the daughter Satyavati pursued this plan and both conceived their children, Yudhishtira. And that great Rishi was happy to find his wife pregnant, but he said to her, "Devi, you have not you done well in exchanging the charu as will soon become apparent. It is also clear that you have exchanged the trees.

Know that I infused your charu with Brahmatejas and Kshatriya energy in the charu of your mother. I intended that you would give birth to a Brahmana whose virtues would be famed throughout the three worlds, and that your mother would give birth to a redoubtable Kshatriya.

But now you have reversed the charu, and your mother will give birth to a splendid Brahmana and you will bring forth a fierce Kshatriya. You have not done well by acting out of love for your mother."

Hearing this, Satyavati was grief-stricken and fell to the ground like a beautiful creeper cut in two. When she regained her senses, she bowed her head before her lord and said, "Dvija, you who know Brahman, take pity on me, your wife, who pleads with you so that a Kshatriya son may not be born to me. Let my grandson be the one to be famous for his terrible achievements, but not my son. I beg you, do this for me."

"So be it," said Richika to his wife and she gave birth to a blessed son named Jamadagni. Her mother, the celebrated wife of Gadhi, gave birth to the Rishi Viswamitra, knower of Brahmatva.

The devout Viswamitra, though a Kshatriya, attained to the status of a Brahmarishi and became the founder of a vamsa of Brahmanas. His sons became high-souled progenitors of many races of Brahmanas who were devoted to austere penances, were learned in the Vedas, and founders of many clans.

The adorable Madhuchchanda and the mighty Devarata, Akshina, Sakunta, Babhru, Kaala patha, the celebrated Yajnavalkya, Sthula of strict vratas, Uluka, Mudgala, and the sage Saindhavayana, the illustrious Valgujangha and the great Rishi Galeva, Ruchi, the celebrated Vajra, as also Salankayana, Liladhya and Narada, the one known as Kurchamuka, and Bahuli, and Mushala were all sons of Viswamitra.

So also were Vakshogriva, Anghrika, Naikadrik, Silayupa, Sita, Suchi, Chakraka, Marrutantavya, Vataghna, Aswalayana, Syamayana, Gargya and Javali, as also Susruta, Karishi, Sangsrutya, Para Paurava and Tantu.

The Maharishi Kapila, Tarakayana, Upagahana, Asurayani, Margama, Hiranyksha, Janghari, Bhavravayani, and Suti, Vibhuti, Suta, Surakrit, Arani, Nachika, Champeya, Ujjayana, Navatantu, Vakanakha, Sayanya, Yati, Ambhoruha, Amatsyasin, Srishin, Gardhavi Urjjayoni, Rudapekahin, and the great Naradin—these Munis were all sons of Viswamitra and were proficient in the knowledge of Brahman.

Yudhishtira, the austere and devout Viswamitra, although a Kshatriya by birth, became a Brahmana because Richika had infused the charu meant for his wife with the tejas of the supreme Brahman. I have now told you the story of the birth of Viswamitra who was possessed of the energy of Surya, Chandramas and Agni.

Rajan, if you have doubts with regard to any other matter, do you tell me, so that I may remove them.'"

CANTO 5

"Yudhishtira says, 'You who know the truths of dharma, I wish to hear of the merits of compassion, and of the characteristics of devout men. Pitamaha, describe them to me.'

"Bhishma says, 'Listen to the ancient tale of Vasava and the high-minded Suka. In the kingdom of Kasi, a hunter went from his village on a hunt with poisoned arrows in search of antelope. In a vast forest, while in pursuit of the chase, he discovered a herd of antelope not far from him, and discharged his arrow at one of them.

The arrow missed the deer and pierced a mighty tree instead. Struck by that arrow tipped with virulent poison, the tree withered away instantaneously, shedding its leaves and fruits.

The tree died, but a parrot that lived in a hollow of its trunk all his life did not leave his nest out of love for the towering Lord of the forest. Motionless and without food, silent and grieving, that grateful and virtuous parrot also perished slowly after the tree.

Indra was amazed by that great and generous bird's extraordinary resolve and detachment. He thought, "How has this bird come to possess such extraordinary humane and generous emotions which are not found among the lower creatures? Yet, perhaps there is nothing wonderful about this, for all creatures appear to exhibit kind and generous feelings towards others."

Assuming the form of a Brahmana, Sakra descended onto the earth and came to the bird. "Suka, O parrot, Daksha's granddaughter Suki is blessed to bear you as her child. I ask you, why do you not leave this dead tree?"

Thus questioned, Suka bowed to him and replied, “Welcome to you, Indra. I have recognised you by the merit of my tapasya.”

“Uttamam! Well done!” exclaimed Indra. He praised Suka in his mind, thinking how great was his gyana. Although Indra knew that the parrot was virtuous in character and noble in deed, still he pressed him about the reason for his love for the tree.

“This tree has withered; it is without leaves and fruits and is unfit to be the refuge of birds. Why do you cling to it? This forest is vast and in it are many other fine trees whose hollows are covered with leaves, and you can choose freely from them. Patient one, discern wisely and abandon this old tree that is dead and useless, shorn of all its leaves and no longer of any good to you.”

Hearing this from Sakra, Suka heaved a deep sigh and replied sadly, “Consort of Sachi, and king of the Devas, the laws of the gods must always be obeyed. Listen to my reasoning on this matter.

Here, within this tree, I was born, and here in this tree I acquired all the good traits of my character, and here in this tree I was protected in my childhood from predators. Sinless one, why, in your kindness, do you seek to taint my principles in life?

I am compassionate, virtuous and steadfast in my conduct. Kindness is the great test of virtue amongst the good, and this same compassion is the source of everlasting felicity to the virtuous. All the Devas look to you to remove their doubts on dharma, and for this reason you have sovereignty over them.

It is not fitting for you to tell me to abandon this tree. When it was capable of good, it supported my life. How can I forsake it now?”

The virtuous destroyer of Paka was pleased with these words of the parrot and said to him, “I am gratified with your compassionate nature. Ask any boon of me.”

The loyal parrot said, “Let this tree revive!” Knowing the great attachment of the noble parrot to that tree, Indra showered amrita on the tree. That tree was restored and attained its former grandeur through the tapasya of the parrot, who, by virtue of his compassion, found Indra’s own companionship at the end of his life.

Thus, Lord of men, through friendship and association with the pious, men attain all the objects of their desire even as the tree did through its companionship with the parrot.’”

CANTO 6

"Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, tell me which is more powerful, effort or fate.'

Bhishma says, 'Hear this ancient story of the conversation between Vasishta and Brahma. In ancient times, Vasishta asked Brahma what influenced a man's life more: the karma acquired in this life, or that acquired in previous lives, which is called fate. Brahma, who had sprung from the primeval lotus, answered him in these exquisite and well-reasoned words, full of meaning.

Brahma said, "Nothing comes into existence without seeds. Without seeds, fruits do not grow. From seeds spring other seeds. Hence fruits are known to be generated from seeds. As good or bad is the seed that the farmer sows in his field, so are the fruits that he reaps.

Just as the soil, unsown with seeds, becomes fruitless, so also karma is of no use without individual exertion. One's own actions are like the soil, and destiny, the sum of one's deeds in previous births, can be compared to the seed. The union of the soil and the seed produces the harvest. Every day in the world, we see that the doer reaps the fruit of his good and evil deeds; that happiness results from good deeds, and pain from evil ones; that actions always bear fruit; and that, if not done, there is no fruit. A man of good deeds acquires merit with good fortune, while a lazy man loses his lands, and reaps evil like the infusion of alkaline matter injected into a wound.

With devoted application, one acquires beauty, fortune, and wealth of many kinds. Everything can be secured through exertion, but nothing can be gained by a lazy man through destiny alone. Even so does one attain heaven, and all the objects of enjoyment, as also the fulfilment of one's heart's desires—by well-directed individual effort.

All the luminous stars and planets in the sky, all the Devas, the Nagas and the Rakshasas, as also the sun and the moon and the winds, have attained to their lofty positions by evolution from a human condition, by dint of their own deeds. Riches, friends, prosperity from generation to generation, as also the blessings of life, are difficult to attain without exertion.

The Brahmana attains prosperity through pure and virtuous living, the Kshatriya by prowess, the Vaisya with manly exertion, and the Sudra through service. Riches and other pleasures do not follow the miser, nor the weak, nor the idler. Nor are these ever attained by the man who is not active or manly or devoted to the performance of religious austerities.

Even he, the adorable Vishnu, who created the three worlds with the Daityas and all the Devas, even he is engaged in tapasya in the depths of the ocean. If one's karma bore no fruit all actions would become fruitless, and relying on destiny all men would become idlers. He who follows destiny alone, without pursuing the human modes of action, acts in vain, like the woman with an impotent husband.

In this world, the dread that accrues from doing good or evil deeds is not so great if destiny is unfavourable, as one's fear in the other world if one make no effort in this world. Man's powers, if properly exerted, only follow his destiny, but destiny alone cannot confer any good where exertion is wanting.

When we see that even in swarga the position of the Devas is unstable, how would they maintain their position or that of others without proper karma? The Devas do not always encourage the good deeds of others in this world, and they even thwart such actions fearing their own overthrow.

There is a constant rivalry between the Devas and the Rishis, and even if they must perform karma, it can never be asserted that there is no such thing as destiny, for it is the latter that initiates all karma. If destiny is the source of human action, how does karma originate? It does so through an accumulation of many virtues in the divine realms.

One's own self is one's friend and one's enemy too, as also the witness of one's punya and paapa. Good and evil manifest themselves through karma. Good and evil actions do not have adequate results. Dharma is the refuge of the Devas, and through dharma everything is attained. Destiny does not obstruct the man who has attained virtue and righteousness.

In olden times, falling from his high position in heaven, Yayati descended onto the earth but was again restored to the celestial realms by the good deeds of his virtuous grandsons. The royal sage Pururavas, the celebrated descendant of Ila, attained swarga through the intercession of Brahmanas.

Though exalted by the performance of the Aswamedha and other yagnas, Saudasa, the son of Kosala, became a man-eating Rakshasa through the curse of a great Rishi. Aswatthaman and Rama, though both warriors and sons of Munis, failed to attain swarga because of their own fell deeds in this world.

Though he performed a hundred yagnas like a second Vasava, Vasu was sent to naraka for uttering a single falsehood. Bound by his promise, Bali, the son of Virochana, was consigned to the patalas below the earth by the power of Vishnu.

Was not Janamejaya, who followed in the footsteps of Sakra, thwarted by the Devas for killing a Brahmana woman? Was not the Rishi Vaisampayana, who unwittingly killed a Brahmana, and was tainted by the slaying of a child, censured by the Devas?

In ancient times, the Rajarishi Nriga was transformed into a lizard. He had made great gifts of cows to the Brahmanas at his mahayagna, but to no avail.

The royal sage Dhundhumara was overtaken by age, decay and fatigue even while engaged in performing his sacrifices, and forgoing all their merits he fell asleep at Girivraja. The Pandavas, too, regained their lost kingdom, which had been seized by the powerful sons of Dhritarashtra, not through the intercession of the fates, but by recourse to their own valour.

Do the Munis of rigid vows, and devoted to the practice of austere tapasyas, denounce their curses with the help of any supernatural power or by the exercise of their own power attained by individual deeds? All the punya possessed by dissolute men, attained with difficulty in this world, they soon lose.

Destiny does not help the man steeped in spiritual ignorance and greed. When fanned by the wind, even as a small fire becomes a conflagration, so does destiny, when joined with individual exertion, increase in its potential.

As the oil in the lamp reduces, its light is extinguished; so also is the influence of destiny lost if one's actions cease.

Having gained vast wealth, women, and all the enjoyments of this world, the man without action is not able to enjoy them long; but the high-souled man, who is ever diligent, is able to find treasures buried deep in the earth and watched over by spirits. The good man who is prodigious in giving religious charity and performing sacrifices is sought by the very Devas for his conduct, but the house of the miser, though abounding in wealth, is regarded by the Devas as a home of the dead.

The man who does not exert himself is never content in this world nor can destiny alter the course of a man that has gone wrong. So there is no authority inherent in destiny. As the sishya follows his own individual perception, so does destiny follow exertion. Destiny reveals itself in the matters in which one's own efforts are put forth.

Vasishta, having known their true significance with my yogic powers, I have thus described all the merits of individual exertion. By the influence of destiny, and by exerting individual effort, men attain swarga. The union of destiny and exertion is effective."""

CANTO 7

"Yudhishtira says, 'Bharatarishabha, I wish to know what the fruits are of good deeds. Do you enlighten me on this subject.'

Bhishma said, 'Yudhishtira, listen to what I tell you; it is the secret knowledge of the Rishis. Listen to me as I explain what desirable ends are attained by men after death.

Whatever actions are performed by particular beings, their fruits are reaped by the doers in similar bodies. The fruits of actions done with the mind are enjoyed in dreams, and those actions performed physically are enjoyed in the waking state.

In whatever states creatures perform good or evil deeds, they reap the fruits in similar states of succeeding lives. No action done with the five organs of the senses is ever lost. The five sense organs and the immortal soul, which is the sixth, remain eternal witnesses.

One should devote one's eye and one's heart in the service of the atithi; one should speak words that are agreeable; one should also follow and worship one's guest. This is called Panchadakshina yagna, the sacrifice with five gifts.

He who offers good food to unknown and weary travellers after a long journey, attains great punya. Those who use the sacrificial platform as their only bed in this birth, obtain commodious palaces and beds in subsequent births. Those who dress only in rags and barks of trees obtain luxurious clothes and ornaments in their next births.

The man who possesses tapasya and fixes his soul on yoga, gets chariots and horses as the fruit of his renunciation in this life. The king who lies down beside the sacrificial fire attains vigour and valour.

The man who renounces the enjoyment of all delicacies attains prosperity, and he who abstains from animal flesh, receives children and kine. He who sleeps with his head hanging down, or who lives in water, or who lives in seclusion practising brahmacharya, attains to all the desired ends.

He who offers refuge to a guest and welcomes him with water to wash his feet, as also with food and rest, attains to the merits of the Panchadakshina yagna. He who lies down on a warrior's bed on the battlefield in the posture of a warrior, goes to those eternal realms where all desires are fulfilled.

A man who makes charitable endowments finds riches. One secures obedience to one's command through the vow of silence, all the enjoyments of life with the practice of tapasya, long life by brahmacharya, and beauty, prosperity and freedom from disease by ahimsa, non-violence.

Sovereignty is theirs who subsist on fruit and roots. Swarga is attained by those that live only on the leaves of trees. A man is said to gain happiness by abstaining from food. By restricting one's diet to just herbs, one becomes wealthy. By living on grass one attains to the celestial realms.

By foregoing sexual union with one's wife, performing ablutions three times during the day and by inhaling only air for subsistence, one gains the merit of a sacrifice. Swarga is attained by the practice of truth, nobility of birth by yagnas.

The Brahmana of pure practices that subsists on water alone, performs the Agnihotra ceaselessly, and recites the Gayatri, obtains a kingdom. By giving up food or by regulating it, one attains swarga.

Rajan, by abstaining from all but the prescribed diet while engaged in sacrifices, and by making a pilgrimage for twelve years, one attains to a place better than the realms reserved for Kshatriyas. By reading all the Vedas, one is instantly liberated from misery, and by practising virtue in thought, one attains to swarga. That man who is able to renounce that intense yearning of the heart for pleasure and material enjoyments—a yearning that is difficult for foolish men to conquer, and which does not decrease with the abatement of bodily strength and that clings like a fatal disease to him—is assured bliss.

As the young calf is able to recognise its mother from among a thousand cows, so does the past karma of a man pursue him in all his transformations. As the flowers and fruits of a tree, without any visible influences, never miss their proper season, so does karma from a previous existence unerringly bring its fruit in proper time. With age, man's hair grows grey, his teeth become loose, and his eyes and ears become dim; but the one thing that does not weaken is his desire for pleasure.

Prajapati is pleased with those deeds that please one's father, the earth is pleased with those acts that please one's mother, and Brahma is adored with those that please one's acharya. Dharma is honoured by him who honours these three. Those who do not respect these three do not benefit from them, whatever they may do.'"

Vaisampayana said, "The princes of Kuru's vamsa are filled with wonder upon listening to this discourse of Bhishma. All of them are overwhelmed with joy. Like mantras that are recited only to have victory, or the performance of the Soma yagna without proper dakshina, or offerings poured on the fire without proper mantras are rendered useless and lead to evil consequences, even so sin and evil results flow from false speech.

O prince, I have thus narrated to you the doctrine of the fruition of good and evil acts, as told by the ancient Rishis. What else do you wish to hear?"

CANTO 8

Vaisampayana continued, "Yudhishtira says, 'Who are deserving of worship? Who are they unto whom one may bow? Who are they, Bhaarata, before whom you would bend your head? Who, again, are they whom you love? Tell me all this.

What does your mind dwell upon when you are overwhelmed by misery? Speak to me about what is beneficial in this world of humans, and also hereafter.'

Bhishma says, 'I revere those evolved men whose highest wealth is Brahman, whose swarga consists of the knowledge of the Atman, and whose tapasya is constituted by their diligent study of the Vedas. My heart yearns for those in whose vamsa both the young and the old diligently bear their ancestral burdens without being weighed down by them.

Skilled in several branches of knowledge, self-restrained and gentle in speech, conversant with the shastras, dutiful, possessing the knowledge of Brahman and righteous in conduct, Brahmanas discourse in auspicious conclaves like flocks of swans.

Yudhishtira, their words are auspicious, pleasing, excellent and finely pronounced; they speak with voices deep as thunderheads. Suffused with joy both earthly and spiritual, they speak such words in the courts of kings, where they are received with honour and served with reverence by those rulers of men. Indeed, my heart yearns for those who listen to the words spoken in such pure assemblies or royal sabhas by those endowed with gyana and all desirable gunas, and respected by others.

My heart longs for those who offer, with devotion, food that is clean, well cooked and wholesome to gratify Brahmanas. It is easy to fight in battle, but not so to make a gift without pride or vanity.

In this world, Yudhishtira, there are brave men and heroes by the hundreds. While counting them, he who is heroic in gifts must be regarded as superior. Even if I had been a common Brahmana, I would have regarded myself as great, not to speak of one born into a Brahmana family replete with righteousness of conduct, and devoted to penances and learning.

Son of Pandu, there is no one that is dearer to me than you are in this world, but those Brahmanas are dearer to me than even you. And since I love these Brahmanas more than you, it is through that truth that I hope to attain to all those realms of felicity in which my father Santanu dwells. Neither my sire, nor his sire, nor anyone else related to me by blood, is dearer to me than the Brahmanas.

I do not expect any reward, small or great, from my worship of the Brahmanas, for I revere them as Devas. Even though I am lying on a bed of arrows, because of what I have done for Brahmanas in thought, word and deed, I do not feel any pain.

People would refer to me as the one devoted to Brahmanas. This manner of address always pleased me most. To do good to Brahmanas is the most sacred of all sacred acts. Having walked with adoration behind Brahmanas, I behold many realms of grace waiting for me. Very soon shall I repair to those lustrous realms for ever.

In this world, Yudhishtira, the duties of women allude to and depend on their husbands. To a woman, the husband is the deity and he is the highest end after which she should strive. As the husband is to the wife, even so are the Brahmanas unto Kshatriyas. If there be a Kshatriya of full hundred years of age and a good Brahmana child of only ten years, the latter should be regarded as a father and the former as a son, for among the two the Brahmana is undeniably superior.

A woman in the absence of her husband takes his younger brother for her lord; even so Bhumi Devi, not having obtained the Brahmana, made the Kshatriya her master. Brahmanas must be protected like sons and worshipped like fathers or gurus. Indeed they must be adored even as people wait with reverence upon their homa fires.

The Brahmanas are filled with simplicity and virtue. They are devoted to truth. They are always engaged in the good of every creature. Yet when enraged they are like poisonous snakes. For these reasons, they must always be waited upon and served with reverence and humility.

Yudhishtira, always be wary of both tejas and tapasya. Both these must be avoided or kept at a distance. The effects of both are swift. However, tapasya is the more powerful, that is why tapodhana Brahmanas, if angered, can easily make ashes of the object of their wrath regardless of the tejas of that man.

Tejas and tapasya, each in the largest measure, are powerless if applied against a Brahmana who has conquered anger. If the two are set against each other, then both will be destroyed. However, if energy is applied against penances it is sure to be destroyed without leaving a trace; but tapasya applied against tejas cannot be completely annihilated.

As the herdsman, stick in hand, protects the herd, even so must the Kshatriya always protect the Vedas and the Brahmanas. Indeed, the Kshatriya should protect all righteous Brahmanas even as a father protects his sons. He must watch over the houses of the Brahmanas and ensure that they do not lack in their means of livelihood.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, what happens to those men who, through inertia and torpor, do not make gifts to Brahmanas after having promised to make those offerings? You who are the most righteous of men, tell me what the laws are in this respect. Indeed, what is the end of those who do not give after having promised to give.'

Bhishma says, 'One who having promised does not give, be it little or much, has the mortification of seeing his hopes in all directions become fruitless like the hopes of a eunuch who wishes for children. Whatever good deeds such a man does between the day of his birth and that of his death, Bhaarata, whatever libations he pours on the sacrificial fire, whatever gifts he makes, and whatever penances he performs, all become fruitless.

They that know the shastras declare this to be their opinion, having arrived at it with the help of a studied understanding. These learned men are also of opinion that such a man may be redeemed by giving away a thousand pale horses with dark ears.

Listen to the old story of the conversation between a jackal and a monkey. Once, when both were humans, they were intimate friends. After they died, in their next birth one of them became a jackal and the other a monkey.

One day, seeing the jackal eating the carcass of an animal in a cremation ground, the monkey, remembering his own and his friend's past birth as men, said to him, "What terrible sin did you commit in your last birth that in this one you are obliged to feed upon the putrid carcass of an animal in the samsana?"

The jackal replied to the monkey, “Having promised to give gifts to a Brahmana I did not do so. It is for that sin that I have fallen into this wretched existence. It is for this reason that, when hungry, I am obliged to eat such repugnant food.”’

Bhishma continues, ‘The jackal then said to the monkey, “What sin did you commit for which you have become a monkey?”

The monkey said, “In my past life I used to steal fruits belonging to Brahmanas. And so I have been born as a monkey. It is clear that one who has intelligence and learning must never take what belongs to Brahmanas. One must also avoid all disputes with Brahmanas. Having promised, one must necessarily give them the promised gift.”’

Bhishma continues, ‘Rajan, I heard this from my guru while he discoursed upon the subject of Brahmanas. I heard this from that righteous man when he recited the old and sacred pronouncement on this subject. I heard this from Krishna also, while he was speaking of Brahmanas.

The property of a Brahmana should never be seized. They should always be left undisturbed. Poor, miserly, or young, they should never be disregarded. Brahmanas have always taught me this.

Having promised to make them a gift, the gift must be made. A superior Brahmana’s expectations must always be fulfilled. It has been said that a Brahmana whose expectation has been raised is like a blazing fire. That man upon whom a Brahmana with raised expectations casts his angry eye is certain to be consumed even as a pile of dry grass is by a blazing fire.

When the Brahmana who is honoured by the king with gifts addresses the king in agreeable and loving words, that Brahmana becomes a source of great benefit to the king, for he continues to live in the kingdom like a physician, combating the many diseases of the body. Such a Brahmana, with his power and grace, is sure to sustain the sons and grandsons, animals and relatives, ministers and other officers, and the city and provinces of the king.

This great tejas of the Brahmana is like that of the radiance of Surya himself on Bhumi. Yudhishtira, if one wishes to attain an honourable and happy next birth, having promised a Brahmana a gift, one must not neglect to bestow that gift.

By making gifts to a Brahmana one is sure to attain to the highest heaven. The giving of gifts is the highest of human deeds. With the gifts one makes to a Brahmana, one supports the Devas and the Pitris. Hence one who is wise must always make gifts to Brahmanas. Lord of the Bharatas, the Brahmana is regarded as the highest entity unto whom gifts must be made. At no time should a Brahmana be received without being properly worshipped.”

"Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me whether any fault is incurred by one who, whether from interested or disinterested friendship imparts instruction to one who belongs to a low varna. Pitamaha, expound this to me in detail. The course of dharma is so subtle, and men are often bewildered in respect of that path.'

Bhishma says, 'I will narrate to you what I heard certain Rishis say in olden days. Instruction should not be imparted to one who belongs to a low or mean caste. It is said that the guru who instructs such a person incurs great blame.

Listen, Yudhishtira, to this ancient story of the evil consequences of instructing a low-born person fallen into distress. This event occurred in the asrama of those illumined sages who lived on the auspicious breast of Himavat.

There, on the breast of that prince of mountains, was a sacred asrama adorned with trees of diverse kinds. Covered with diverse species of creepers and plants, it was the home of many animals and birds. Inhabited by Siddhas and Charanas, it was delightful because of the trees that flowered in every season.

Many brahmacharins and vanaprasthas lived there. Many Brahmanas residing there were highly blessed and resembled Surya or Agni in energy and refulgence. Ascetics of many kinds lived there, observant of various restraints and vows, and others who had taken diksha and were frugal in fare and possessed pure souls.

Large numbers of Balakhilyas and many who had taken the sannyasa vrata also dwelt there. The asrama echoed with the chanting of the Vedas and other sacred mantras by its inhabitants.

Once upon a time, a Sudra who loved all creatures came to that asrama. On arriving, he was duly honoured by all the ascetics. The Sudra was delighted to see those sannyasis of great tejas, who resembled the Devas in purity and power, observing diverse kinds of vratas.

Beholding everything, he felt persuaded to devote himself to the practice of tapasya. Touching the feet of the Kulapati, he said to him, "With your blessings, I want to learn and practise the duties of dharma.

Discourse to me on those duties and with the rites of initiation induct me into a life of sannyasa. I am certainly inferior in varna, illustrious one, for I am a Sudra. I desire to wait upon and serve you here. I humbly seek your refuge; I beg you, oblige me."

The Kulapati said, "It is impossible that a Sudra should adopt the practices of sannyasis. If it pleases you, you may stay here, engaged in waiting upon and serving us. Have no doubt that by such service you will attain to many realms of high felicity."'

Bhishma continue, 'Thus addressed by the sannyasi, the Sudra reflected and said, "What should I do now? Great is my reverence for dharma, which leads to punya. But I will do what will benefit me."

Going to a remote place, he made a hut from the branches and leaves of trees. He erected a sacrificial platform and, making a little space to sleep, and a vedi for the Devas, he began to lead a life regulated by demanding vratas and tapasya, while abstaining entirely from speech.

He began to perform ablutions three times a day, to observe other vratas of food and sleep, perform yagnas for the Devas, pour libations on the sacrificial fire, and worship the deities. Subduing all sensual desires, living abstemiously upon fruits and roots, controlling all his senses, every day he welcomed and honoured all who came to his hermitage, offering them roots and fruit that grew all around in abundance. In this way he lived in that asrama for a long time.

One day an ascetic came to that Sudra's asrama to meet him. The Sudra welcomed and worshipped the Rishi with the due rites, and gratified him. Possessing great tejas and a righteous soul that Rishi talked with his host on many pleasant subjects and told him from where he had come.

That Rishi came to the Sudra's asrama several times. On one of these occasions, the Sudra said to the Rishi, "I want to perform the rites that are ordained for the Pitris. You must instruct me in this matter."

"Very well," replied the Brahmana.

The Sudra purified himself by bathing and brought water for the Rishi to wash his feet; he also brought some kusa grass, and wild herbs and fruits, and a sacred seat called Vrishi. The Sudra, however, placed the Vrishi towards the south, with its head facing west.

On seeing this and knowing it to be against the laws, the Rishi said to the Sudra, "Set the Vrishi with its head turned towards the east and, having purified yourself, sit with your face facing the north." The Sudra did as the Rishi directed.

Possessed of great intelligence and righteousness, the Sudra received every instruction from the sage about the sraddha, as laid down in the shastras—regarding the manner of spreading the kusa grass, and placing the offerings, and the rites to be observed in the matter of the libations to be poured and the food to be offered. After the rituals in honour of the Pitris had been completed, dismissed by the Sudra, the Rishi returned to his own abode.

After passing a long time in the practice of such penances and vows, the Sudra ascetic died in the forest. As a result of the punya he acquired through those practices, in his next life the Sudra was born into the family of a great king, and in the course of time became endowed with great splendour.

The Rishi also, when the time came, died. In his next life, he was born into the family of a priest. It was in this way that those two were reborn, that Sudra who had lived a life of tapasya and that Rishi who had generously instructed the Sudra in the rites performed in honour of the Pitris: the one as a son of a royal vamsa and the other as the member of a Brahmana's family.

Both of them acquired great knowledge in the customary branches of study. The Brahmana became well versed in the Vedas as also in the Atharvans. The reborn Rishi attained excellence in the matters of all yagnas ordained in the Sutras, of that Vedanga which deals with religious rites and observances, astrology and astronomy. He also took great delight in the Samkhya philosophy.

When the king, his father, died, the reborn Sudra who had become a prince performed his last rites; and after he had purified himself by performing all the necessary ceremonies, his father's subjects enthroned him as their king. Soon after his being crowned, he appointed the reborn Rishi as his priest.

Indeed, having made the Brahmana his purohita, the king began to pass his days in great happiness. He ruled his kingdom righteously and protected and cherished all his subjects. Every day, however, when he received blessings from his priest and during the performance of religious and other sacred rites, the king smiled or laughed at him loudly. In this way, the Sudra who had been reborn as a king laughed at the very sight of his purohita on countless occasions.

Marking that the king always smiled or laughed whenever he looked at him, the Brahmana became angry. One day, he met the king alone and pleased the king with an agreeable discourse. Taking advantage of that moment, he said to the king, "Splendid one, I entreat you to grant me a single boon."

The king said, "I am ready to grant you a hundred boons, why do you speak of only one? With the love I bear you and the reverence in which I hold you, there is nothing that I cannot give you."

The priest said, "You are gratified by me; Rajan, I desire only one boon. Swear that you will tell me the truth and not any lie."

"Thus addressed by the priest, Yudhishtira, the king said to him, 'So be it. If what you ask me is known to me, I will certainly speak of it to you truthfully. If, on the other hand, the matter is unknown to me, I will not say anything.'

The Brahmana said, "Every day, when you take my blessings, and again when I am engaged in the performance of religious rites on your behalf, and also during the homa and other kriyas of propitiation, why is it that you laugh when you see me? My mind shrinks with shame when you do that.

I have asked you to swear that you will answer me truthfully. It fitting that you will not lie to me. There must be some solemn reason for your behaviour. Your laughter cannot be without cause. I am curious to know what it is. Speak to me honestly."

The king said, "When you have spoken to me in this way, I am bound to enlighten you, even if it is a matter that should not be divulged in your hearing. I must tell you the truth. Listen to me with close attention, O Dvija. Listen to me as I disclose what happened to both of us in our last births. I remember that birth. Listen and I will tell you everything.

In my past life I was a Sudra engaged in the practice of severe tapasya. You were a Rishi of austere penances. Gratified with me, and wishing to do me good, you once gave me some instruction in the kriyas I performed in honour of my Pitris.

The instructions you gave me were in respect of the manner of spreading the Vrishi and the kusa blades and of offering libations and meat and other food to the manes. As a result of your transgression you have been born as a purohita, and I have been born as a king.

Behold the vicissitudes of Kaala. You have reaped this fruit because you instructed me in my previous birth. It is for this reason, O Brahmana, that I smile or laugh when I see you. I certainly do not do so to ridicule or disrespect you. You are my guru.

I am repentant for this change of circumstances; my heart seethes at the thought. I smile or laugh in remorse when I see you because I remember our former births. Your tapasya was lost because you taught me.

Relinquish your present position of purohita and endeavour to regain a superior birth. Exert yourself so that, in your next life, you may not obtain a birth inferior to your present one. Take as much wealth as you need, learned Brahmana, and purify your soul."

Dismissed by the king, the Brahmana made many gifts of wealth, land and villages to persons of his own varna. He observed many rigid and severe vratas as laid down by the foremost of sages. He travelled to many sacred tirthas and made many gifts to Brahmanas in those places.

Making gifts of cows to those of twice-born varnas, his soul was purified and he succeeded in attaining Atmagyana. Repairing to that very asrama where he had lived in his past birth, he practised severe tapasya. As the result of all this, that Brahmana succeeded in attaining to the highest, indeed to mukti. He was revered by all the sannyasis who lived in that asrama.

In this way, that Rishi fell into great distress; therefore, Brahmanas should never impart knowledge to Sudras. The Brahmana should avoid instructing the low-born, for it was because of his teaching the Sudra in the forest that the Brahmana came to grief.

Rajan, the Brahmana should never desire to obtain instruction from or instruct one that belongs to the lowest varna. Brahmanas and Kshatriyas and Vaisyas, the three varnas, are regarded as being twice-born. By giving instruction to these, a Brahmana does not incur any fault. Righteous men should never discourse on any subject before persons of the fourth varna.

The course of dharma is exceedingly subtle and cannot be grasped by men of impure minds. It is for this reason that sannyasis adopt the vow of silence, and being respected by all, they pass through diksha, initiation, without using words.

For fear of saying what is false or what may offend, ascetics often forego speech itself and take the mowna vrata. Even righteous and accomplished men, of honest and simple conduct, have been known to incur great fault because of unfittingly spoken words.

Instruction should never be given on any subject unthinkingly. If in consequence of teachings imparted, the one taught commit, any sin that sin attaches to the Brahmana who taught him. The wise man, who desires to earn punya, should always act with wisdom. Knowledge which is taught in exchange for money always pollutes the teacher.

Solicited by others, one should say only what is correct after reflecting upon it. One should teach in such a way that one may earn merit. I have thus told you everything on the subject of sacred instruction. Very often men suffer because of wrongly teaching knowledge. Hence it is proper that one should abstain from giving instruction to others.’

"Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me, Pitamaha, in what kind of man or woman does the Devi Lakshmi of prosperity always dwell?'

"Bhishma says, 'Listen while I narrate to you what I have heard happened. Once upon a time, beholding the goddess of wealth radiant with beauty, blessed with the complexion of the lotus, the princess Rukmini, the mother of Pradyumna whose banner bore the makara emblem, was filled with curiosity and asked this question in the presence of Devaki's son Krishna.

"Who are those beings by whose side you remain and whom do you favour? Who are those whom you do not bless? You who are dear to Him that is the Lord of all creatures, tell me this truly, you that are equal to a Maharishi in penances and power."

Thus addressed by the beautiful princess and moved by grace, in the presence of Krishna who has Garuda on his banner, Lakshmi replied with pleasing words.

Sree said, "Blessed devi, I always dwell with him that is eloquent, active, attentive to his work, free from anger, given to the worship of the Devas, grateful, has his passions under complete control, and is high-minded.

I never remain with one who is inattentive to his work, is an unbeliever, who causes an intermingling of varnas through his lust, who is ungrateful, of impure practices, uses harsh and cruel words, who is a thief, malicious towards his gurus and other elders, those that have little energy, strength, life and honour, and that are troubled by everything trivial, and are always choleric.

I never live with these that think in one way and act in another. I also never remain with him who never desires anything for himself, who is so blinded as to be content with his lot without any effort, or with those that are contented with few possessions.

I dwell with those that observe the duties of their own varna, or those that are conversant with dharma, or those that are devoted to the service of the aged or those that have subdued their passions, those that have pure souls, those that observe the virtue of forgiveness, those that are capable and timely in action, or with such women as are forgiving and self-restrained.

I reside also with women that are devoted to truth and sincerity, and who worship the Devas. I do not dwell with women that do not attend to household duties, leaving furniture and provisions scattered everywhere in the house, and who always utter words contrary to the wishes of their husbands. I always avoid those women that are fond of the houses of other people and that have no modesty.

On the other hand, I reside with those women that are devoted to their husbands, that are blessed in conduct, and who are always well-dressed and decked in ornaments. I always dwell with those women that are truthful in speech, who are of handsome and pleasant features, and are blessed and accomplished.

I always avoid such women as are sinful and unclean or impure, who always lick the corners of their mouths, who have no patience or fortitude, and as are fond of disagreement and quarrelling, as are given to much sleep, and are slothful.

I always dwell in chariots and the animals that draw them, in young girls, in ornaments and good clothing, in sacrifices, in clouds charged with rain, in blooming lotuses, and in those stars that deck the autumn sky. I reside in elephants, in the cow shed, in fine asanas, and in lakes adorned with lotuses.

I live also in such rivers that murmur sweetly in their course, melodious with the music of cranes, with rows of diverse trees on their banks, where Brahmanas and Rishis dwell. I always dwell in those rivers that are deep with surging waters muddied by lions and elephants plunging into them to bathe or slake their thirst.

I reside in angry elephants, in bulls, in kings and good men. I always dwell in that house in which the inhabitant pours libation on the sacrificial fire and worships cows, Brahmanas and the Devas. I live in that house where offerings are made unto the deities at the auspicious times during the course of worship.

I always live in those Brahmanas who are devoted to the study of the Vedas, in Kshatriyas devoted to the observance of dharma, in Vaisyas devoted to cultivation, and the Sudras devoted to the service of the three higher varnas.

With a firm and steadfast heart, I reside in Narayana, in my embodied self. In him is dharma in its perfection and full measure, devotion to Brahmanas and the quality of enchantment.

Dear devi, I do not live in my embodied form in any of these places that I have mentioned, other than in Narayana. He in whom I reside in spirit, increases in dharma, kirti and artha and gains the objects of his desire.”””

CANTO 12

"Yudhishtira says, 'Rajan, tell me truly which of the two, man or woman, derives the greater pleasure from an act of sexual union with each other. Pitamaha, dispel my doubts in this matter.'

Bhishma says, 'In this regard, I will tell you the ancient story of the discourse between Bhangaswana and Sakra.

In the olden days, there lived a king named Bhangaswana. He was righteous and was known as a Rajarishi. He was, however, childless, and performed a sacrifice to have children. The mighty ruler performed the Agnishtuta yagna.

This sacrifice, which worships only Agni Deva, is always abhorred by Indra. Yet it is the sacrifice that is performed by men when they seek to purify themselves of their sins in order to have children.

When Indra learned that the king desired to perform the Agnishtuta, from that moment he began to look for the weaknesses of that royal sage of tranquil soul, for if he did find any he could then punish the king who had shown him disrespect. Despite all his vigilance, Indra failed to find any flaw or weakness in the king.

One day, the king went on a hunting expedition. Indra saw this as an opportunity to baffle Bhangaswana. Riding alone on his horse, the king suddenly found himself confounded because Indra had stupefied his senses. Afflicted with hunger and thirst, the king's panic was so great that he could not even determine where he was. Parched with thirst, he began to wander aimlessly in a daze.

He then saw a crystalline lake shimmering with clear water. Alighting from his horse, he drank deeply and then led his horse to drink. When his mount's thirst was quenched, the king tied the steed to a tree and plunged into the lake to perform his ablutions.

To his amazement he found that he had been transformed by the waters into a woman. The king was overcome with shame. With his senses and mind agitated, he began to reflect deeply in this strain:

"Alas, how will I ride my horse now? How will I return to my capital? As a result of the Agnishtuta sacrifice I have got a hundred mighty sons, all children of my own loins. What shall I say to them? What shall I say to my wives, my relatives and well-wishers, and to the subjects of my city and my kingdom?

Rishis who know the truths of dharma say that mildness and softness and being prone to extreme agitation are the attributes of women, and that action, strength and energy are those of men. Alas, my manliness has disappeared. For what reason have I been overcome with femininity? Being so transformed, how will I mount my horse again?"

Thinking these sad thoughts, the king, though transformed into a woman, mounted his steed with some effort and returned to his capital. Seeing that extraordinary transformation, his sons and wives and servants, and his subjects were astounded.

That royal sage, that most eloquent men, said to them all, "I was on a hunt, accompanied by a large force. Driven by destiny, losing all knowledge of the points of the horizon, I entered a thick and terrible forest. In that forest, I was afflicted by a strange thirst and quite lost my senses. I then saw a beautiful lake abounding with birds of every description. Plunging into those waters to perform my ablutions, I was transformed into a woman!"

The king summoned his wives and counsellors, and all his sons by their names, and said to them, "My sons, enjoy this kingdom in happiness. As for myself, I shall go away into the forest."

Having said this to his children, the king Bhangaswana, now a woman, set off for the vana. There, she came upon an asrama inhabited by a sannyasi. By him the transformed king gave birth to a hundred sons. Taking these sons to the capital, to where her former children were, she said to the latter, "You are the sons of my loins while I was a man. These are my children brought forth by me as a woman. My sons, all of you must enjoy my kingdom together, like brothers born of the same parents."

At this command, all the brothers, united together, began to take delight in their kingdom jointly. Seeing those children enjoying the kingdom as brothers born of the same parents, Indra, filled with wrath, began to reflect, "By changing this royal sage into a woman, it appears that I have done him good instead of an injury."

Saying this, Indra assumed the form of a Brahmana and went to Bhangaswana's capital and, meeting all the princes, succeeded in disuniting them. He said to them, "Brothers never remain at peace even when they are born of the same father. The sons of Rishi Kasyapa—the Devas and the Asuras—fought against each other for the sovereignty of the three worlds.

As for you princes, you are the sons of Rajarishi Bhangaswana. These others are the sons of a sannyasi. The Devas and the Asuras are the progeny of a common sire, and yet they fought. How much more, therefore, will you fall out among yourselves? This kingdom, your paternal inheritance, is being enjoyed by these children of an ascetic."

Thus Indra succeeded in causing a rift between them, so that they fought and annihilated one another. Hearing this, Bhangaswana, who was living as an ascetic woman, burned with grief and poured forth her lamentations.

Indra, in the disguise of a Brahmana, came to where the sannyasini was living and on meeting her said, "O beautiful one, what sorrow burns you so that you lament so loudly?"

The woman said to him in a pitiful voice, "Two hundred sons of mine have been slain by Kaala. Learned Brahmana, I was once a king, and in that state I had a hundred sons. These I begot in my own likeness. Then, one day I went on a hunt. Suddenly dazed, as if someone had cast a spell on me, I wandered in a dense forest afire with thirst.

At last seeing a fine lake, I plunged into it. Emerging from the water, I found that I had become a woman. Returning to my capital I installed my sons in the sovereignty of my dominions and came into the forest. Now as a woman, I bore a hundred sons to my husband who is a high-souled ascetic. All of them were born in the sannyasi's asrama.

I took them to the capital. Through the influence of time, my sons fought each other and they all died. And afflicted by festiny, I am sorrowing.

Indra addressed her in these harsh words, "In the past, you injured me greatly by performing a yagna that I loathe. Indeed, though I was present, you did not invoke me with any honour. You of little understanding, I am Indra. It is me with whom you have crossed swords."

Beholding Indra revealed before him, the Rajarishi fell at his feet, touching them with his head, and said, "Be gratified with me, foremost of all Devas. I performed the yagna of which you speak from a desire to have sons and not from any wish to offend you. I beg you, forgive me."

Seeing the transformed monarch prostrate himself before him, Indra was gratified and, wanting to grant him a boon, asked, "Which of your sons do you wish to revive? Those that were brought forth by you as a woman, or those that you sired as a man?"

The ascetic woman folded her hands and said to Indra, "Vasava, let those sons of mine come to life that were borne by me as a woman."

Filled with wonder at this reply, Indra asked her, "Why do you feel less fondness for those children born to you as a man? Why is your love greater for the sons borne by you as a woman? I wish to hear the reason for this difference. Tell me everything."

Bhangaswana said, "The love experienced by a woman is much greater than that which is felt by a man. Hence it is, O Sakra, that I wish those sons to be revived that were borne by me as a woman."'

Bhishma continued, 'Thus addressed, Indra was pleased and said to her, "Let all your sons come back to life. Ask for another boon, foremost of kings, whatever boon you like. Take from me whatever gender you choose, that of a woman or of a man."

The sannyasin said, 'Sakra, I want to remain a woman. I do not wish to be restored to manhood, Vasava."

Hearing this answer, Indra asked her, "Why is it, powerful one, that you seek to remain a woman?"

Bhangaswana replied, 'In acts of sexual union, the pleasure that women enjoy is always far greater than what is enjoyed by men. It is for this reason that I wish to remain a woman. Indra, truthfully do I say to you that I derive greater pleasure in my womanhood. I am content with this that I now have. You may leave me now, O Swargaraja."

Hearing these words, Indra said, "So be it", and bidding her farewell, returned to swarga. Yudhishtira, thus it is well known that a woman derives much greater pleasure than a man during sexual union.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'What should a man do in order to pass pleasantly through this and the next world? How should one conduct oneself? What practices must one adopt with this end in view?'

Bhishma says, 'One must avoid the three sins that are done with the body, the four that are done with speech, the three that are done with the mind, and the ten paths of sin.

The three physical sins to be avoided are killing, theft and the enjoyment of other men's wives. The four sins of speech, never to be indulged in or even thought of, are evil talk, harsh words, talking about other people's faults and lies.

Coveting the possessions of others, doing injury to others, and doubting the rules of the Vedas, are the three sins of the mind which should always be avoided. Hence, one must never do any evil at all with body word or mind. By doing good and evil deeds, one is sure to enjoy or endure their consequences. Nothing can be more certain than this.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'O Gangaputra, you have heard all the names of Maheswara, the Lord of the universe. Pitamaha, tell us all the names that are applied to him who is called Isa and Sambhu. Tell us all those names that are applied unto him who is called Babhru or vast, him that has the universe for his form, him that is the illustrious guru of all the Devas and the Asuras, who is called Swayambhu and who is the cause of the origin and dissolution of the universe. Describe to us the puissance of Mahadeva.'

Bhishma says, 'I am not competent to recite the virtues of Mahadeva. He pervades all things in the universe and yet is not seen anywhere. He is the Creator of the universal self and the Prajna, the knowing self, and he is their master. All the Devas, from Brahma down to the Pisachas, adore and worship him.

He transcends both Prakriti and Purusha. It is of him that Rishis, who know yoga and have a knowledge of the tattvas, think and reflect. He is indestructible and the Supreme Brahman. He is both existent and non-existent. Agitating both Prakriti and Purusha with his energy, He created Brahma.

Who is there that is competent to speak of the virtues of that God of gods that is endowed with supreme intelligence? Man is subject to conception in the mother's womb, to birth, decay and death. Being such, what man like me has the capacity to understand Bhava?

Only Narayana, that bearer of the discus and the mace, can comprehend Mahadeva. He is without deterioration. He is the foremost of all beings in attributes. He is Vishnu, because he pervades the universe. He is omnipotent.

Imbued with spiritual vision, he is possessed of supreme tejas. He sees all things with the eye of yoga. It is in consequence of the devotion of Krishna to Siva, whom he gratified through tapasya in Badarikasrama, that Krishna succeeded in permeating all the universe.

It is through Maheswara of divine vision that Krishna has obtained the attribute of universal charm, which is more delightful than all the wealth in the world. For a full thousand years he underwent the austerest penances and at last succeeded in gratifying the illustrious and boon-giving Siva, that master of all the mobile and the immobile universe.

In every new yuga, through such tapasya, Krishna has gratified Siva. In every yuga Mahadeva has been pleased with the devotion of Krishna. How wonderful is the puissance of the Mahatman Mahadeva, that original cause of the universe, who was seen by Hari, who himself transcends all decay, when he was engaged in tapasya to obtain a son in the asrama of Badari.

Bhaarata, I do not hold anyone superior to Mahadeva. Only Krishna is competent to expound the names of Siva fully and absolutely. This Mahabaho of Yadu's race alone can speak of the attributes of the illustrious Siva. Only he is able to discourse on the power, in its entirety, of the Supreme Deity.'" Vaisampayana continued, "Having said this, Bhishma Pitamaha addresses Krishna and speaks on the subject of the greatness of Bhava.

Bhishma says, 'You are the master of all the Devas and the Asuras. You are famed and illustrious. You are Vishnu because you pervade the whole universe. It is fitting that you discourse on Siva of universal form about whom Yudhishtira has asked me.

In ancient times, the Rishi Tandin, sprung from Brahma, recited in Brahma's realm before Brahma himself, the thousand names of Mahadeva. Recite those names before this gathering so that these tapodhana Rishis, who observe high vratas, who possess self-restraint, Vyasa among them, may hear you. Discourse on the holiness of him who is immutable, who is always joyful, who is hotri, who is the universal Protector, who is Creator of the universe, and who is called Mundin and Kapardin.'

Krishna says, 'The Devas, including Indra and Brahma, and the Maharishis, cannot fathom the course of Mahadeva's actions. He is the end that all righteous people attain. The very Adityas who have keen sight, cannot gaze upon his abode. How then can a mere man comprehend him?

I will tell you some of the attributes of that illustrious slayer of Asuras, who is regarded as the Lord of all tapasya and vratas.'" Vaisampayana continued, "And after purifying himself by touching water, Krishna began his discourse on the attributes of Siva.

Krishna says, 'Hear, you best of Brahmanas and you also Yudhishtira, and hear you too, Ganga's son, the names of the Kapardin. Listen to how I obtained a vision, so difficult to have, of that Great God, for the sake of Samba. In those days I saw him through the power of yoga.

Twelve years after wise Pradyumna, the son of Rukmini, killed the Asura Sambara, my wife Jambavati came to me and, seeing Pradyumna, Charudeshna and my other sons born to Rukmini, Jambavati, herself wanting a son, said to me, "Give me a heroic son, the foremost of mighty men, handsome in appearance, sinless in conduct, and like you in every way. And let there be no delay on your part in granting this wish of mine. There is nothing in the three worlds that is unattainable to you, O perpetuator of Yadu's vamsa; you can create other worlds by merely wishing it.

Observing a vow for twelve years and purifying yourself, you worshipped Siva and then begot upon Rukmini her sons Charudeshna and Sucharu and Charuvesa and Yasodhana and Charusravas and Charuyasas and Pradyumna and Samba. Grant to me a son like those powerful sons of Rukmini."

Thus addressed by the princess, I replied, "Give me leave to go away for some time. I will certainly obey your command!"

She said to me, "Go, and may you always be accompanied by success and prosperity. Let Brahma and Siva and Kasyapa, the great rivers, those Devas that preside over the mind, all plants, those chchandas that bear the libations poured in sacrifices, the Rishis, Bhumi, the oceans, the sacrificial dakshina, and those syllables that are uttered for completing the intonations of Samans, all protect you.

Yadava, let the Rikshas, the Pitris, the Navagrahas, the consorts of the Devas, the Apsaras, the Devis, the great kalpas, cows, Chandramas, Savitri, Agni, Savitri, the knowledge of the Vedas, the seasons, the year, the small and great divisions of time, the kshanas, the labas, the muhurtas, the nimeshas, and the yugas in succession, protect you, and keep you in happiness, wherever you may dwell. Let no danger overtake you on your way, and be not careless."

Thus blessed by her, I took her leave. I then went into the presence of my father, of my mother, of the king, and of Ahuka, and I told them what the sorrowing daughter of the Vidyadhara prince had said to me. Taking their leave as well, I went sadly to Gada and to Rama of vast might.

They said to me, "Let your tapasya increase without any obstacle." Having received their leave, I thought of Garuda. He came instantly to me and, at my bidding, bore me to Himavat. Arriving at Himavat, I let him go.

There on that foremost of mountains, I saw many wonderful sights. I saw a pleasant asrama in which to perform tapasya. That delightful asrama was presided over by the high-souled Upamanyu who was a descendant of Vyaghrapada. It is celebrated and revered by the Devas and the Gandharvas, and appeared to be mantled in Vedic beauty.

It was adorned with dhavas and kakubhas and kadambas and cocas, with kuruvakas and ketakas and jambus and patalas, with nyagrodhas and varunakas and vatsanabhas and bilwas, with saralas and kapitthas, and piyalas and salas, and palmyras, with badaris and kundas and punnagas, and asokas and amras and kovidaras and champakas and panasas, and other trees laden with flowers and fruit. That asrama was also decked with the straight stems of the sweet banana.

Truly, that hermitage was adorned with diverse trees laden with fruit that formed the food of many kinds of birds. Heaps of the ashes of sacrificial fires were scattered all around, adding to the beauty of the scene. It abounded with ruru deer, monkeys, tigers, lions and leopards, with deer of diverse species and peacocks, and with wild cats and snakes. Indeed, many bison and bears could also be seen there.

Pleasant breezes blew bearing the melodious voices of Apsaras. The murmur of mountain streams and springs, the sweet notes of winged choristers, the deep grunts of elephants, the delicious strains of kinnaras, and the auspicious voices of ascetics singing the Samans, and other kinds of music, rendered that asrama utterly charming.

The mind cannot imagine another asrama as delightful as the one I saw. There were large housings for the sacred fire, all covered with flowering creepers. It was adorned with the clear and sacred water of the river Ganga. The daughter of Jahnu always lived there.

Many sannyasis, the foremost of all righteous men, endowed with great souls, and who resembled Agni himself in tejas, were its ornaments. Some of those ascetics subsisted on air and some on water, some were devoted to japa, and some were engaged in purifying their souls by practising the virtues of compassion, while some among them were yogins devoted to yoga dhyana.

Some amongst them subsisted upon only smoke, and some on fire, and some on milk. Thus was that asrama adorned with many great and evolved men. And some there had taken the vow of eating and drinking like cows; they no longer used their hands. And some used only two pieces of stone to husk their grain, and some used only their teeth. And some existed by drinking only the rays of the moon, and some by drinking only froth. And some had vowed to live like deer.

There were some who lived on the fruits of the ficus tree, and others who survived on water. Some dressed themselves in rags and some in animal skins and some in barks of trees. Indeed, I saw diverse ascetics of the best orders observing these and other painful vratas. I then wished to enter that asrama.

That retreat was honoured and adored by the Devas and all high-souled beings, by Siva, and by all righteous creatures. It stood in all its beauty on the breast of Himavat, like the moon in the sky. The mongoose sported there with the snake, and the tiger with the deer, as friends, forgetting their natural enmity, and this was because of the blissful tejas of those sannyasis of blazing tapasya and for their proximity to those Mahatmans.

As soon as I entered that asrama, enchanting to all creatures, inhabited by many great Brahmanas, all knowers of the Vedas and their angas, and by many high-souled Rishis celebrated for their difficult vratas, I saw a mighty Rishi with matted locks on his head and dressed in rags, who seemed to blaze forth like fire with his tapasya and tejas. Waited upon by his disciples and of tranquil soul, that foremost of Brahmanas was young. His name was Upamanyu.

I bowed to him and he said, "You are welcome, you of eyes like lotus petals. Today, with your visit, we see that our penances have borne fruit. You are worthy of our adoration, yet you revere us. You are worthy of being seen, but you come to see me."

With folded hands, I asked him about the well-being of the animals and birds that lived in his asrama, about the progress of his spiritual advancement, and his disciples. The illustrious Upamanyu said to me sweetly, "Krishna, you will undoubtedly have a son like yourself. Gratify Isana, the Lord of all creatures, with stern tapasya.

That divine master sports here with his wife beside him. It was here that in ancient times the Devas with all the Rishis pleased him with their penances and celibacy, their truth and self-restraint, and had their wishes fulfilled. That illustrious God is the infinite vessel of all tejas and tapasya.

Projecting into existence and withdrawing once more unto himself all good and evil things, that inconceivable deity whom you seek lives here with his wife. The Danava Hiranyakashipu, whose strength was so great that he could shake the very mountains of Meru, succeeded in obtaining from Mahadeva the power of all the Devas and enjoyed it for ten millions of years.

Mandara, foremost among all Hiranyakashipu's sons, also has a boon from Siva and succeeded in fighting Indra for a million years. Vishnu's terrible Sudarsana Chakra and Indra's vajra, both, could not make the slightest impact upon the body of that great cause of universal affliction.

The discus that you bear was given to you by Mahadeva after he had slain a Daitya who was proud of his strength and once lived within the waters. Siva created that chakra, blazing with energy like Agni. Wonderful and irresistible, he gave it to you. Because of its blazing energy no one could look upon it other than Siva Pinakin himself.

Indeed, it was for this reason that Siva named it Sudarsana. From that time the name Sudarsana came to be used in all the worlds. Krishna, even that weapon failed to have the slightest effect on the body of Hiranyakashipu's son Mandara, who appeared like an evil planet in the three worlds. Having obtained a boon from Mahadeva, hundreds of chakras like yours and thunderbolts like those of Indra, could not inflict even a scratch on the body of that malignant planet.

Afflicted by the mighty Mandara, the Devas fought hard but in vain against him and his supporters, all of whom had received boons from Mahadeva. Pleased with another Danava named Vidyutprabha, Siva granted to him the sovereignty of the three worlds. That Danava remained the ruler of the three worlds for a hundred thousand years.

And Mahadeva said to him, 'You will become one of my ganas.' He further bestowed upon him the boon of a hundred million sons. The Lord of all creatures further gave the Danava the realm of Kusadwipa for his kingdom.

Another great Asura, Satamukha, was created by Brahma. For a hundred years he poured the flesh of his own body on the sacrificial fire as an offering to Siva. Gratified with such tapasya, Sankara said to him, ‘What can I do for you?’

Satamukha replied, ‘Let me have the power of creating new creatures. Give me also eternal power.’

Siva said to him, ‘So be it.’

In earlier times, Swayambhu Brahma, concentrating his mind in yoga, performed a yagna for three hundred years, with the aim of having children. Mahadeva granted him a thousand sons with the attributes befitting the merits of the sacrifice.

Krishna, you doubtless know him who is praised by the Devas. The Rishi Yajnavalkya is exceptionally virtuous. By adoring Mahadeva he has acquired great fame. The great ascetic Vyasa, who is Parasara’s son, with soul set on yoga, has gained great renown by adoring Sankara.

One day the Balakhilyas were disregarded by Indra. In anger, they worshipped Siva. That Lord of the universe, thus gratified by the Balakhilyas, said to them, ‘By your tapasya, you will succeed in creating a bird that will rob Indra of the amrita.’

In the past, on account of the wrath of Mahadeva, all the waters of the world disappeared. The Devas worshipped him by performing the Saptakapala yagna, and through his grace caused other waters to flow. Truly, when he was pleased, water once more appeared in the world.

The wife of Atri, who knew the Vedas well, left him in anger and said, ‘I shall no longer live in subjection to that sannyasi.’ And she sought the protection of Siva. Through fear of her lord, Atri spent three hundred years without all food. And all this time she slept on wooden blocks to gratify Bhava.

Mahadeva appeared before her and smilingly said to her, ‘You shall have a son. And you will get that son without needing a husband, but just through the grace of Rudra. That son, born in his father’s vamsa, will be celebrated for his worth, and take a name after you.’

Devoted to Siva, the illustrious Vikarna also successfully gratified him with severe tapasya.

Sakalya, too, adored Bhava in a mental sacrifice that he performed for nine hundred years. Pleased with him the illustrious deity said to him, 'You will become a great Kavi. Your fame will be boundless in the three worlds. Your vamsa also will be infinite and will be adorned by many great Rishis that shall take birth in it. Your son will become the foremost of Brahmanas and will arrange the Sutras of your work.'

In the Krita yuga there was a celebrated Rishi of the name of Savarni. Here, in this asrama, he underwent austere penance for six thousand years. Siva said to him, 'I am pleased with you, sinless one. Without being subject to decay or death, you will become a poet renowned through all the worlds.'

In ancient days, in Varanasi, Sakra, filled with bhakti, adored Mahadeva who is clothed by empty space and who is smeared with ashes. Having done so, Indra obtained the sovereignty of the Devas.

Once Narada, too, adored the great Bhava with a devoted heart. Gratified with him, Mahadeva, that guru of the divine guru, said, 'No one will be your equal in tejas and tapasya. You will always attend upon me with your singing and your vina.'

Krishna, hear also how I succeeded in obtaining a sight of that God of gods, that master of all creatures; hear also in detail for what purpose. With senses and mind subdued I invoked that Deva of supreme energy. I will tell you all that I succeeded in obtaining from Maheswara, that God of gods.

In the Krita yuga there was a famed Rishi named Vyaghrapada. He was celebrated for his knowledge and mastery over the Vedas and their angas. I was born as the son of that Rishi, and Dhaumya as my younger brother.

Once, accompanied by Dhaumya, I came upon the asrama of certain evolved Rishis. There I saw a cow that was being milked. I saw the milk and it resembled amrita itself in taste. I then came home, and impelled by childishness, I said to my mother, 'Give me some food prepared with milk.'

There was no milk in the house, and so my mother was saddened by my asking for it. My mother took a lump of cooked rice and boiled it in water. The water became white and my mother placed it before us saying that it was milk and told us to drink it.

Once before this I had drunk milk when my father took me to the house of some of our great kinsmen at the time of a yagna. A divine cow, who delights the Devas, was being milked. Drinking her milk that was like amrita in taste, I knew what the qualities of milk were. I knew at once what our mother had set before us as milk. Its taste gave me no pleasure at all.

Again, I childishly said to my mother, ‘This, O mother, is not any preparation of milk.’

Filled with sorrow at this, and embracing me lovingly and sniffing the top of my head, Madhava, she said to me, ‘My child, where can ascetics of pure souls get food prepared with milk? We live in the forest and subsist upon bulbs and roots and fruits. Where will we, who live by the banks of rivers that are the resort of the Balakhilyas, we who have mountains and forests for our home, from where shall we get milk?

We live sometimes on air and sometimes on water. We dwell in the hearts of forests. We habitually abstain from all kinds of food that are eaten by those who live in villages and towns. We are accustomed to only such food as the wilderness provides. Child, there cannot be any milk in the wilderness where there are no offspring of Surabhi.

Dwelling on the banks of rivers or in caves or on mountainsides, or in tirthas and other wild places, we pass our time in the practice of tapasya and the chanting of sacred mantras, with Siva as our highest refuge. Without gratifying him of unfading glory, he who has three eyes, from where can one obtain food prepared with milk or grand robes and other objects of worldly enjoyment?

Devote yourself, dear son, to Sankara with your whole soul. Through his grace you are sure to receive all that will satisfy your desires.’

On hearing these words of my mother, I joined my hands in reverence and bowing to her, said, ‘O mother, who this Mahadeva? In what manner can one gratify him? Where does that God dwell? How can he be seen? With what is he seen? What also is the form of Sarva? How may one succeed in gaining knowledge of him? If gratified, will he show himself to me?’

Govinda, after I had said these words to my mother, with tears in her eyes she lovingly sniffed my head. Gently patting my arms, she spoke to me with great humility.

She said, ‘Mahadeva is very difficult to be known by those uncleansed souls. Impure men cannot bear him in their hearts, indeed they cannot comprehend him at all. They cannot retain him in their minds. They cannot grasp him, nor can they obtain a vision of him.

Men of wisdom aver that his forms are many. Many, again, are the places in which he dwells. Many are the forms of his grace. Who is there that can understand the deeds of Isa in all their aspects, or all the forms he has assumed in times gone by? Who can relate how he sports and how he is gratified?

Maheswara of universal form lives in the hearts of all creatures. While Munis discoursed on his auspicious and extraordinary deeds, I have heard from them how, impelled by compassion towards his bhaktas, he grants them a glimpse of himself. To honour the Brahmanas, the inhabitants of swarga recited to them the diverse forms that were taken by Mahadeva. You have asked me about these and I will recite them to you.'

My mother continued, 'Siva assumes the forms of Brahma and Vishnu and the king of the Devas, of the Rudras, the Adityas and the Aswins; and of those Devas that are called Viswadevas. He assumes the forms also of men and women, of Pretas and Pisachas, of Kiratas and Savaras, and of all marine animals. That illustrious God assumes the forms of also those Savaras that dwell in forests.

He assumes the forms of tortoises, fishes and conches. He it is that takes the forms of those corals used as ornaments by men. He assumes also the forms of Yakshas, Rakshasas and Nagas, of Daityas and Danavas. Indeed, he assumes the forms of all those creatures that live hidden in hollows.

He takes the forms of tigers and lions and deer, of wolves and bears and birds, of owls and of jackals as well. It is he that assumes the forms of swans and crows and peacocks, of chameleons and lizards and storks. He it is that assumes the forms of cranes and vultures and chakravakas. Truly, it is he that assumes the forms of chasas and of mountains.

It is Mahadeva that assumes the forms of cows and elephants and horses and camels and donkeys. He also takes the forms of goats and leopards, and diverse other animals. It is Siva who assumes the forms of a variety of birds of beautiful plumage. It is Mahadeva who assumes the forms of men with staffs and those with umbrellas and those with swords, among Brahmanas.

He sometimes becomes six-faced and sometimes multi-faced. He sometimes assumes forms having three eyes and forms having many heads. And he sometimes assumes forms having many millions of legs and forms having countless bellies and faces, and forms with many arms and sides. He sometimes appears surrounded by innumerable bhutas and pretas, spirits and ghosts.

He it is that assumes the forms of Rishis and Gandharvas, and of Siddhas and Charanas. His form is sometimes rendered white with the ashes he smears on it and is adorned with a half-moon on his forehead. Adored with diverse mantras uttered in diverse kinds of voice and worshipped with diverse mantras filled with encomiums, he, that is sometimes called Sarva, is the destroyer of all creatures in the universe, and it is upon him, again, that all creatures rest.

Mahadeva is the soul of all creatures. He pervades all things. He discourses on dharma and karmas. He dwells everywhere, in the hearts of all creatures in the universe. He knows the desires of each of his devotees. He becomes one with the object which one reveres. If it pleases you, do you seek his protection.

He sometimes rejoices, and sometimes yields to wrath, and at others utters a deafening humkara. At times, he sometimes arms himself with the chakra, at times with the trisula, at times with the gada, sometimes with the Pinaka, and sometimes with the khatvanga. He it is that assumes the form of Sesha who holds the world on his head.

He has snakes for his girdle, and his ears are adorned with earrings that are snakes. Snakes form also the sacred thread he wears. His upper garment is an elephant skin. He sometimes laughs and at others sings, and sometimes dances most wondrously and madly.

Surrounded by many spirits and ghosts, he plays on musical instruments. Diverse are these instruments, and sweet are their sounds. He roams across cremations grounds, yawns, cries, and makes others weep.

He assumes the guise of one who is mad, and also of one who is intoxicated, and he sometimes speaks words that are exceedingly sweet. He laughs fiercely, frightening all creatures with his dreadful eyes. He sleeps and remains awake and sometimes yawns as he pleases.

He recites sacred mantras and becomes the deity of those mantras. He performs tapasya and becomes the one who is adored by those penances. He makes gifts and receives those very gifts; at times he immerses himself in yoga and at times becomes the object of the yoga dhyana of others.

He may be seen on the vedi, the sacrificial platform, or in the stamba, the sacrificial stake; in the goshala or in the Agni. Again, he may not be seen there. He may be seen as a child or as an old man. He dallies with the daughters and the wives of the Rishis.

His hair is long and straight. He is perfectly naked, for he has the sky for his raiment. He has terrifying eyes. He is fair, he is dark; he is dark, he is pale; he is the colour of smoke, and he is red. He has big and fierce eyes. Akasa is his covering and it is he who covers all things.

Who is there that can comprehend the limits of Mahadeva who is formless, who is one and indivisible, who conjures up illusions, who is the cause of all creation and destruction in the universe, who assumes the form of Hiranyagarbha, and who is without beginning and without end, and who is without birth?

He lives in the heart of every creature. He is the prana, he is Manas, and he is the Jiva. He is the soul of yoga, and it is that which is called yoga. He is the yoga dhyana into which yogins enter. He is the Paramatman. Indeed Maheswara, the purity in essence, can be understood not by the senses but only through the Atman seizing his existence.

He plays on many musical instruments. He sings. He has a hundred thousand eyes, he has one mouth, he has two mouths, he has three mouths, and he has many mouths. Devote yourself to him, set your heart upon him, depend upon him, and accept him as your only refuge; you adore Mahadeva and then you will have the fruits of all your wishes.'

Hearing these words of my mother, from that day my devotion was focused solely on Mahadeva. I applied myself to the practice of the austerest penances to gratify him. For one thousand years I stood on my left toe.

After that I passed one thousand years subsisting only upon fruits. The next one thousand years I lived on the fallen leaves of trees. The next thousand years I passed subsisting upon water only. After that I passed seven hundred years on air alone.

In this way, I adored Siva for a full thousand years of the Devas. After this, the Master of the universe was gratified with me. Wanting to know whether I was solely devoted to him and him alone, he appeared before me in the form of Sakra surrounded by all the Devas.

As the celebrated Sakra, he had a thousand eyes and was armed with the vajra. And he rode on a pure white elephant with four tusks, with eyes red, ears folded, the temporal juice trickling down his cheeks, with trunk contracted, and terrifying to behold. Indeed, riding on such an elephant, the illustrious chief of the Devas seemed to blaze forth with splendour.

With a beautiful crown on his head and adorned with garlands round his neck and bracelets round his arms, he neared where I stood. A white chatra was held over his head. And he was waited upon by many Apsaras, and many Gandharvas sang his praise. Addressing me, he said, 'Dvijottama, I am pleased with you. Ask me for whatever boon you desire.'

These words of Sakra did not please me. Krishna, I answered him in these words: 'I do not desire any boon from you or any other god. I tell you truly that it is only from Mahadeva that I seek boons. That I say to you is nothing but the truth.

Only words which relate to Maheswara fill me with joy. At the command of Pasupati, I am ready to become a worm or a tree with many branches. If I do not receive the blessings of Mahadeva's boons, the very sovereignty of the three worlds would not be acceptable to me.

Let me be born among the very Chandalas but let me still be devoted to the feet of Siva. Without being devoted to him, I would not like to be born in the palace of Indra himself. If a man lacks devotion to him, that master of the Devas and the Asuras, he will suffer even if he can subsist upon only air and water for want of food.

No other discourses on dharma are needed by those who live every moment thinking of the feet of Mahadeva. When the Kali yuga comes, one must devote one's heart every moment to Mahadeva.

One that has drunk the amrita of devotion to Siva is freed from the fear of samsara. One that has not obtained the grace of Mahadeva can never succeed in devoting oneself to him for a single day, or for half a day, or for a muhurta, or even for a kshana or a lava. At the command of Mahadeva I would cheerfully become a worm or an insect, but I have no wish for even the sovereignty of the three worlds, if you, Sakra, were to bestow it upon me.

At his word I would become even a dog. In fact, that would be my highest wish. If not given by Maheswara, I would not have the sovereignty of the very Devas. I do not wish to have dominion over swarga. I do not wish to have the sovereignty of the celestials. I do not wish to have the realm of Brahma. Indeed, I do not even wish to have moksha, that cessation of individual existence and a complete identification with Brahman.

But I want to become the dasa of Hara. As long as that Lord of all creatures, with crown on his head and luminous body of the moon, does not become gratified with me, so long shall I endure all the afflictions, due to a hundred cycles of decay, death and birth that befall all embodied beings.

Who can obtain peace without gratifying Rudra, who is free from decay and death, who is imbued with the effulgence of the sun, the moon, or the fire, who is the root or original cause of everything real and unreal in the three worlds, and who exists as one indivisible entity? If I am reborn because of my faults, I will, in those new births, devote myself solely to Mahadeva.'

Indra said, 'What reason can you assign for the existence of a Supreme Being or for his being the cause of all causes?'

I, Upamanyu, said, 'I solicit boons from that great deity named Siva who has been described as existent and non-existent, manifest and unmanifest, eternal and immutable, one and many. I solicit boons from Him who is without beginning and middle and end, who is knowledge and puissance, who is inconceivable and who is the Paramatman. I solicit boons from he from whom comes all power, who has not been created by anyone, who is immutable, and who, though himself not sprung from any seed, is the seed of all things in the universe.

I solicit boons from him who is blazing effulgence, beyond tamas, who is the essence of all tapasya, who transcends all our faculties that we may use to understand him, and by knowing whom we are liberated from sorrow. Purandara, I worship him who is conversant with the creation of all elements and the thought of all living beings, and who is the original cause of the existence or creation of all creatures, who is omnipresent, and who has the power to give everything.

I solicit boons from him who cannot be grasped by reason, who is the focus of the Samkhya and the yoga systems of philosophy, and who transcends all things, and whom all wise men worship and adore. I solicit boons from him who is the soul of Maghavat himself, who is said to be the God of the gods, and who is the master of all creatures.

I solicit boons from him who it is that first created Brahma, Creator of all the worlds, having filled space with his energy and brought the primeval egg into existence. Who else than that Supreme Lord could be the creator of Agni, Jala, Vayu, Bhumi, Akasa and Manas, and that which is called Mahat?

Sakra, tell me, who else than Siva could create Manas, Buddhi, Chitta or Ahamkara, the Tanmatras, and the indriyas? Who is there higher than Siva?

The wise say that Brahma is the Creator of this universe. Brahma, however, acquired his puissance and prosperity by worshipping and gratifying Mahadeva. Consisting of the three attributes of creation, preservation and destruction, that power, which dwells in that illustrious Being who is endowed with the quality of being One, who created Brahma, Vishnu and Rudra, was derived from Mahadeva. Tell me who is there that is superior to the Supreme Lord?

Considering the sovereignty and oppressive power of the Daityas and the Danavas, who else can unite the sons of Diti and confer upon them power and dominion? Know that the different points of the horizon, time, the sun, all fiery entities, the planets, wind, water, and the stars and constellations come from Mahadeva. Tell me who is higher than the Supreme Lord?

Who else is there, other than Mahadeva, in the matter of the creation of sacrifice and the destruction of Tripura? Who else other than Mahadeva, that Parantapa, has given regency to the principal Devas?

What need is there of clever and refined speech, when I behold you of a thousand eyes, best of the Devas, who are worshipped by Siddhas, Gandharvas and the other Devas and the Rishis? All this is due to the blessings of Mahadeva.'

Krishna, know that this all, consisting of animate and inanimate existences with swarga and other unseen entities, which occur in this world, and which has the all-pervading Lord for their soul, has flowed from Maheswara and has been created by him for the Jiva's enjoyment. In the worlds that are known as Bhur, Bhuvah, Svah, and Maha, in the midst of the mountains of lokaloka, in the islands, in the Mountains of Meru, in all things that yield happiness, and in the hearts of all creatures, there resides Mahadeva.

If the Devas and the Asuras could see any other more powerful than Siva, would both of them, especially the former when attacked by the latter, not have sought that other's protection? In all conflicts between the Devas, the Yakshas, the Uragas and the Rakshasas, which end in mutual destruction, it is Siva who assigns them their respective positions dependent upon their karma.

Tell me, who else is there than Maheswara to bestow boons upon, and then again punish Andhaka, Sukra, Dundubhi, many great Maharishis, Yakshas, Indra and Bala, and Rakshasas and the Nivatakavachas?

Was not the vital seed of Mahadeva, master of both the Devas and the Asuras, poured as a libation upon the fire? From that seed sprang a mountain of gold. Who else is there whose seed can be said to be of such power?

Who else in this world is praised for having only the very sky for his garments? Who else can be said to be a brahmacharin with his always vital seed drawn up? Who else is there that has half his body occupied by his Devi? Who else is there that has been able to subdue Kama, the god of desire?

Tell me, Indra, what other Being possesses that high realm of supreme felicity which is lauded by all the deities? Who else has the cremation ground for his playing field? Who else is there that is extolled for his dancing?

Whose puissance and worship remain immutable? Who else sports with bhutas and pretas? Tell me who else has companions who possess strength like his own and who are thus proud of that vigour and power?

Who else is there whose status is acclaimed as unchangeable and revered by the three worlds? Who else pours rain, gives heat, and blazes forth with tejas? From whom else do we derive our treasure of herbs and plants? Who else upholds all kinds of wealth? Who else sports as much as he pleases in the three worlds of mobile and immobile beings?

Indra, know Maheswara to be the original cause of everything. He is adored by yogins, by Rishis, by Gandharvas, and by Siddhas, with the help of gyana, of tapasya, and of the rites laid down in the shastras. He is adored by both the Devas and the Asuras using tapasya and karma, and the rituals laid down in the sacred scriptures.

The fruits of action can never touch him for he transcends them all. Being such, I call him the original cause of everything.

He is both sthula and sukshma, embodied and pure spirit. He is without equal. He cannot be conceived by the senses. He is both with and without attributes. He is the Lord of gunas, for he controls them. Such is Maheswara's standing.

He is the cause of the creation and preservation of the universe. He is the cause of the universe and the cause also of its destruction. He is the past, the present and the future. He is the sire of all things. Truly, he is the cause of everything.

He is that which is mutable; he is the unmanifest, he is vidya; he is avidya; he is every action, he is every omission; he is dharma and he is adharma. Him I call the cause of everything.

Indra, behold the features of both the genders in the image of Mahadeva, the Ardhanariswara. He is the cause of both creation and destruction, and unites in his body the characteristics of both male and female as the one cause of the creation of the universe. My mother told me that he is the cause of the universe and the one cause of everything.

There is no one that is higher than Isa. If it pleases you, surrender yourself to his kindness and protection. You know that the universe has sprung from the union of the sexes, as represented by Mahadeva. You know the universe to be the sum of what is endowed with attributes and what else is divested of attributes and has the seeds of Brahma and others for its immediate cause.

Brahma and Indra and Hutasana and Vishnu and all the other Devas, along with the Daityas and the Asuras, crowned with the fruition of a thousand desires, always say that there is none that is higher than Mahadeva. I am compelled to seek that God known to all the mobile and immobile universe, he who has been spoken of as the highest of all the gods, and who is auspiciousness itself, so that I may attain, without delay, mukti, that highest of all acquisitions.

What need is there to find any more evidence to prove what I believe? The supreme Mahadeva is the cause of all causes. We have never heard that the Devas worship the emblem of another god. Tell me, if you ever heard of any other whose sign has been or is being worshipped by all the deities?

He whose emblem is always worshipped by Brahma, by Vishnu, by you Indra, with all the other Devas, is the foremost of all deities. Brahma has for his sign the lotus, Vishnu has for his the discus, and Indra has the thunderbolt. But the creatures of the world do not bear any of these.

On the other hand, all creatures bear the signs that mark Mahadeva and Uma. Hence, all creatures must be regarded as belonging to Maheswara. All creatures of the female sex, have their origin in Uma's nature, and so bear the mark of femininity, the yoni that distinguishes her; all creatures that are male, having sprung from Siva, bear the masculine mark, the linga that distinguishes him.

Anyone who says that there is, in the three worlds with their mobile and immobile creatures, any other cause than the Supreme Lord, and that which is not marked with the mark of either Mahadeva or his consort should be regarded as wretched and should not be counted among the creatures of the universe. Every being with the mark of the male sex should be known to be of Isana, while every being with the mark of the female sex should be known to be of Uma. This universe of mobile and immobile creatures has either a male or female form.

It is from Mahadeva that I wish to obtain boons. Failing in this, I would prefer death itself. Slayer of Bala, go or remain as you wish. I wish to have boons or curses from Mahadeva. No other deity shall I ever accept, nor would I want my wishes to be granted by any other.'

Having said these words to Indra, I was overwhelmed with grief at the thought of Mahadeva not having been gratified with me despite my severe austerities. However, in an instant, I saw the celestial elephant before me transformed into a bull as white as a swan, or the jasmine flower, or a stalk of the lotus, or silver, or an ocean of milk.

Of a massive body, the tuft of its tail was black and the colour of its eyes was brown like honey. Its horns were hard as steel and had the colour of gold. With their sharp red points, the bull seemed to cleave the earth. The animal was adorned all over with ornaments made of the purest gold.

Its face and hooves and nose and ears were exceedingly beautiful and its loins well-formed. Its flanks were handsome and its neck was broad. Its whole form was utterly beautiful to behold. Its hump radiated great beauty and appeared to occupy the whole of its shoulder. And it looked like the peak of a mountain of snow or like a cliff of white clouds in the sky.

Upon the back of that animal I saw seated the illustrious Mahadeva along with Uma. He shone like the lord of stars, the moon while he is at his full. The fire born of his energy was brilliant like the lightning that flashes amidst clouds. It looked as if a thousand suns rose there, filling every side with dazzling splendour. The tejas of the Supreme Lord was like the Samvartaka fire which destroys all creatures at the end of the yuga.

Suffused with that tejas, the sky darkened and I could see nothing. I was filled with anxiety and wondered what it could mean. That dark energy did not pervade every side for long, through Siva's illusion, and soon the horizon cleared.

I then saw Maheswara seated on the back of his bull, of blessed and benign appearance and looking like a smokeless fire. And the Great God was accompanied by Parvati of unblemished features. Indeed, I beheld Nilakanta, blue-throated Sthanu, detached from everything, that wielder of all kinds of force, as having eighteen arms and adorned with all kinds of ornaments.

Clad in white raiment, he wore white garlands and had white liniments smeared upon his limbs. His matchless banner was white in colour. His sacred thread was also white. With powers equal to his own, he was surrounded by his ganas, who were singing or dancing or playing on various musical instruments.

A pale crescent moon formed his crown, and set on his brow it was like the moon that rises in the winter sky. He seemed ablaze with splendour, because of his three eyes that were like three suns. The garland of the purest white on his body shone like a festoon of lotuses, adorned with jewels.

I also saw Siva's weapons in their embodied forms bursting with every kind of energy. The deity held a vari-coloured bow whose colours were like those of the rainbow.

That bow, the famed Pinaka, is really a mighty snake. Indeed, that male snake of seven heads and immense body, of ample neck, of sharp fangs and virulent poison, was twined round with the rope that served as its bowstring.

And there was a shaft as splendid as the sun or the fire that appears at the end of the yuga. Indeed, that arrow was the mighty and unrivalled Pasupata, indescribable for its power, and striking fear into every creature.

Of vast proportions, it seemed to constantly shoot out tongues of fire. It has one foot, large teeth, a thousand heads and thousand bellies, a thousand arms, a thousand tongues and a thousand eyes. It seemed to continually emit fire.

Mahabaho, that weapon is superior to the Brahma, the Narayana, the Aindra, the Agneya, and the Varuna astras. It can make ashes of every other weapon in the universe. Using that astra Mahadeva had once, burnt down the Tripura, the triad cities of the Asuras in a flash. With that single arrow, Krishna, he, Siva, achieved that impossible feat with the greatest ease.

Shot by Mahadeva's arms, that astra can consume the entire universe with all its mobile and immobile creatures in the twinkling of an eye. Everyone in the universe, including even Brahma and Vishnu and the Devas, that weapon can slay. I saw that incomparable astra in the hand of Mahadeva.

There is another mysterious and powerful weapon which is equal, even superior to the Pasupata. I also saw that one. It is celebrated in all the worlds as the sum of the Sula-armed Mahadeva. Cast by him, it can rive the earth, dry up the waters of the ocean or indeed annihilate the universe.

In the past that Sula made ashes of Yuvanaswa's son, King Mandhatri, conqueror of the three worlds, ruler of a vast empire and endowed with prodigious energy, along with all his army. Mighty, and like Sakra himself in prowess was Mandhatri, but the Rakshasa Lavana killed him with the Sula which he received from Siva.

The Sula has such sharp prongs that they verge on being invisible. It can terrify all and make the hair of the mightiest stand on end. I saw that trident in Mahadeva's hand, and it seemed to roar with rage, having contracted its forehead into three furrows. It resembled, Krishna, a smokeless fire or the sun that rises at the end of the yuga. The handle of that Sula, was a mighty snake. It is indescribable. It looked like Yama himself armed with his noose with which he draws out souls from living creatures. I saw this astra in the hand of Mahadeva.

I beheld also another weapon, the battle-axe Khatvanga, which the gratified Siva once gave to Parasurama Bhargava and with which Rama exterminates all the Kshatriyas of the world. It was with this weapon that Rama destroyed the great Kartavirya in furious battle. It was with that weapon that Jamadagni's son was able to annihilate the Kshatriyas on twenty-one occasions.

Searingly sharp, that axe hung on Siva's shoulder, adorned with his snake. Indeed, it glowed on Mahadeva's body like the flame of a blazing fire. I saw many other divine weapons with Mahadeva. I have named only a few most important ones.

On the left side of the Great God was Brahma seated on a chariot drawn by swans swift as the mind. On the same side Vishnu could also be seen riding on Garuda, and bearing the sankha, chakra and gada.

Close to the Goddess Parvati was Skanda on his peacock, bearing his deadly arrow and bells, and looking like another Agni. In front of Mahadeva stood Nandi armed with his Sula and looking like a second formidable Siva.

The Munis led by Manu and Rishis led by Bhrigu, and the Devas with Indra at their head, all came there. All the tribes of bhutas and pretas, and the divine matrikas, stood surrounding Mahadeva and worshipping him.

The Devas were singing hymns in his praise. Brahma recited a Rathantara to praise Mahadeva. Narayana chanted the Jyeshta Saman to eulogise him and Indra did the same with the Sata-Rudriyam.

Brahma, Narayana and Sakra shone there like three sacrificial fires. In their midst the illustrious Siva blazed like Surya in the midst of his corona, emerged from behind dark clouds. I beheld many suns and moons in the sky. I then praised the illustrious Lord of everything, the supreme master of the universe.

Upamanyu continued,[2] "I said, 'Salutations to you, illustrious one, you that are the refuge of all things, you that are called Mahadeva! Salutations to you that assume the form of Sakra, that are Sakra, and that disguise yourself in the form and robes of Sakra.

Salutations to you that are armed with the thunderbolt, to you that are tawny, and you that are always armed with the Pinaka. Salutations to you that always bear the conch and the trisula.

Salutations to you that are clad in black, to you that have dark and matted hair, to you that possess a dark deer-skin for your upper garment, to you that preside over the eighth lunation of the dark fortnight. Salutations to you that are of white complexion, to you that are called auspicious, to you that are clad in white robes, to you that have limbs smeared with white ashes, to you that are ever engaged in pure deeds.

Salutations to you that are red in colour, to you that are clad in red vestments, to you that have a red banner with red pennants, to you that wear red garlands and use red unguents. Salutations to you that are brown in colour, to you that are clad in brown vestments, to you that have a brown banner with brown pennants, to you that wear brown garlands and use brown liniments.

Salutations to you that have the royal parasol over your head, to you that wear the best of crowns. Salutations unto you that are adorned with half a garland and half an armlet, to you that are decked with one ring for one year, to you that are endowed with the speed of the mind, to you that are filled with great refulgence. Salutations to you that are the foremost of deities, to you that are the foremost of ascetics, to you that are the foremost of divinities.

Salutations to you that wear half a wreath of lotuses, to you that cover your body with many lotuses. Salutations to you that have half your body smeared with sandalwood paste, to you that have half your body decked with garlands of flowers and smeared with fragrant oils.

Salutations to you that are of the complexion of the sun, you are like Surya, to you whose face is like that of the sun, to you whose eyes are each like the sun. Salutations to you that are Soma, to you that are as gentle as the moon, to you that bear the lunar disc on your brow, to you that are of lustre like the moon, to you that are the foremost of all creatures, to you that are adorned with bright teeth.

Salutations to you that are of a dark complexion, to you that are of a fair complexion, to you that have a form half-tawny and half-white, to you that has a body half-male and half-female, to you that are both male and female. Salutations to you that have Nandi for your vahana, to you that ride on the most majestic of elephants, to you that are obtained with difficulty, to you that can easily access places inaccessible to others.

Salutations to you whose praises are sung by the Ganas, to you that are devoted to the Ganas, to you that follow the path of the Ganas, to you that are steadfast in your devotion to the Ganas.

Salutations to you that are white like the clouds, to you that glow like the evening clouds, to you that are indescribable, to you that are unique and incomparable.

Salutations to you that wears a beautiful red garland, to you that are dressed in red robes. Salutations to you that wears a jewelled crown, to you that are adorned with a crescent moon, to you that have eight flowers on your head.

Salutations to you that have a fiery mouth and burning eyes, to you that have eyes as lustrous as a thousand moons, to you that have the form of fire, to you that are handsome and enchanting, to you that are inconceivable and mysterious. Salutations to you that range through the firmament, to you that love and dwell in the pastures of cows, to you that walk on the earth, to you that are the earth, to you that are infinite, to you that are auspicious.

Salutations to you that are digambara, clothed only by the sky, to you that make a joyful home of every place in which you find yourself. Salutations to you that have the universe for your home, to you that have both knowledge and grace for your Soul.

Salutations to you that wears a crown, to you that wears a magnificent armlet, to you that has a snake for the garland round your neck, to you that wears many beautiful ornaments. Salutations to you that have Surya, Chandramas and Agni for your three eyes, to you that possess a thousand eyes, to you that are both male and female, to you that are without gender, to you that are a Samkhya, to you that are a yogin.

Salutations to you that are of the grace of those Devas who are worshipped in yagnas, to you that are the Atharvans, to you who alleviate all kinds of disease and pain, to you that dispel every sorrow. Salutations to you that roar like resounding thunder, to you that create illusions, to you that preside over the soil and over the seed that is sown in it, to you that are the Creator of everything.

Salutations to you that are the Lord of all the Devas, to you that are the master of the universe, to you that are swift like the wind, to you that are of the form of the wind. Salutations to you that wear a garland of gold, to you that sport on hills and mountains, to you that are adored by all the Asuras, to you that possess fierce speed and energy.

Salutations to you that tore out one of Brahma's heads, to you that slew Mahishasura, to you that assume three forms, to you that bear every form. Salutations to you that are the destroyer of the Tripura of the Asuras, to you that are the destroyer of Daksha's yagna, to you that are the destroyer of Kama's body, to you that wield the rod of destruction.

Salutations to you that are Skanda, to you that are Visakha, to you that are the staff of the Brahmana, to you that are Bhava, to you that are Sarva, to you that are of universal form. Salutations to you that are Isana, to you that are the destroyer of Bhaga, to you that are the slayer of Andhaka, to you that are the universe, to you that are possess maya, to you that are both conceivable and inconceivable.

You are the one goal of all creatures, you are the foremost, and you are the heart of everything. You are Brahma of all the Devas, you are the Nilardhita of the Rudras. You are the Atman of the creatures, you are he that is called Purusha by the Samkhyas, you are the Rishabha among all things sacred, you are that which is called auspicious by yogins and which, according to them, is indivisible.

Among those in the various asramas, you are the grihasta, you are the great Lord amongst the lords of the universe. You are Kubera among the Yakshas, and you are Vishnu among all sacrifices.

You are Meru among mountains, you are the moon among all luminaries of the firmament, you are Vasishta amongst Rishis, and you are Surya among the planets. You are the lion among all wild beasts, and among domestic animals you are the bull that is worshipped by all men.

Among the Adityas you are Vishnu, among the Vasus you are Pavaka, among birds you are Garuda, and among snakes you are Ananta. Among the Vedas you are the Saman, among the Yajuses you are the Sata-Rudriyam, among yogins you are Sanatkumara, and among Samkhyas you are Kapila.

Among the Maruts you are Sakra, among the Pitris you are Devarata, among all the realms created for living you are Brahmaloka, and among all the ends that creatures attain to, you are moksha. You are the ocean of milk among oceans, among all lofty mountains you are Himavat, among all the varnas you are the Brahmana, and among all learned Brahmanas you are he that has undergone and is observant of the Diksha.

You are the sun among all things in the world, you are the destroyer Kaala. You are whatever else possesses the superior tejas of eminence that exists in the universe. You are supremely powerful. This is my certain conclusion.

Salutations to you, you that are kind to all your devotees. Salutations to you, Lord of yogins. I bow to you, the original cause of the universe. Be you gratified with me, your worshipper dejected and powerless; Eternal Lord, you become the refuge of this weak and wretched one who adores you.

It is fitting for you to pardon all my sins, taking pity on me because I am your devoted worshipper. I was mystified by you, on account of the disguise in which you appeared before me. O Maheswara, I did not even give you the arghya or padya to wash your feet.'

Having sung the praises of Isana in this way, I offered him, with great devotion, water to wash his feet and the ingredients of the arghya, and then, with folded hands, I surrendered myself to him, being prepared to do whatever he commanded.

An auspicious shower of flowers fell upon my head, possessing divine fragrance and sprinkled with cool water-drops. The Gandharvas began to play on their drums. A perfumed breeze began to blow and fill me with delight.

Then Mahadeva accompanied by his wife, having been gratified with me, addressed the divinities gathered there, his words filling me with great joy, 'Behold, you Devas, the devotion of Upamanyu. It is steadfast and great, and entirely immutable, for it exists unalterably.'

Thus addressed by the great God armed with the Sula, the Devas bowed before him and said with reverence, 'Illustrious one, God of the gods, master of the universe, Lord of all, let this Dvijottama obtain from you the fruit of all his desires.'

Thus addressed by all the Devas including Brahma, Mahadeva, also called Isa and Sankara, said these words as if smiling upon me. Sankara said, 'Upamanyu, I am pleased with you. Foremost of Munis, learned Rishi, you are firmly devoted to me and have been well you tested by me. I have been delighted with you because of your bhakti. Today I will satisfy all your desires.'

Thus addressed by Mahadeva, so great was my emotion that I wept tears of joy and my hair stood on end. Kneeling down and bowing to him, with a voice choked with rapture, I said to him, 'Siva, I feel that until now I did not live and that only today have I been born, and that my birth has borne fruit today, since I am now in the presence of Him who is the master of both the Devas and the Asuras!

Who else is more praiseworthy than I, since my eyes behold him of immeasurable power, whom the very Devas cannot see without worship? The wise and the learned say that the highest of all subjects, which is eternal, which is distinguished from all else, which is unborn, which is gyana, which is indestructible, is identical with you; you that are the beginning of all, you that are immortal and unchanging, you that know the laws that govern all things, you that are the foremost of Purushas, you that are the highest of the high.

You are he that created from your right side Brahma, the Creator of all things. You are he that has created from your left side Vishnu to preserve that creation. You are that puissant Lord who created Rudra at the end of the yuga for the dissolution of that creation.

That Rudra, who sprang from you destroyed creation with all its moving and immobile beings, assuming the form of Kaala, of the cloud Samvartaka full of water which all the oceans cannot hold, and of the all-consuming fire. When the time for the dissolution of the universe arrives, that Rudra stands ready to swallow it.

You are that Mahadeva, who is the original Creator of the universe with all that it contains. You are he who, at the end of the kalpa, withdraws all things into yourself. You are he that permeates all things, are the soul of all things, for you are the Creator of the creator of all things.

You cannot be seen even by the Devas; you are he that encompasses all entities. If you are gratified with me and if you can grant me boons, let this be my one boon, Lord of all the gods—that my devotion to you may remain unwavering. Let me, through your grace, have knowledge of the present, the past and the future. Let me, with all my kinsmen and friends, always eat food mixed with milk. And you, O celebrated Lord, always be present in our asrama.'

Mahatejasvin Maheswara, that Jagadguru of all things, who is worshipped by all, spoke these words to me.

Siva said, 'Be you free from every sorrow and pain, and above decay and death. May you possess fame, be filled with great tejas, and let atma-gyana be yours. Through my blessings, you will always be sought after by the Rishis.

May your conduct ever be good and righteous, may every desirable attribute be yours, may you obtain universal knowledge, and may you be radiant and handsome. Let your youth be undiminished, and let your energy be like that of fire. Wherever you desire the presence of the Kshirasagara, ocean of milk, there that ocean will appear before you to be used by you and your friends for your food. May you and your friends always obtain food prepared with milk, and with amrita also mixed with it.

After the expiration of a kalpa you will have my companionship. Your family and kinsmen will be limitless. Your devotion to me will be eternal. And, best of Brahmanas, I shall always be present in your asrama. Live wherever you like, and without worry. Merely think of me, and I will grant you a vision of myself again.'

Having said these words, and granted me these boons, Isana, shining with the splendour of millions of suns, disappeared. Krishna, in this manner, with austere tapasya, I saw that God of gods. I also received what he said. Krishna, behold these Siddhas living here, and these Rishis and Vidyadharas and Yakshas and Gandharvas and Apsaras. Behold these trees and creepers and plants yielding all sorts of flowers and fruits. Behold them bearing the flowers of every season, with beautiful leaves, and spreading sweet fragrance all around.

Mahabaho, all these are endowed with a divine nature through the grace of that God of gods, that Supreme Lord, that Mahatman Mahadeva."' Krishna continues, 'Hearing his words and seeing before my own eyes all that he narrated to me, I was filled with wonder. I then said to Mahamuni Upamanyu, "You are worthy of great praise, for whose hermitage, other than yours, enjoys the honour of the presence of Siva? Will the great Sankara also reveal himself to me and show me kindness?”

Upamanyu said, “Without doubt, you will soon obtain a vision of Mahadeva, even as I succeeded in beholding him. I see with my spiritual eyes that you will behold Mahadeva in the sixth month from now. Foremost of the Yadavas, Maheswara and his consort will grant you twenty-four boons. I tell you this truly.

Through Siva’s grace, the past, the present and the future are known to me. The great Hara has favoured thousands of Rishis. Why will he not show you his favour?

The meeting of the gods is always praiseworthy, more so with you, with one devoted to Brahmanas, with one that is full of compassion and faith. I will give you some mantras. Chant them repeatedly. With this you are certain to gain a vision of Sankara.”’

The blessed Krishna continues, ‘I said to him, “Mahamuni, through your grace, I shall behold the Lord of the Devas, that destroyer of the whole host of Diti’s sons.”

Bhaarata, eight days passed there as but an hour, all of us being immersed in talk about Mahadeva. On the eighth day, I underwent the diksha according to the due rites at the hands of that Brahmana and received the danda from his hands. I underwent the prescribed shaving of my head. I took up some kusa blades in my hand. I wore rags for clothes. I rubbed my body with ghee. I tied a cord woven of munja grass around my waist.

For one month I lived on fruits. The second month I subsisted upon water. I passed the third, fourth and the fifth months by living on air alone. I stood all the while, foregoing sleep, supporting myself on one foot and with my arms also raised over my head.

Then I saw a blinding radiance in the sky like that of a thousand suns combined. At its heart I saw a cloud like a mass of blue hills, adorned with rows of cranes, embellished with many magnificent rainbows, with flashes of fiery lightning and thunder.

Within that cloud was the luminous Mahadeva, accompanied by Uma. The great God seemed to shine with his penances, energy, beauty, effulgence, and also his wife beside him. The puissant Maheswara and Uma shone in the midst of that cloud. He looked like the sun among a bank of clouds, with the moon by his side.

Son of Kunti, the hair on my body stood on end, and my eyes were wide with wonder upon beholding Siva, the refuge of all the Devas and the dispeller of all their sorrows. Mahadeva wore a crown on his head. He was armed with his Sula. His loins covered in tiger-skin, his hair was matted and he carried the staff of the ascetic in one of his hands. He was armed with his Pinaka and the trisula.

His teeth were sharp. His upper arm was decked with an incomparable bracelet. His sacred thread was a snake. He wore a garland of many colours on his chest, a mala reached down to his toes. I saw him like a radiant moon on a winter evening.

Surrounded by diverse clans of spirits and ghosts, he was like a sun difficult to gaze at. Eleven hundred Rudras stood around him of restrained soul and pure deeds, who was seated upon Nandin. All of them were singing his praises. The Adityas, the Vasus, the Sadhyas, the Viswadevas and the twin Aswins praised that Lord of the universe with the mantras from the shastras. The puissant Indra and his brother Upendra, the two sons of Aditi, and Pitamaha Brahma, all recited the Rathantara Saman before him.

Countless masters of yoga, all the greatest Rishis with their sons, all the Devarishis, the Devi Bhumi, the sky, the constellations, the planets, the months, the fortnights, the seasons, night, the years, the kshanas, the muhurtas, the nimeshas, the yugas one after another, all the divine vigyanas and angas of knowledge, and all beings conversant with truth, were seen bowing down before that Supreme Guru, that great Father, that giver of yoga.

Yudhishtira, I saw Sanatkumara, the Vedas, the itihasas, Marichi, Angiras, Atri, Pulastya, Pulaha, Kratu, the seven Manus, Soma, the Atharvans, and Brihaspati, Bhrigu, Daksha, Kasyapa, Vasishta, Kasya, the Chchandas, Diksha, the Yagnas, Dakshina, the Agnis, the Havis poured in sacrifices, and all the elements of the yagnas, all standing there in their embodied forms.

All the Lokapalas, all the Nadis, all the Nagas, the Parvatas, the divine Matrikas, all the Devastris and Devaputris, millions of sannyasis were seen to bow down to Him who is the soul of serenity. The mountains, the oceans and the cardinal directions also did the same, while the Gandharvas and the Apsaras sang in divine voices the praises of the ineffable Siva. The Vidyadharas, the Danavas, the Guhyakas, the Rakshasas, and all created beings, mobile and immobile, adored him in thought, word and deed.

Before me, that Lord of all the Devas appeared, seated in all his glory. Seeing that Isana had showed himself to me by being seated before my eyes, the whole universe, along with Brahma and Indra, looked at me. I, however, had not the power to look at Mahadeva.

Siva then said to me, "Look at me, Krishna, and speak to me. You have worshipped me hundreds and thousands of times. There is no one in the three worlds that is dearer to me than you."

After I had bowed to him, Devi Uma became pleased with me. I then spoke these words to Him whose praises are sung by all the Devas.'

Krishna continues, 'I bowed to Mahadeva, saying, "Salutations to you, you that are the eternal origin of all things. The Rishis say that you are the Lord of the Vedas. The righteous say that you are tapasya, you are sattva, you are rajas, you are tamas, and you are satya. You are Brahma, you are Rudra, you are Varuna, you are Agni, you are Manu, you are Bhava, you are Dhatri, you are Tvashtri, you are Vidhatri, you are the puissant master of all things, and you are everywhere.

All beings, mobile and unmoving, have sprung from you. This threefold world with all its entities has been created by you. The Rishis say that you are superior to the senses, the mind, the vital breaths, the seven sacrificial fires, all others that have their refuge in the all-pervading Soul, and all the deities that are adored and worthy of adoration. You, O illustrious one, are the Vedas, the yagnas, Soma, Dakshina, Pavaka, Havi, and all other components of sacrifice. The punya obtained through sacrifices, gifts made to others, the study of the Vedas, vratas, rules of restraint, modesty, fame, prosperity, splendour, contentment and success, all exist for the one purpose of leading to you. Desire, anger, fear, greed, pride, stupor, and malice, pain and disease, are your children.

You are the actions of all creatures, you are the joy and sorrow that flow from those deeds, you are the absence of joy and sorrow, you are that ignorance which is the indestructible seed of desire, you are the high origin of Manas, you are strength, and you are eternity.

You are the unmanifest, you are Pavana, you are inconceivable, you are the thousand-rayed sun, you are the effulgent Chit, you are the first of all the subjects, and you are the refuge of life. The use of words like Mahat, Atman, Buddhi, Brahma, Brahmanda, Sambhu, and Swayambhu recurring in the Vedas show that your nature has been judged as identical with Mahat and Atman by men conversant with the Vedas. Verily, regarding you as all this, knowing Brahmanas overcome that ignorance which lies at the root of the world.

You dwell in the heart of all creatures, and you are adored by the Rishis as Kshetrajna. Your arms and feet extend to every place, and your eyes, head and face are everywhere. You hear everywhere in the universe, and you pervade all things. You are the fruit of all acts that are performed in the nimeshas and other divisions of time that occur on account of the sun.

You are the original brilliance of the supreme Chit. You are Purusha, and you live in the hearts of all things. You are the yogic attributes of success, subtlety and grossness, and fruition and supremacy, effulgence and immutability. Understanding and intelligence, and all the worlds, rest upon you.

They that are devoted to meditation, that are always engaged in yoga, that are devoted to satya and that have subjugated their passions, seek you and rely on you. They that know you to be immutable, the one that dwells in all hearts, the one that is endowed with supreme power, or the ancient Purusha, or pure gyana, or the effulgent Chit, or the highest refuge of all wise men, are certainly of great intelligence. Truly, such men transcend intelligence.

By understanding the seven subtle entities and the tanmatras, by comprehending your six attributes, of omniscience, contentment, knowledge without beginning, independence, flawless and infinite power, and being conversant with yoga freed from every falsity, the man of knowledge succeeds in entering into your great self."

After I had said these words to Bhava, the universe, both mobile and immobile, sent up a roar to show their approval of what I said. The countless Brahmanas present there, the Devas and the Asuras, the Nagas, the Pisachas, the Pitris, the Garudas, diverse Rakshasas, bhutas and pretas, and all the Maharishis, then bowed down before that Great Deity. Showers of fragrant flowers showered down upon me and cool winds began to blow.

Siva looked at the Devi Uma and at Indra and at me and said, "Krishna, we know that you are devoted to us. Do what is for your good. My love for you is great. Ask for eight boons. I will grant them to you. Name what you wish for. However difficult to attain they may be, you will still have them.""

[2] This is Siva Sahasranama of the Mahabharata.

CANTO 15

"Krishna said, 'Bowing my head to that mass of energy and radiance, I said, "Firmness in virtue, the slaying of enemies in battle, the highest renown, the greatest strength, devotion to yoga, your presence, and hundreds upon hundreds of children, these are the boons I ask of you."

"So be it", said Siva repeating the words I had uttered.

After this, Uma, the mother of the universe, the upholder and purifier of all things, that vast vessel of tapasya, said, "Mahadeva has granted you a son who shall be named Samba. Take from me another eight boons."

Bowing to her, I said, "From you I ask for peace with the Brahmanas, the blessings of my father, a hundred sons, the highest enjoyments, love for my family, and the grace of my mother, the attainment of tranquillity and peace, and intelligent action!"

Uma said, "They shall be yours. I never say what is untrue. You will have sixteen thousand wives. Your love for them and theirs for you shall be limitless. You will also receive the highest devotion from all your kinsmen. Your body shall be most beautiful. Seven thousand guests will dine every day at your palace."'

Krishna continued, 'Having granted me boons, Mahadeva and Uma along with their Ganas disappeared from sight. I narrated all those wonderful facts to Upamanyu, that Brahmana from whom I had obtained diksha before worshipping Mahadeva. Bowing down unto the great God, Upamanyu said these words to me.

Upamanyu said, "There is no God like Sarva. There is no end or refuge like Sarva. There is none that can give so many or such boons. There is none that equals him in battle.”””

CANTO 16

"Krishna continues, 'Upamanyu said, "In the Krita yuga there lived a renowned Rishi named Tandi. With yoga-dhyana and great devotion he adored Siva for ten thousand years. Listen as I tell you about the fruits of such extraordinary devotion.

He succeeded in having a vision of Mahadeva and praised him by reciting great and holy mantras. With tapasya, meditating on him who is the Paramatman, immutable and unchanging, Tandi was filled with wonder, and said, 'I seek the refuge of Him whom the Samkhyas describe and the yogins think of as the Supreme, the Foremost, the Purusha, the Pervador of all things, and the master of all existence.

I seek the protection of him who, the learned say, is the cause of both the creation and the destruction of the universe, of him who is superior to all the Devas, the Asuras and the Munis, of him who has nothing higher, who is unborn, who is the Lord of all things, who has neither beginning nor end, and who is endowed with supreme power, possessed of the highest felicity, and who is irradiant and sinless.'

After he had said these words, Tandi beheld before him that ocean of tapasya, that Great Deity who is immutable and eternal, who is without equal, who is inconceivable, who is indivisible, who is whole, who is Brahman, who transcends all attributes being nirguna, and who is imbued with attributes being saguna, who is the highest ecstasy of yogins, who is imperishable, who is mukti, who is the refuge of Manas, of Indra, of Agni, of Vayu, of the entire universe, and of Pitamaha Brahma. Through Manas, Tandi saw him who is inconceivable, who is immutable, who is pure, who can be understood only through surrender and who is immaterial as the mind; who is hard to comprehend, who is immeasurable, who cannot be attained by those impure souls, who is the origin of the universe, and who transcends both the universe and the Tamoguna; who is ancient, who is Purusha, who is radiant, and who is higher than the highest.

Wanting to behold him who endowed with life-breaths, resides in what results from it, who is Jiva in the form of that effulgence which is called Manas, Rishi Tandi passed many years in the practice of the severest tapasya, and having succeeded in beholding Siva as the reward of that penance, eulogised Mahadeva in the following terms:

Tandi said, 'You are the most blessed of all that is sacred and the refuge of all. You are the fiercest among all kinds of tejas. You are the austerest of all tapasyas. You are the giver of blessings. You are the supreme truth.

Salutations to you, you of a thousand rays, O sanctuary of all felicity. You are the giver of that nirvana which Yatis strive for, who fear birth and death. Brahma, Indra, Vishnu, the Viswadevas and the Maharishis cannot comprehend you and your real nature. How then can we hope to fathom you?

From you flows everything. Upon you rests everything. You are called Kaala, you are called Purusha, and you are called Brahman. Devarishis who know the Puranas say that you have three bodies, that pertaining to Kaala, that pertaining to Purusha and that pertaining to Brahman, or the three forms of Brahma, Vishnu and Siva.

You are Adi-Purusha, occupying the physical frame from head to foot, you are Adhyatma, you are Adi-bhuta, and Adi-Daivata, and you are Adi-Loka, Adi-Vigyanam and Adi-Yagna. Men of wisdom, when they succeed in knowing you that dwells in them, and that cannot be known by the very Devas, become freed from all bonds and pass into a state of existence that transcends sorrow. They that do not wish to know you have to experience innumerable births and deaths.

You are the door of swarga and of mukti. You are he that projects all beings into existence and withdraws them again into yourself. You are the great giver. You are swarga, you are mukti; you are desire that is the seed of karma. You are the wrath that inspires creatures to action.

You are sattva, you are rajas, you are tamas; you are patala, and you are swarga. You are Brahma, you are Bhava, you are Vishnu, you are Skanda, you are Indra, you are Savitri, you are Yama, you are Varuna and Soma, you are Dhatri, you are Manu, you are Vidhatri and you are Kubera, the Lord of wealth.

You are Bhumi, you are Vayu, you are Jala, you are Agni, you are Akasa; you are speech, you are Buddhi, you are steadiness, you are intelligence; you are the kama of creatures, you are satya, you are asatya, you are existent and you are non-existent. You are the senses, you are that which transcends Prakriti, and you are unalterable.

You are superior to the universe of existent objects, you are superior to the universe of non-existent objects; you are capable of being conceived, you are inconceivable. That which is supreme Brahman, the highest entity, that which is the end of both the Samkhyas and the yogins, is, without doubt, identical with you.

Truly, today I have been rewarded by you as you have granted me a vision of yourself. I have attained the end which the righteous alone attain. I have been rewarded with that goal which is sought by those whose intellects have been purified by gyana.

Steeped in ignorance for so long, I was a mindless fool; I had no knowledge of you that are the Supreme Deity, you that are the only eternal One that only wise men can know. In the course of countless lives I have at last succeeded in acquiring that devotion towards you as a result of which you have shown yourself to me. You are ever inclined to extend your grace to those that are devoted to you.

He that succeeds in knowing you enjoys immortality. You are that which is ever a mystery with the Devas, the Asuras and the sannyasis. Brahman is concealed in the cave of the heart. Even the greatest sannyasis are unable to behold or know him.

You are he who is the doer of everything and whose face is turned towards every direction. You are the soul of all things, you see all things, you pervade all things, and you know all things. You create a body for yourself, and bear it. You are an embodied Being.

You enjoy a body, and you are the refuge of all embodied creatures. You are the Creator of the pranas, you possesses the life-breaths, you are one that is filled with the life-breaths, you are the giver of the pranas, and you are the refuge of all beings with prana. You are that Adhyatma which is the refuge of all righteous ones that are devoted to yoga-dhyana and conversant with the Atman and that are diligent in avoiding rebirth. You are that Supreme Lord identical with that refuge.

You give unto all creatures what ends become theirs, whether fraught with happiness or misery. You are he that ordains all created beings to birth and death. You are the mighty Lord who grants success to Rishis. Having created all the worlds beginning with Bhu, together with all the inhabitants of heaven, and uphold and cherish them all, you have divided yourself into your celebrated eight forms.

Everything flows from you. All things rest upon you. All things, again, disappear into you. You are the sole object that is eternal. You are that region of truth sought by the righteous and regarded by them as the highest. You are that cessation of individual existence which yogins seek. You are that Oneness which is sought by those conversant with the Soul.

Brahma and the Siddhas expounding the mantras have concealed you in a cave to prevent the Devas and Asuras and Manavas from seeing you. You live in the heart, yet you are concealed. Devas, Asuras and Manavas are all bewildered and unable to understand you truly and in all your aspects, O Bhava. You reveal yourself of your own accord to those that attain you after having cleansed themselves through bhakti.

By knowing you one can avoid both death and rebirth. You are the highest object of knowledge. By knowing you no higher object remains to be known. You are the greatest object of realisation. He that is truly wise, after attaining you, thinks there is no higher object to acquire. By reaching you that are subtle and the highest object of attainment, the wise become immortal and changeless.

The followers of the Samkhya system, who know their own philosophy and possess a knowledge of sattva, rajas and tamas and of those tattvas that are the subjects of enquiry, and those learned men who transcend the perishable by attaining to a knowledge of the subtle or indestructible by knowing you, succeed in liberating themselves from all bonds.

Those who know the Vedas regard you as the one object of knowledge, which has been expounded in those highest shastras. These men, devoted to pranayama, always meditate on you and enter into you as their final end.

Riding on the chariot made of AUM, those men enter into Maheswara. Of that which is called the Devayana, the path of the Devas, you are the door called Aditya. You are also the door called Chandramas, of that which is called the Pitriyana. You are Kashta, you are the cardinal directions of the horizon, you are the year, and you are the yugas. You are the sovereign of all the heavens and of the earth; you are Uttarayana and Dakshinayana, the northern and the southern declensions.

You who are called Nilalohita, in olden times Brahma sang your praises by reciting mantras and urged you to create living creatures. Regarding you as unattached to all things and divested of all forms, Brahmanas conversant with the Riks praise you by intoning those sacred Riks. Adhvaryus pour libations in yagnas, chanting Yajuses in honour of you that are the sole object of knowledge according to the three paths.

Men of pure intellects, who know the Samans, sing your praises with the Samans. Those Dvijas that know with the Atharvans, extol you as Rita, as truth, as the highest, and as Brahman. You are the highest cause, from which sacrifice has flowed. You are the Lord, and you are Supreme.

The night and day are your sense of hearing and sight. The fortnights and months are your head and arms. The seasons are your energy, tapasya is your patience, and the year is your anus, thighs and feet.

You are Mrityu. You are Yama, you are Hutasana, you are Kaala; you are swift in destruction, you are the original cause of time, and you are eternal Kaala. You are Chandramas and Aditya. With all the stars and planets and the atmosphere that fills space, you are Dhruva, the polestar, you are the constellation called the Saptarishi, and you are the seven realms beginning with Bhu.

You are Pradhana and Mahat, you are unmanifest, and you are this world. You are the universe beginning with Brahman and ending with the lowest forms of vegetation. You are the beginning or origin of all creatures. You are the eight Prakritis. You are, again, above the eight Prakritis.

Everything that exists represents a portion of your divine self. You are that supreme felicity which is eternal. You are the end attained to by all things. You are that highest existence which is sought by the righteous. You are that state which is freed from every anxiety. You are eternal Brahman.

You are that highest state which constitutes the meditation of those knowers of the shastras and the Vedangas. You are the highest kashta, you are the highest Kaala. You are the highest success, and you are the highest refuge. You are the highest tranquillity. You are the highest cessation of existence. By attaining you, yogins think that they attain the highest success that is open to them.

You are contentment, you are success; you are the Sruti, and you are the Smriti. You are that refuge of the Atman which yogins strive for, and you are that indestructible Prapti which men of knowledge pursue. You are that goal sought by those who perform yagnas and offer sacrificial libations, and make ample gifts on such occasions.

You are that high end which is sought by those that waste and scorch their bodies with severe penances with ceaseless japa, with those rigid vows and fasts that pertain to their peaceful lives, and with other means of self-affliction. Eternal one, you are that end which is theirs that are detached from all things and that have renounced all action. You are that end which is theirs that wish to attain mukti from rebirth, that live aloof from all pleasures, and that desire the annihilation of the elements of Prakriti.

You are that high end, which is indescribable, which is stainless, which is the one beyond change, and which is theirs that are devoted to gyana and vigyana. These are the ends that have been affirmed in the Vedas and the Puranas and the other true shastras. It is through your grace that men attain to those ends or if they fail to attain to them, it is through the denial of your blessings to them.'

It was thus that tapodhana Tandi praised Isana. And he sang also that high Brahman which in ancient days was sung by Brahma in honour of Mahadeva."

Upamanyu continued, "Thus praised by Tandi, Mahadeva, who was accompanied by Uma, spoke. Tandi had further said, 'Neither Brahma, nor Indra nor Vishnu, nor the Viswdavas, nor the Maharishis know you.' Gratified at this, Siva said the following words.

The Holy One said, 'You will be indestructible and eternal. You will be freed from all sorrow. Great fame shall be yours. You will be full of tejas. Spiritual knowledge shall be yours. All the Rishis shall seek you, and through my grace your son shall be the author of profound Sutras. What can I give you today? Tell me, my son, what do you desire?'

At this, Tandi folded his hands and said, 'Let my devotion to you be unwavering.'"

Upamanyu continued, "Having given these boons to Tandi and having received the adorations of the Devas and the Rishis, Siva vanished. When he left with all his Ganas and other bhaktas, the Rishi came to my asrama and told me all that had happened to him. Listen now to all those celebrated names of Mahadeva that Tandi recited to me for your spiritual success.

Brahma had once recited ten thousand names that pertain to Mahadeva. In the shastras, Siva is known by a thousand names. These names are not known to all. In ancient times Brahma recounted these names to worship the high-souled deity. Having received them through the grace of Brahma, Tandi related them to me!”””

CANTO 17

"Krishna says, 'Yudhishtira, the regenerate Rishi Upamanyu, with hands joined together in reverence recited the names of Mahadeva, starting from the beginning.

Upamanyu said, "I shall adore that great deity who deserves the adorations of all creatures, by reciting those names that are celebrated over all the worlds, some of which were uttered by Brahma, some by the Rishis, and some of which occur in the Vedas and the Vedangas.

Those names have been used for Siva by renowned men. Those names, applied to Mahadeva by Tandi, who extracted them from Vedic lore with his devotion, are true and can surely bestow all the aims of the one who recites them.

Indeed, with those names that have been uttered by many righteousness men and by ascetics conversant with dharma, I shall adore him who is the foremost, who is the first, who leads to heaven, who grants boons to all creatures, and who is auspicious. These names have been heard everywhere in the universe, having spread from the realm of Brahma, where they were originally created. All of them are suffused with Truth.

With those names I shall adore him who is the Parabrahman, who has been declared unto the universe by the Vedas, and who is eternal. I shall now tell you, Lord of Yadu's vamsa. Hear them with rapt attention. You are a devoted bhakta of the Supreme Deity. Worship the illustrious Bhava above all the Devas. And because you are devoted to him, I will recite those names in your hearing.

Mahadeva is Eternal Brahman. Even those endowed with yoga and its achievements are unable to grasp, even in a hundred years, the full glory and power of Siva. Truly, the beginning or middle or end of Mahadeva cannot be known by the very Devas. Then who can recite the attributes of Mahadeva in their entirety? For all that, through the grace of that illustrious and supreme God of perfect wisdom, granted to me for my devotion to him, I will recite his attributes summarised in a few words.

The Supreme Lord cannot be adored by anyone if he does not grant his leave to the devotee. As for me, it is only when I become fortunate enough to receive his blessing that I succeed in worshipping him.

I shall mention only a few names of that Mahadeva who is without birth and without death, who is the original cause of the universe, who has the highest Soul, and whose origin is unmanifest. Krishna, listen to these, a few names that were uttered by Brahma himself of that giver of boons, that adorable deity, that puissant one who has the universe for his form, and who is possessed of supreme wisdom.

These names that I shall recite are extracted from the ten thousand names, the Koti Rudriyam that Brahma recited in ancient times, even as ghee is extracted from butter. Just as gold represents the essence of rocky mountains, as honey represents the essence of flowers, as Manda represents the extract from ghrita, even so have these names been extracted from and represent the essence of those ten thousand names spoken by the Pitamaha Brahma.

This brief abstract of names can cleanse every sin, however heinous. It possesses the same punya as that in the four Vedas. It should be received with attention by spiritual aspirants and engraved on the memory. These auspicious names, great purifiers, leading to spiritual advancement, capable of destroying Rakshasas, should be imparted to only him that is devoted to Siva, to him that has faith, to him that believes.

Unto him that has no faith, him that is an unbeliever, him that has not subjugated his soul, it should never be communicated. That creature who harbours malice towards Mahadeva who is the original cause of everything, who is the Paramatman, and who is the great Lord, will certainly to go to naraka along with all his ancestors before and all his children after him. This abstract of names that I shall recite to you is regarded as yoga.

This is looked upon as the highest object of dhyana. This is that which one should constantly recite as japa. This is equivalent to gyana. This is the highest mystery. If one, even during his last moments, recites it or hears it recited, he will attain the supreme end.

This is holy. This is auspicious; this is filled with every kind of benefit. This is the best of all things. Brahma, the Pitamaha of all the universe, having composed it, assigned to it the foremost place among all excellent mantras. From that time, this chant to the greatness and glory of Mahadeva, which is held in the highest esteem by all the Devas, has come to be regarded as the king of all mantras.

This king of mantras was first passed down from the realm of Brahma to swarga. Tandi then obtained it from there. Hence is it known to be composed by Tandi. Tandi brought it from swarga to Bhumi. It is the most auspicious of all auspicious things, and is capable of purifying the heart of all sins however terrible.

Mahabaho, I will recite to you that best of all mantras. This sings of him who is the Veda of the Vedas, and the most ancient of all ancient objects, of him who is the energy of all energies, and the penance of all penances; of him who is the most calm of all peaceful creatures, and who is the splendour of all splendours.

It sings the praises of him who is looked upon as the most subtle of all subtle creatures, and him who is the intelligence of all intelligent creatures; of him who is looked upon as the Deity of all deities, and the Rishi of all Rishis; of him who is regarded as the sacrifice of all sacrifices and the most auspicious of all auspicious things.

It sings of him who is the Rudra of all Rudras and the effulgence of all things effulgent; of him who is the Yogin of all yogins, and the cause of all causes; of him from whom all the worlds come into existence, and unto whom all the worlds return when they cease to exist; of him who is the Soul of all existent creatures, and who is called Hara of immeasurable energy.

Hear me recite those thousand and eight names of the great Sarva. This is the Siva Sahasranama stotra[3]. Hearing these names, all your wishes will be fulfilled.

Aum! You are immobile, you are unchanging, you are powerful, you are terrifying, you are the foremost, you are boon-giving, and you are supreme. You are the Atman of all creatures, you are celebrated above all creatures, you are all things, you are the Creator of all, and you are Bhava.

You are the bearer of matted hair on your head. You wear animal skins for your garments. You wear a crown of matted hair on your head like the peacock. You are he who has the whole universe for your limbs. You are the creator of all things. You are Hara for you are the destroyer of all things.

You are he that has the eyes of the gazelle. You are the destroyer of all creatures. You are the supreme enjoyer of all things. You are Pravritti from which all actions flow. You are Nivritti or abstention from deeds. You keep fasts and vows, you are eternal, and you are unchangeable.

You are he that dwells in the cremation ground, you possess the six famed gunas of sovereignty, you live in the heart of every creature, you are he that enjoys all things with the senses, and you are the slayer of all sinful creatures.

You are he that deserves the salutations of all, you are of great feats, you are tapodhana, you create all the elements at your will, and you conceal your real nature by disguising yourself as a madman. You are the master of all the worlds and of all living creatures.

You are of immeasurable form, you are of vast body, you are of the form of righteousness, you are of great fame, you are of high soul, you are the Atman of all creatures, and you have the universe for your form. You have a great maw for you swallow the universe at the time of the dissolution. You are the protector of all the lokas.

You are the soul residing in the inner heart and devoid of ahamkara originating from ignorance, one and undivided; you are ananda. Your chariot is borne by mules. You are he that protects Jiva from the thunderbolt of rebirth. You are adorable.

You are obtained by purity and self-restraint and vratas. You are again the refuge of all kinds of vows and observances including purity and self-restraint. You are the divine artist that knows every art. You are Swayambhu for no one has created you. You are the beginning of all creatures and things. You are Hiranyagarbha, the Creator of all things. You are inexhaustible puissance and felicity.

You have a hundred powerful eyes. You are Soma. You are he that makes all good creatures assume shapes of glory that shine in the sky. You are Chandramas, you are Surya, you are Sani, you are the waxing moon, you are the waning moon, you are Mangala, and you are Brihaspati and Sukra and Budha, you are the worshipper of Atri's wife, you are he who shot his arrow in anger at a sacrifice when Yagna fled from him in the form of a deer. You are sinless.

You possess tapasyas with the power to create the universe. You have tapasyas that empower you to annihilate the universe. You are high-minded and generous towards your devotees. You fulfill the wishes of all who surrender themselves to you.

You are the maker of the year for it is you who sets the wheel of Kaala revolving, by assuming the form of the sun and the planets. You are mantra in the form of Pranava and other sacred words and syllables. In the form of the Vedas and other shastras, you are the authority for all deeds. You are the highest penance. You are devoted to yoga.

You are he who merges himself in Brahman through yoga. You are the great seed, the cause of causes. You reveal what is unmanifest in the manifest form in which the universe exists. You possess infinite might. You are he whose seed is gold.

You are omniscient; you are all things and the great knower. You are the cause of all things. You are he that has the seed of action, ignorance and desire, for the means of moving from this world to the other and the other to this.

You have ten arms. Your unblinking eyes see at all times. You have a blue throat where you bear the poison that arose when the ocean was churned that would have otherwise destroyed the universe. You are the Lord of Uma. You are the origin of all the infinite forms that occur in the universe.

You are he whose authority is due to yourself. You are heroic because of such grand feats as the swift razing of the triple city of the Asuras. You are inert matter which cannot move unless it co-exists with the Atman. You are all the tattvas, subjects of enquiry of the Samkhyas. You are the ordainer and ruler of the tattvas. You are the chief of the Ganas who wait upon you.

You cover infinite space. You are Kama. You know the mantras, gyana being your tapasya. You are the highest mantra for you are that philosophy which defines the nature and attributes of the Soul and its distinction from the non-Soul. You are the cause of the universe as all that exists has sprung from your Atman. You are the universal destroyer and all that ceases to exist merges into you who are the unmanifest Brahman.

You bear the calabash in one of your hands, and the bow in another; in another hand you bear shafts and in yet another a skull. You bear the thunder-bolt. You are armed with the Satagni. You are armed with the sword. You wield the battle-axe. You are armed with the Sula. You are adorable. You hold the sacrificial ladle in one of your hands.

You are of beautiful form. You are endowed with abundant tejas. You generously give all that adorns those that are devoted to you. You wear a turban on your head. You are of a beautiful face. You are he who swells with splendour and power. You are he that is humble and modest. You are of great height. Your senses are your rays. You are the greatest of acharyas. You are Parabrahman, the state of pure blessed existence.

You are he that took the form of a jackal to console the Brahmana who had resolved to commit suicide when insulted by a rich Vaisya. You are he whose aims are achieved by themselves, without waiting for the power that derives from tapasya. You are one with the shaved head, a sign of the order of sannyasis.

You are the one who does good to all creatures. You are unborn. You have countless forms. Your body is covered with all kinds of fragrances. The matted locks on your head swallowed the river Ganga when she first descended from heaven, though you released the waters at the plea of King Bhagiratha. You are the giver of sovereignty.

You are a brahmacharin without ever having fallen away from the rigid vow of abstinence. You are renowned for your sexual restraint. You always lie on your back. You have your abode in puissance. You have three matted locks on your head. You are dressed in rags. You are the fierce Rudra.

You are the divine senapati, and you are all pervading. You are he that moves during the day. You are he that moves in the night. You are of fierce wrath. You possess a dazzling radiance that is born of Vedic study and tapasya.

You are the slayer of the mighty Asura who took the form of an enraged elephant to destroy your sacred city of Varanasi. You are the slayer of those Daityas who become the oppressors of the universe. You are Kaala, time which is the universal destroyer.

You are the supreme ordainer of the universe. You are a wealth of accomplishments. You are of the form of the lion and the tiger. You are he that is clad in the hide of an elephant. You are the yogin who deceives Kaala by transcending its irresistible influence. You are the original sound. You are the fruition of all desires. You are he that is adored in four ways.

You are a night-wanderer, like a Vetala. You are he that wanders in the company of spirits. You are he that wanders in the company of ghostly beings. You are the Supreme Lord of even Indra and the other Devas. You are he that has multiplied himself infinitely in the form of all existent and non-existent things.

You are the upholder of both Mahat and all the innumerable combinations of the five Mahabhutas. You are the primeval ignorance or tamas known as Rahu. You are without measure and infinite. You are the supreme end that is attained by the emancipated.

You love to dance. You are he that is always dancing. You are he that causes others to dance. You are the friend of the universe. You are he whose appearance is calm and gentle. Your penances endow you with power to create and destroy the universe. You are he who binds all creatures with the bonds of your maya. You are he that transcends death.

You are he who dwells on Kailasa. You transcend all bonds and, like space, you are detached from all things. You possess a thousand arms. You are victory. You are that perseverance which leads to success or victory. You are devoid of sloth or procrastination that hinders firm action.

You are fearless. You are fear. You are he who put a stop to Bali's sacrifice. You fulfill the desires of all your devotees. You are the destroyer of Daksha's yagna. You are good-natured. You are amiable. You are fierce and rob all creatures of their energy. You are the slayer of the Asura Bala.

You are always joyful. You are of the form of wealth which is coveted by all. You have never been defeated. There is none more adorable than you. You are he who, as the ocean, roars resoundingly. You are that space which is so deep that it cannot be measured. You are he whose power and the might of whose Ganas and Nandi have never been determined.

You are the tree of the world whose roots extend upwards and branches hang downwards. You are the banyan. You are he that sleeps on a human leaf when the universe, after dissolution, becomes one infinite expanse of water. You are he that shows compassion to all worshippers assuming the form of Hari or Hara or Ganesa or Arka or Agni or Vayu.

You have sharp teeth and you can masticate countless worlds even as one crunches and swallows nuts. In all your forms you are of vast dimensions. You have a mouth wide enough to swallow the universe in a moment. You are he whose forces are adored everywhere.

You are he who dispelled the fears of the Devas when the prince of elephants had to be captured. You are the seed of the universe. You are he whose bull is both your mount and the emblem on your banner in battle. You have Agni for your soul. You are Surya who has green steeds yoked to his chariot. You are the friend of the Jiva. You are he that knows with the proper time for the performance of all religious kriyas.

You are he whom Vishnu worshipped to obtain his celebrated chakra. You are yagna in the form of Vishnu. You are the ocean. You are the Varavanala horse's head that ranges within the ocean, ceaselessly heaving fire and drinking the salt waters as if they were sacrificial butter.

You are Vayu, the friend of Agni. You are of tranquil soul like the ocean when at rest and unstirred by the mildest wind. You are Agni that drinks the libations of ghee poured in yagnas with the help of mantras. You are he whom it is difficult to seek out. You are he whose lustre spreads over the infinite universe. You are ever skilful in battle. You well know the time when one should engage in battle so that victory may be achieved. You are that science of jyotisha, which treats of the movements of the stars and planets.

You take the form of jaya, of success or victory. You are he whose body is Kaala, never subject to death. You are a grihasta for you wear a tuft of hair on your head. You are a sannyasi for your head is shaven. You wear matted locks, as you are a vanaprastha.

You are distinguished for your fiery rays: the bright path on which the righteous walk is identical with you. You are he that appears in the sky within the heart in the body of every creature. You are he who enters into the skull of every creature. You bear the wrinkles of age.

You bear the bamboo flute. You also have the tabor. You bear the musical instrument called tali. You hold the wooden vessel used for husking grain. You are he who shrouds the illusion which covers Yama. You are an astrologer whose understanding is always directed towards the motion of the wheel of time made up of the stars in the sky.

You are Jiva whose understanding is directed to things that are the outcome of sattva, rajas and tamas. You are that in which all things merge when dissolution engulfs them. You are stable and fixed, there being nothing in you that is subject to change of any kind. You are the Lord of all creatures. Your arms extend all over the universe.

You reveal yourself in many forms that are but iotas of yourself. You pervade all things. You are he that has no mouth for you seek not to enjoy the objects of your creation. You are he who frees your creatures from the bonds of the world. You are easy to attain.

You are he that manifested himself with golden armour. You are he that appears in the linga. You are he that roams the forests in search of birds and animals. You are he that wanders across the earth. You are he that is omnipresent. You are the blast of all the conches blown in the three worlds. You are he that has all creatures for his kinsmen.

You have the form of a snake for you are identical with the mighty Sesha Naga. You are he that lives in mountain caves like Jaigishavya or other yogins. You are identical with Guha, the divine senapati. You wear garlands of flowers. You are he who enjoys the happiness that springs from the possession of worldly objects.

You are he from whom all creatures have derived their three states of birth, existence, and death. You are he that upholds all things that exist or occur in the three stages of Kaala—the past, the present and the future. You are he that frees creatures from the outcomes of all deeds of previous lives as well as those of the present life, and from all the bonds due to ignorance and desire.

You are he who binds the Asura lords. You are he who is the slayer of foes in battle. You are that can be attained through gyana alone. You are Durvasas. You are he who is served and adored by all the righteous. You are he who causes the fall of even Brahma. You are he that gives unto all creatures the just share of joy and sorrow that each deserves according to his actions.

You are he that is incomparable. You are conversant with the havis given and appropriated in yagnas. You dwell in every place. You range everywhere. You are he that wears simple garments. You are Vasava. You are immortal. You are identical with the Himavat Mountains. You are the maker of pure gold.

You are devoid of karma. You uphold in yourself the fruits of all karma. You are the foremost of those who sustain and uphold. You are he that has red eyes. You are he with a vision extending across the infinite universe. You are he that has a chariot whose wheels are ever victorious.

You are he that has vast learning. You are he that accepts your devotees as your servants. You are he that restrains and subdues your senses. You are he that acts. You wear clothes whose warp and woof are made of snakes. You are supreme. You are he who is the lowest of the celestials. You are he that is mature. You own the musical instrument called the kahala.

You grant all wishes. You are the embodiment of grace in all the three stages of time, the past, the present and the future. You have power that is well used. You are he who had assumed the form of Balarama, the elder brother of Krishna.

You are the foremost of all coveted things, being yourself mukti, the highest of all ends to which creatures attain. You are the giver of all things. Your face is turned in all directions. You are he from whom diverse creatures have sprung even as all forms have sprung from Akasa or are variations of that primal element. You are he who falls into the pit called deha or the body. You are he that is helpless; you fall into that pit and cannot transcend the sorrow that is your lot.

You live in the firmament of the heart. You are terribly fierce in form. You are the deity called Amsu. You are the companion of Amsu and are called Aditya. You radiate innumerable rays. You are of blinding effulgence.

You have the speed of the wind. You possess speed greater than that of the wind. You possess the speed of the mind. You are Nishachara since you enjoy all things filled with the night of avidya.

You dwell in every body. You dwell with prosperity as your companion. You are he that imparts knowledge and instruction. You are he who teaches in absolute silence. You are he that observes the vow of reticence for you teach with silence. You are he who leaves the body, gazing at the soul.

You are he that is well adored. You are the giver of treasures, for Kubera, the Lord of all the treasures, obtained his riches from you. You are the prince of birds, being Garuda, the son of Vinata and Kasyapa. You are the friend that helps. Your radiance is like that of a million suns risen together. You are the master of all created beings.

You are he who rouses the appetites. You are Kamadeva. You are of the form of beautiful women that are coveted by all. You are the tree of the world. You are the Lord of wealth. You are the giver of fame. You are the God that distributes the fruits of actions, joy and sorrow to all creatures. You are yourself those rewards which you distribute.

You are the most ancient, having existed from a time when nothing else was. You can cover all the three worlds with a single step. You are Vamana who tricked the Asura king Bali; depriving him of his sovereignty you restored it to Indra. You are the yogi crowned with success, like Sanatkumara and others.

You are a Maharishi like Vasishta. You are one whose objects are always crowned with success like Rishabha or Dattatreya. You are a sannyasin like Yagnavalkya. You are he that is adorned with the marks of the mendicant. You are he that is without such markings. You are he that transcends the practices of the sannyasasrama.

You are he that protects all creatures from every fear. You are without any passions yourself so that glory and dishonour are alike to you. You are Kartikeya, the divine senapati. You are Visakha who was born from that senapati when Indra hurled his vajra at him. You are conversant with the sixty tattvas, the subjects of enquiry in the universe.

You are the Lord of the senses that achieve their respective functions guided by you. You are he that is armed with the thunder-bolt that rives mountains. You are infinite. You are the confounder of the Daitya ranks on the battlefield. You are he that drives his chariot in circles among his own ranks and that makes similar circles among the ranks of his enemies, returning safe after devastating them.

You are that wind which rises at the time of the universal dissolution and which churns the entire universe even as the rod in the hands of the gopis churns the milk in the earthen pot.

You are he that is full. You are he that sees all things. You are the sound that arises from clapping one hand against another other. You are he whose palm serves as the plate from which to eat. You are he who has a body of steel. You are inconceivably great. You are of the form of the chatra, a parasol. You are he who carries a parasol. You are celebrated to be identical with all creatures. You are he who covered the universe with two steps and wanted space for the third one. You are he whose head is without hair. You are he whose form is ugly and fierce. You are he who has undergone infinite modifications and become all things in the universe.

You are he who bears the danda, the sign of sannyasa. You are he who has a kundala. You are he who cannot be attained with deeds. You are he who is identical with the lion, the green-eyed king of beasts. You are of the form of all the points of the compass. You are he who is armed with the thunderbolt. You are he who has a hundred tongues. You are he who has a thousand feet and a thousand heads.

You are the Lord of the Devas. You are he that is comprised of all the Devas. You are the Great Master. You are he who has a thousand arms. You are he who can grant all wishes. You are he whose protection is sought by everyone. You are he who is the Creator of all the worlds. You are he who purifies all from every kind of sin, in the form of shrines and sacred waters. You are he who has three high mantras.

You are the youngest son of Aditi and Kasyapa, the dwarf Upendra, who beguiled the Asura Bali and took from him his sovereignty of the three worlds and restored it to Indra. You are both black and incarnadine, in the form known as Hari-Hara. You are the maker of the Brahmana’s danda. You are armed with the satagni, the paasa, and the astra. You are he that was born within the primeval lotus.

You are he who has a cavernous womb. You are he who has the Vedas in his womb. You are he who rises the infinite waters, the Ekarnava which succeeds the Pralaya. You are he who radiates brilliant light. You are the creator of the Vedas. You are he who studies the Vedas. You are he who knows the meaning of the Vedas.

You are devoted to Brahman. You are the refuge of all devoted to Brahman. You are of infinite forms. You host many bodies. You are filled with compelling prowess. You are the Soul that transcends the three universal gunas of sattva, rajas and tamas. You are the Lord of all Jivas.

You have the speed of the wind. You possess the swiftness of the mind. You are always smeared with sandalwood-paste. You are the tip of the stalk of the primeval lotus. You are he who caused the divine cow Surabhi to fall from her superior position by cursing her. You are that Brahma who was unable to see your end, the tip of the first linga of flames.

You are adorned with a large wreath of karnikara flowers. You are adorned with a crown of blue jewels. You are the wielder of the Pinaka. You are the master of that knowledge which deals with Brahman. You are he who has subdued his senses with your knowledge of Brahman. You are he who bears the Ganga on your head.

You are the husband of Uma, the daughter of Himavat. You are powerful, having assumed the form of the Varaha to lift up the submerged earth. You are he who protects the universe by assuming various incarnations. You are worthy of adoration. You are that primeval Being with the equine head who recited the Vedas in a thundering voice. You are he of great felicity.

You are the great conqueror. You are he who has slain all his enemies in the form of passions. You are both white and tawny being as you are half-male and half-female. The colour of your body is like that of gold. You are he that is of the form of pure joy, being, as you are, above the five layers of the Jiva, the anna-maya, the prana-maya, the mano-maya, the vigyana-maya, and the ananda-maya. You are of a restrained soul.

You are the foundation upon which rests that ignorance known as pradhana and which, consisting of the three gunas of sattva, rajas and tamas, is the cause of the emergence of the universe. You are he whose faces are turned in every direction. You are he who has three eyes in the forms of the sun, the moon and fire. You are he who is superior to all creatures in your vast righteousness. You are the Soul of all mobile beings. You are of the form of the subtle soul which cannot be perceived. You are the giver of immortality in the form of mukti as the fruit of all virtuous deeds achieved by creatures without desire of rewards.

You are the acharya of even those that are the Gods of the gods. You are Vasu, the son of Aditi. You are he who is filled with countless rays of light, who brings forth the universe, and who is the Soma which is drunk at yagnas. You are Vyasa, author of the Puranas and other sacred itihasas. Being identical with the Puranas and other itihasas, both long and short, you are the creations of Vyasa's mind. You are the sum of all Jivas.

You are the season. You are the year. You are the month. You are the fortnight. You are those sacred days that end these periods. You are the kaalas. You are the kashtas. You are the lavas. You are the matras. You are the muhurtas and days and nights. You are the kshanas.

You are the soil upon which the tree of the universe stands. You are the seed of all creatures being of the form of that Avyakta Chaitanya, unmanifest consciousness, imbued with maya from which all creatures spring. You are Mahatattva. Being the form of Chit, which appears after Mahatattva, you are the beginning of the jiva. You are Sat or cause. You are Asat or effect. You are manifest, able to be grasped by the senses.

You are the father. You are the mother. You are the Pitamaha. You are the door to swarga because of your tapasya. Because you are desire, you are the beginning of the generation of all creatures. And because you are the absence of desire, which alone leads to uniting with Brahman, you are the door to moksha. You are those acts of dharma which lead to the felicity of heaven. You are nirvana, that cessation of individual or distinct existence, which is mukti.

You give joy to every creature. You are that realm of satya which the righteous attain. You are superior to even that realm of truth. You are he who is the Creator of both the Devas and the Asuras. You are he who is the refuge of both the Devas and the Asuras. You are the guru of both the Devas and the Asuras, being as you are both Brihaspati and Sukra.

You are he who is ever victorious. You are he who is ever worshipped by the Devas and the Asuras. You are he who guides the Devas and the Asuras even as the mahamatra guides the elephant. You are the refuge of all the Devas and the Asuras, You are he who is the Lord of both the Devas and the Asuras being both Indra and Virochana. You lead both the Devas and the Asuras in battle, being both Kartikeya and Kesi who lead their armies.

You are he who transcends the senses and excels by himself. You take the form of the Devarishis like Narada and the others. As Brahma and Rudra you grant boons to the Devas and Asuras. You are he who rules the hearts of the Devas and the Asuras. You are he into whom the universe enters when it is dissolved. Thus you are the refuge of even he who rules over the hearts of both the Devas and the Asuras. You are he whose body is made up of all the deities.

No being is superior to you. You are he who is the inner soul of the gods. You are he who has sprung from his own self. You are of the form of immobile things. You are he who covers the three worlds with three strides. You possess vast knowledge. You are without blemish. You are he who is freed from rajas. You are he who transcends destruction.

You are he in whose honour mantras must be chanted. You are the master of the inexorable elephant represented by Kaala. You are that Lord of tigers who is worshipped in the kingdom of the Kalingas. On account of your great strength, you are he who is called the lion among the gods. You are he who is the foremost among men.

You are filled with great wisdom. You are he who takes the first share of the offerings at yagnas. You are invisible. You are the sum of all the Devas. You are he in whom penances prevail. You always excel in yoga. You are auspicious. You are armed with the vajra. You are the source of the origin of the astras called paasas, the nooses. You are he whom your devotees attain to in diverse ways. You are Guha. You are the supreme limit of grace.

You are identical with your creation. You are he who rescues all creatures from death by liberating them. You purify all, including Brahma himself. You take the form of bulls and other horned animals. You are he who delights in mountain peaks. You are the planet Sani. You are Kubera, Lord of the Yakshas. You are perfection without flaw.

You are he who inspires happiness. You are all the gods united. You are the cessation of all things. You are all the duties of all the asramas. You are he who has an eye on his forehead. You are he who sports with the universe for his marble ball. You take the form of deer. You have the energy that is of the form of gyana and tapasya. As Himavat and Meru you are the Lord of all immobile things.

You are he who has subdued his senses with rules and vows. You are he whose aims have all been fulfilled. You are identical with mukti. You are different from him whom we worship. You have truth for your penances. Your heart is pure.

You are he who presides over all vratas and upavasas, being the giver of their fruits. You are the highest as you take the form of Turiya. You are Brahman. You are the highest refuge of devotees. You are he who transcends all bonds. You are freed from the linga sarira. You are filled with every kind of prosperity. You are he who enhances the wealth of your devotees. You are that which changes unceasingly.'

Krishna, I have now sung the praises of the illustrious deity, reciting his names in the order of their importance. Who is there that can sing the praises of the Lord of the universe, that great Lord of all who deserves our adorations and worship and reverence, whom the very gods with Brahma at their head are unable to adequately praise and whom the Rishis also fail to extol.

With my devotion and his leave, I have praised that Lord of sacrifices, that Supreme Deity, that wisest of all creatures. By reciting these auspicious names of the great and blessed One, a worshipper of devoted soul and pure heart succeeds in attaining his own Atman.

These names constitute a mantra that is the best means of attaining Brahman. With these one is sure to attain mukti. The Rishis and the Devas all praise the Highest Deity with this mantra. Sung by men of restrained soul, Mahadeva is pleased with them.

The illustrious deity is always full of compassion towards his devotees. He is omnipotent and grants moksha to those that worship him. So also the best among men, that possess faith and devotion, hear and recite for others and utter with reverence the praises of that highest and eternal Isana, in all their successive lives and adore him in thought, word and deed, and adoring him thus at all times, while lying or seated or walking or awake or while opening their eyes or shutting them, and thinking of him repeatedly, come to be revered by other men and derive great gratification and happiness.

When a creature is cleansed of all his sins in the course of millions of births, in diverse varnas, it is then that devotion springs up in his heart for Mahadeva. It is through good fortune alone that undivided devotion to Bhava who is the original cause of the universe wells up in the heart of one that knows every way of worshipping him.

Such flawless and pure devotion to Rudra, which has singleness of purpose and that is irresistible in its course, is seldom to be found among even the Devas, and never among men. It is through the grace of Rudra that such devotion arises in the hearts of Manavas. As a result of such bhakti, identifying themselves wholly with Mahadeva, men attain to the highest success.

The illustrious deity who always blessed those that seek him with humility, and surrender themselves completely to him, rescues them from samsara. Except for him who frees creatures from rebirth, all other gods only efface men's tapasyas, for men are powerless before such great power.

In this manner, Tandi of tranquil soul, resembling Indra himself in splendour, praised the illustrious Lord of all existent and non-existent things, that great deity clad in animal skins. Indeed, Brahma once sung this hymn, the Siva Sahasranama in the presence of Sankara. You are a Brahmana for you are yourself conversant with Brahman and devoted to those conversant with Brahman. You will thus understand it well. This great stotra purifies, and washes away all sins. It confers yoga and mukti, and heaven and contentment.

He who recites this mantra with undivided devotion to Sankara succeeds in attaining to that high end which is theirs that are devoted to the doctrines of the Samkhya philosophy. That worshipper who recites this every day for one year with single-minded devotion succeeds in obtaining the end that he desires.

This hymn is a great mystery. It originally dwelt in the heart of Brahma. Brahma imparted it to Sakra. Sakra gave it to Mrityu. Mrityu imparted it unto the Rudras. From the Rudras, Tandi received it. Indeed Tandi acquired it in the realm of Brahma as reward for his severe austerities. Tandi gave it to Sukra, and Sukra of Bhrigu's race taught it to Gautama.

Gautama in his turn communicated it to Vaivaswata Manu. Manu communicated it to Narayana who was a sadhya and loved by him. The illustrious and glorious Narayana, gave it to Yama. Vaivaswata Yama communicated it to Nachiketa.

Nachiketa taught it to Markandeya. I had it as the reward for my vratas and upavasas from Markandeya. To you, O Parantapa, I give that mantra unheard by others. This mantra leads to swarga. It dispels sickness and bestows a long life. This is worthy of the highest praise, and is consistent with the Vedas."'

Krishna continues, ‘Arjuna, he who recites this awesome hymn with a pure heart while observing brahmacharya, and with his senses under control, consistently for a full year, succeeds in obtaining the fruits of an Aswamedha yagna. Danavas, Yakshas, Rakshasas, Pisachas, Yatudhanas, Guhyakas and Nagas cannot harm him.’”

Vaisampayana said, “After Krishna has finished, Mahayogi Vyasa says to Yudhishtira, ‘My son, recite this mantra of the thousand and eight names of Mahadeva, and let Siva be gratified with you.

In the past, I performed severe austerities on the mountains of Meru to have a son. I chanted this very mantra and my wish was granted. By doing the same, obtain from Sarva the fruition of all your wishes.’

After this, Kapila, the Rishi who spread the Samkhya doctrines, and who is honoured by the Devas themselves, says, ‘I have worshipped Bhava with great bhakti for many lives. The illustrious deity was at last gratified with me and gave me the knowledge that enables men to free themselves from rebirth.’

The Rishi Charusirsa, who is Indra’s loving friend, otherwise known as Alampana, says, ‘In former days, I went to the Gokarna Mountains and performed a severe tapasya for a hundred years. As the reward for my penance, I had a hundred sons from Sarva, all of whom were born without sexual union with any woman; they were of restrained soul, righteous, possessed of great splendour, free from disease and sorrow, and endowed with lives of more than a hundred thousand years.’

The illustrious Valmiki says to Yudhishtira, ‘Once upon a time, in course of a dialectical argument, some Rishis who possessed the homa fire accused me of killing a Brahmana. As soon as they had denounced me in this manner, the sin of Brahmahatya possessed me. To purify myself, I sought the protection of the sinless Isana of overpowering tejas. I was cleansed of all my sins. That dispeller of sorrows, the destroyer of the triad city of the Asuras, said to me, ‘Your fame shall be great in the world.’

Jamadagni's son Rama, foremost of all righteous men, shining like the sun in the midst of that gathering of Rishis, says to Yudhishtira, 'I was afflicted by the same sin for having killed my brothers who were all learned Brahmanas. To purify myself, I sought the protection of Mahadeva. I sang the praises of the great deity by reciting his names. Bhava became gratified with me and gave me a battle-axe and many other celestial astras.

And he said to me, "You will be freed from sin and invincible in battle; Yama himself shall not succeed in vanquishing you, for you will be freed from disease." Thus did the illustrious and crowned deity of auspicious form speak to me. Through his grace I obtained all that he had said.'

Viswamitra says, 'I was once a Kshatriya. I worshipped Bhava with the desire of becoming a Brahmana. Through the grace of that great deity I attained the high status of a Brahmarishi that is so difficult to obtain.'

The Rishi Asita-Devala says to the royal son of Pandu, 'Once, through the curse of Sakra, all the punya I had accumulated through my righteous deeds was destroyed. It was the puissant Mahadeva who gave me back that merit together with fame and a long life.'

The illustrious Rishi Gritsamada, also Indra's dear friend who resembled the Devaguru Brihaspati himself in splendour, says to Yudhishtira, 'In antique times Sakra performed a yagna extending over a thousand years. During that sacrifice, Sakra engaged me to recite the Samans.

Vasishta, the son of that Manu who sprung from the eyes of Brahma, came to that yagna and said to me, "Dvijottama, you are not singing the Rathantara properly. Do not find sin like this, and chant the Samans correctly. Ah, why do you commit such a sin as despoils the yagna?"

Having said these words, the Rishi Vasishta gave way to his anger and said to me, "I curse you to become an animal devoid of intelligence, always subject to grief, ever fearful, and an inhabitant of pathless forests without wind and water, and abandoned by other creatures. I condemn you to live thus for ten thousand years, and another eighteen hundred more. That forest in which you will pass this period will have no sacred trees and will be the haunt of Rurus and lions. You will have to become a cruel deer plunged into sorrow."

As soon as he had said these words, I was transformed into a deer. I then sought the protection of Maheswara. The great deity said to me, "You will be freed from all disease, and immortality shall be yours. You will never be afflicted by any anguish. Your friendship with Indra will remain unchanged, and may both Indra and your sacrifices multiply."

The puissant Mahadeva favours all creatures in this way. He is always the great dispenser and ordainer of the joy and sorrow of all living creatures. That illustrious God cannot be grasped by thought, word or deed. Best of warriors, through the grace of Mahadeva, there is none that is equal to me in learning.'

After this, Krishna speaks again, 'Mahadeva of golden eyes was gratified by my tapasya. Pleased he said to me, "Krishna, through my grace, you will be cherished more than wealth that is coveted by all. You will be invincible in battle. Your tejas will equal that of Agni's."

On that occasion, Mahadeva granted me thousands of other boons. In another former birth, I adored Mahadeva on the Manimanta Mountain for millions of years. Gratified, the illustrious deity said to me, "Blessed be you, ask me for any boons you desire."

Bowing to him, I said, "Isana, if the puissant Mahadeva has been gratified with me, then let my devotion to him be eternal! This is the boon that I ask." Mahadeva said to me, "Be it so", and disappeared.'

Jaigishavya says, 'Yudhishtira, once in the city of Varanasi, Mahadeva sought me and conferred upon me the eight attributes of sovereignty.'

Garga says, 'Son of Pandu, pleased with me because of a great mental sacrifice that I performed, Siva bestowed upon me, on the banks of the sacred Saraswati, that wonderful science, the knowledge of Kaala with its sixty-four branches. He also bestowed upon me a thousand sons, all with equal merit and all masters of the Vedas. Through his grace, our lives were expanded to ten million years.'

Parasara says, 'In a previous Manvantara, I gratified Sarva. At the time, I wanted a son with great ascetic punya, endowed with superior tejas, given to high yoga, who would earn world-wide fame, arrange the Vedas, and become a repository of prosperity; who would be devoted to the Vedas and the Brahmanas, and be distinguished for his compassion. Even such a son did I ask for from Maheswara.

Knowing that this was my heart's desire, Mahadeva said to me, "I will grant your wish and you will have a son named Krishna. In that Manvantara, which will be known as Savarni Manu, that son of yours will be reckoned among the seven Rishis. He will divide and re-arrange the Veda, and be the propagator of Kuru's race. In addition, he will be the author of the ancient itihasas and do great good to the universe. Blessed with austere tapasya, he will be a loving friend of Sakra. Free from diseases of every kind, that son of yours will be immortal."

Having said these words, the Great Deity vanished. Even such is the good, Yudhishtira, that I have obtained from that indestructible and immutable God, of the highest penances and supreme energy.'

Mandavya says, 'In former times, though I was not a thief, I was wrongly suspected of theft and was impaled on a stake on the orders of a king. I then worshipped Mahadeva who said to me, "You will soon be freed from this impalement and live for millions of years. Meanwhile, you will not experience any pain. You will also be freed from every kind of affliction and disease. And since your body has sprung from the fourth foot of Dharma, you will be unrivalled on earth. Make your life fruitful. Without any obstacles, you will be able to bathe in all the sacred tirthas of the earth. And after your body decays, I you will enjoy the pure felicity of swarga for all eternity."

Having said these words, Maheswara of unrivalled splendour and clad in animal skin, disappeared with all his Ganas.'

Galava says, 'Formerly, I studied at the feet of my guru Viswamitra. Taking his leave, I set out for home to see my father. But he had died and my sorrowing mother, weeping bitterly, said to me, "Alas, your father will never see his youthful son who, adorned with Vedic knowledge, filled with self-restraint, has been allowed by his guru to come home."

Hearing these words of my mother, I despaired of ever seeing my father again. I worshipped Maheswara with a rapt soul; He was gratified, revealed himself to me and said, "Your father, your mother, and you will all be freed from death. Go and enter your home without delay; you will find your father there."

Yudhishtira, hearing this from Siva and paying him homage, I left for home and saw my father appear before me after having completed his daily yagna. He came out bearing in his hands some homa, some kusa grass and some fallen fruits. And he seemed to have already eaten, for he had washed himself. Throwing down what he carried, shedding tears of joy, my father raised me up, for I had prostrated myself at his feet.

Embracing me he sniffed the top of my head and said, "It is my good fortune to see you again. You have returned, having acquired knowledge from the guru."'" Vaisampayana continued, “Hearing of these wonderful feats of Mahadeva recited by the sannyasis, the son of Pandu is amazed. Then Krishna speaks once more to Yudhishtira, like Vishnu speaking to Puruhuta.

Krishna says, ‘Upamanyu, who seemed to blaze with lustre like the sun, said to me, “Men that are stained with sin do not succeed in attaining to Isana. Their dispositions being tainted by rajas and tamas, they can never approach the Supreme Deity. It is only those evolved men of pure souls that succeed in attaining to him.

Even if a man lives in the enjoyment of every pleasure and luxury, he is regarded as equal to a vanaprastha of cleansed soul if he be devoted to the Supreme Deity. If Rudra be gratified with a person, he can confer upon him the states of Brahma or Krishna, or of Sakra above all the Devas, or the sovereignty of the three worlds. Men who worship Bhava even inwardly succeed in freeing themselves from all sins and attain a place in swarga with the Devas.

One who razes homes to the ground and destroys tanks and lakes, why, one who destroys the whole universe is not stained with sin if he adores and worships Mahadeva. One who is without any auspicious sign and is stained by every sin has all his sins washed away by meditating on Siva. Even worms, insects and birds that devote themselves to Mahadeva range fearlessly.

This is my firm conviction that those men who devote themselves to Mahadeva Siva are certainly liberated from rebirth.”’

After this, Krishna again says to Yudhishtira, ‘Aditya, Chandra, Vayu, Agni, swarga, Bhumi, the Vasus, the Viswedevas, Dhatri, Aryaman, Sukra, Brihaspati, the Rudras, the Saddhyas, Varuna, Brahma, Sakra, Maruts, the Upanishads that deal with knowledge of Brahman, satya, the Vedas, the yagnas, dakshina given during sacrifices, Brahmanas reciting the Vedas, Soma, the Sacrificer, the havis of the Devas or ghee poured in yagnas, raksha, diksha, have all sprung from the Creator of all creatures.

All kinds of restraints in the form of vows and fasts and other rigid observances, swaha, vashat, the Brahmanas, the divine cow, the foremost acts of dharma, the wheel of Kaala, strength, fame, self-restraint, the steadfastness of all intelligent men, all deeds of goodness and their opposite, the Saptarishis, Buddhi, all kinds of excellent touch, the success of all religious acts, have emerged from him.

The diverse tribes of the Devas, those beings that drink Agni, those that are drinkers of Soma, clouds, Suyamas, Rishitas, all creatures having mantras for their bodies, Abhasuras, those beings that live upon just scent, those that live upon sight only, those that restrain their speech, those that restrain their minds, those that are pure, those that can assume diverse forms through yoga have been born from that Creator.

Those Devas that live on touch for their food, those that subsist on vision and those that subsist upon the ghee poured in sacrifices, those beings that can create with their wills whatever they want, they that are regarded as the foremost ones among the Devas, and all the other deities, the Suparnas, the Gandharvas, the Pisachas, the Danavas, Yakshas, the Charanas, and the Nagas have been born from him.

All that is gross and all that is subtle, all that is soft and all that is not, all sorrows and all joys, all sorrows that come after joy and all joy that comes after sorrow, the Samkhya philosophy, yoga, and that which transcends objects that are regarded as foremost and superior, all objects of veneration, all the Devas, and all the Viswadevas of the universe who, entering into the physical forces, sustain and uphold this ancient creation of that illustrious deity have sprung from that Creator of all creatures.

All this that I have said is grosser than that which the wise perceive with the help of tapasya. Indeed, that subtle Brahman is the source of life. I bow my head in reverence to It. Let that immutable and indestructible master, always adored by us, grant us desirable boons.

That man who, subduing his senses and purifying himself, recites this mantra, without interruption for one month, succeeds in acquiring the merit that is attached to an Aswamedha yagna. By reciting this the Brahmana succeeds in acquiring all the Vedas; the Kshatriya becomes crowned with victory, O son of Pritha; the Vaisya succeeds in gaining wealth and cleverness; and the Sudra, in winning happiness here and a good end hereafter.

Famed men, by reciting this prince among mantras, the Siva Sahasranama, the thousand and eight holy names of Mahadeva, sacred and able to purify all sins, set their hearts on Rudra. By chanting this best of mantras a man succeeds in living in swarga for as many years as there are pores on his body.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Lord of the Bharata vamsa, what is the origin of the adage that, during the grihastasrama, when married, the husband and wife must perform all duties together? Does that saying refer to discharging all karmas together, due only to what is laid down by the great Rishis in ancient times, or does it refer to the duty of begetting children from religious motives, or has it reference only to carnal pleasure?

My mind is greatly troubled by this matter. In my opinion, what the Rishis have spoken of as joint duties is incorrect. That which in this world is called the union to discharge all duties together ceases with death and is not to be seen to continue in the next. This union to discharge all karmas together leads to swarga.

But swarga is attained by persons that are dead. Of a married couple it is seen that only one dies at a time. Where does the other remain? Do you tell me this.

Men attain to diverse kinds of fruits by practising diverse kinds of karmas. The occupations of men also are of many kinds. Diverse, again, are the narakas to which they go based on this diversity of dharma and karma. Women, in particular, the Rishis have said, are deceitful. When human beings are such, and when women in particular have been declared to be false, how can there be a union between the sexes for the purpose of discharging all duties together?

In the very Vedas one may read that women are untrue. The word dharma, as used in the Vedas, seems to have been coined in the first instance for general application. Hence applying that word to the rites and life of marriage, where it has no real relevance, is erroneous.

I cannot understand this although I constantly reflect upon it. Pitamaha, it is fitting for you to expound this to me in detail, clearly and according to what has been laid down in the Sruti. In fact, explain to me what its characteristics are, and the way in which it has come to be.'

Bhishma says, 'In this regard is cited the old story of the discourse between Ashtavakra and the woman known by the name Disa. In earlier days, Ashtavakra wished to marry and begged the Mahatman Rishi Vadanya for his daughter. Her name was Suprabha.

She was matchless in beauty. In virtues, dignity, conduct and manners, she was superior to all others. With a mere glance, she of the beautiful eyes had robbed him of his heart even as a delightful garden adorned with flowers does in spring.

The Rishi said to Ashtavakra, "Yes, I shall bestow my daughter on you. But first make a journey to the sacred north. You will see many things there."

Ashtavakra said, "Tell me what I shall see in that region. Indeed, I am ready to obey whatever command you give me."

Vadanya said, "Passing over the dominions of Kubera you will cross the Himavat Mountains. You will then behold the Kailasa Mountain on which Rudra dwells. It is inhabited by Siddhas and Charanas. It abounds with the Ganas of Mahadeva, of diverse forms, playful and lovers of dance.

It is also inhabited by many Pisachas of diverse forms and all covered with fragrant colourful powders, and dancing with joyful hearts accompanied by different kinds of instruments. Mahadeva dwells there, surrounded by these who move swiftly in the mazes of the dance or refrain at times altogether from forward, backward or transverse movement of every kind.

We have heard that he and his Ganas are always present in this delightful place on the Rudra Mountain. It was there that the goddess Uma performed the severest tapasya for the sake of acquiring Siva for her lord. Hence, it is said, that place is loved by both Mahadeva and Uma.

In ancient days, on the heights of the Mahaparswa Mountains, which lie to the north of these sacred mountains, many Devas and also the foremost of Manavas adored Mahadeva.

You will cross that realm on your northward journey. You will then see a beautiful blue forest resembling a mass of clouds. There, in that forest, you will see a beautiful female ascetic who looks like Sree herself.

Venerable in age and highly blessed, she is in the observance of Diksha. When you see her, you must duly worship her.

After you have seen that Devi, you will return here and marry my daughter. If you are willing to do this, proceed on your journey and do as I have said."

Ashtavakra said, "So be it. I will do your bidding. I will go to that realm of which you speak. On your part, be true to your given word."

The illustrious Ashtavakra set out on his journey. He went towards the north and at last reached the Himavat Mountains peopled by Siddhas and Charanas. Arriving there, he came upon the sacred river Bahuda whose waters produce great punya. He bathed in one of its delightful tirthas in clear water, and worshipped the Devas with offerings of water.

His ablutions completed, he spread some kusa grass and lay down to rest awhile. Passing the night in this way, the Brahmana rose with the dawn. He once more performed his ablutions in the sacred waters of the Bahuda and then lit his homa fire and worshipped it with Vedic mantras.

He then worshipped both Rudra and Uma with appropriate kriyas, and rested for some more time on the shore of a lake in the Bahuda. Refreshed, he set off from there towards Kailasa.

He saw a golden gate ablaze with beauty. He saw also the Mandakini and the Nalini of the Mahatman Kubera. Seeing him arrive, all the Yakshas and Rakshasas with Manibhadra at their head, who protected that lake covered with unworldly lotuses, came out all together to welcome and honour the renowned traveller. In return the Rishi worshipped those beings of awesome strength and asked them to report his arrival to Kubera.

The Rakshasas said to him, "Without waiting for the news from us, King Vaisravana is coming into your presence of his own accord. He knows well the objective of your journey. Behold that blessed master, radiant with his own energy."

Then Kubera Vaisravana approached Ashtavakra and asked after his wellbeing. After these polite inquiries, the Lord of treasures said to the regenerate Rishi, "You are welcome here. Tell me what it is that you seek from me. I will do what you bid me to accomplish. Do you enter my abode as you like. Duly entertained by me, and after your business is complete, you may go without any hindrance."

Having said these words, Kubera led the Brahmana into his palace. He offered him his own throne and also padya to wash his feet and the customary arghya. After the two had taken their seats, the Yakshas of Kubera, led by Manibhadra, and many Gandharvas and Kinnaras, sat down before them.

After all of them had taken their seats, Kubera said, “Understanding what you desire, the Apsaras will dance for your pleasure. It is right for me to entertain you and you must be served with proper care.”

Sannyasi Ashtavakra said in a sweet voice, “Let the dance begin.”

Then Urvara and Misrakesi, Rambha and Urvasi, Alambusha and Ghritachi, Chitra, Chitrangada and Ruchi, and Manohara, Sukesi and Sumukhi, Hasini and Prabha, and Vidyuta, Prasami and Danta, and Vidyota and Rati, and many other exquisite Apsaras began to dance. And the Gandharvas present played on diverse musical instruments—music that made the heart soar and time stand still.

The Rishi Ashtavakra passed a full celestial year there in the abode of Lord Vaisravana and he never knew how much time had passed while he listened to that music and watched the dance.

Then Vaisravana said to the Rishi, “Learned Brahmana, behold, a little more than a year has passed since you came here. This music and dance, especially known as Gandharva, is a stealer of the heart and of time. Do as you wish or let this continue if that be your pleasure. You are my guest and, therefore, worthy of worship. This is my house. Command us. We are all bound to you.”

Ashtavakra, greatly pleased, replied, “I have been duly honoured by you. I now wish to leave. I am pleased beyond all measure. All this befits you. Through your grace, and in accordance with Rishi Vadanya’s command, I will now proceed to my journey’s end. May you prosper, O Lord Kubera!”

Saying this, the Rishi left Kubera’s abode and went northwards again. He crossed the Kailasa and the Mandara Mountains as also the golden Meru. Beyond those great mountains lay the realm where Mahadeva lived as a humble ascetic. With utmost concentration and reverence, the sage bowed and circled that place.

Descending again from that auspicious place, he now considered himself sanctified as he had seen that sacred abode of Mahadeva. Having circled that mountain three times, the Rishi, with his face still turned towards the north, went on with a joyful heart.

He saw another forest that was delightful in every respect. It was adorned with the fruits and roots of every season, and it resounded with the music of thousands of birds. There were many delightful groves throughout the forest. The illustrious Rishi then saw a pleasing hermitage.

Ashtavakra also saw many golden mountains in diverse forms, decked with precious stones. In the bejewelled earth he also saw many lakes and tanks. And he saw other marvels and, seeing these, his mind was filled with bliss.

He then saw a magnificent palace made of gold and adorned with jewels. It surpassed the place of Kubera himself in every way. Surrounding it were many mountains of precious stones. There were also many shimmering chariots and piles of jewels.

The Rishi saw the river Mandakini whose waters were strewn with countless mandara flowers. Luminous gemstones and especially diamonds were strewn everywhere across the grounds.

The palace contained many vast halls and chambers whose arches, too, were embellished with various kinds of precious stones. These were also adorned with filigree nets of pearls interspersed with many other fine jewels. Many unearthly sights that captivated the heart and the eye surrounded that palace. That delightful asrama was inhabited by numberless Rishis.

Beholding these sights all around, the Rishi began to think of where he would take shelter. He reached the palace gate and said, "Let those that live here know that a guest has come asking for shelter."

Hearing the Rishi's voice, many young girls came out together from that palace. Seven in number, they were of different kinds of beauty, each one lovelier than the next. Every one of those maidens stole the Rishi's heart. With his best efforts, the sage could not control his mind. Indeed, his heart lost all its serenity.

Observing himself succumbing to such wild emotions, the Rishi made a determined effort and, being wise, finally succeeded in controlling himself. The women said, "Let the illustrious one enter."

Curious about those maidens and about that palatial mansion, the regenerate Rishi entered as he was told. Going in, he saw an old woman in a state of decay, attired in white robes and adorned with every kind of ornament. The Rishi blessed her formally.

The old woman returned his good wishes in a fitting manner. She rose and offered him a seat. Having taken his seat, Ashtavakra said, "Let all the girls go to their chambers. Let only one stay here. That one who remains here must be wise and of tranquil heart. Let all the others leave."

Thus addressed, all of them circled the Rishi in pradakshina and then left the grand hall. Only the old woman remained there. The day quickly passed and night came. The Rishi, seated on a splendid bed, said to the old woman, "Blessed devi, the night deepens. You may go to sleep."

When the Rishi ended their conversation thus, the old woman laid herself down on an ample bed. But soon she rose from that bed and, pretending to shiver with cold she went to the bed of the Rishi. Ashtavakra courteously welcomed her. She stretched out her slender arms and tenderly embraced the Rishi.

Seeing him unmoved as a piece of wood, she was saddened and began to speak. "There is no pleasure, save that which waits upon Kama, which women can derive from a man. I am under the influence of desire and I seek you out. Do you embrace me in return. Be joyful and unite yourself with me. Embrace me, learned one, for I desire you greatly. This union with me is the reward of the stern tapasya that you have performed.

Even at first sight I wanted you. Do you also make love to me. All this wealth, and everything else that you see here, are mine. Along with my heart and body, you will become master of all this. I will satisfy all your wishes. Dally with me in these delightful forests that can fulfil every desire.

I will give you complete obedience in everything, and you can sport with me for your pleasure. We will enjoy every desire, human and divine.

There is no pleasure more agreeable to women than that which she derives from the companionship of a man. Indeed, sexual union with a man is the most delicious fruit of joy that we can reap. When urged by Kama, women become wanton and capricious. At such times, they do not feel any pain, even if they walk over a desert of burning sand."

Ashtavakra said, "'Blessed one, I never approach another's wife. Union with another man's wife is condemned by those conversant with the dharma shastras. I am a stranger to all kinds of pleasure. You should know that I want to marry in order to have children. I swear this by truth itself.

Through these children, righteously acquired, I will go to those realms of felicity which cannot be otherwise attained. Good devi, know what is consistent with dharma and do not attempt to seduce me."

The old woman said, "The very deities of wind and fire and water, or other divinities, are not as agreeable to women as Kama, the god of desire. Women are always drawn to sexual union. Among a thousand women, even among hundreds of thousands, only one may perhaps be found that is devoted to her husband. When under the influence of desire, they do not care for family, father, mother, brother, husband, sons or husband's brother but blindly pursue the path of lust.

Pursuing what they consider happiness, they destroy their families by birth and marriage even as many mighty rivers erode the banks that contain them. The Creator himself had observed these grave faults in women."

Determined to further know the good in women, the Rishi said, "Do not speak to me like this. Yearning springs from affection. Tell me what else I should do."

That woman said, "In time, you will see if I have anything good in me. Live here for some time and I shall regard myself abundantly rewarded."

Yudhishtira, thus addressed by her, the Rishi agreed, saying, "I will live with you in this place as long as I can."

The Rishi looked at the old woman and began to reflect on the matter. He was tortured by his very thoughts. His eyes derived no pleasure from any part of her body. On the other hand, he was repelled by the ugliness of her limbs.

"This woman is definitely the goddess of this palace. Has she been rendered ugly through some curse? I will gradually discover the cause of this." Reflecting thus within himself, and beside himself with curiosity, Ashtavakra passed the next day in some anxiety.

The woman then said to him, "Illustrious one, look at the evening clouds reddened by the setting sun. What can I do for you?"

The Rishi said, "Bring water for my ablutions. Having bathed, I will do my sandhya vandana, restraining my speech and my senses."

CANTO 20

"Bhishma says, 'Thus commanded, the woman said, "Be it so." She brought oil with which to rub the Rishi's body and a piece of cloth for him to wear during the ablutions. Allowed by the ascetic, she rubbed every part of his body with the fragrant oil she had brought. Gently was the Rishi massaged, and when that was over, he went to the room kept for his ablutions. There he sat upon a new and splendid asana.

After Ashtavakra sat, the old woman began to wash his body with her soft hands and tender fingers. One by one, in correct order, she served the Rishi in his ablutions. Between the warm water with which he was washed, and the soft hands that washed him, the Rishi did not realise that the whole night had passed.

Rising from the bath he was astounded. He saw that the sun had risen above the horizon in the east. He asked himself in some amazement, "Is this real or an illusion?" Ashtavakra duly worshipped Surya Deva. This done, he asked the woman what he should do next.

The old woman cooked some food for the sage that was like amrita itself. So delicious was that food that the Rishi could not eat much of it. In partaking that little, the day passed and evening arrived. The old woman asked the Rishi to go to bed and sleep. A marvellous bed was assigned to him and she lay on another one.

At first the Rishi and the old woman lay on different beds, but at midnight she left her own bed and came to his. And lo, now she was young and beautiful in her face and every limb.

Ashtavakra said, "My mind rejects sexual union with one who is another's wife. Leave my bed. Blessed are you; refrain from this of your own accord."

Thus dissuaded by that Brahmana of self-restraint, the woman said to him, "I am my own mistress. You will not earn any sin by taking me."

Ashtavakra said, "Women can never be their own mistresses. It is the opinion of Brahma himself that a woman never deserves to be independent."

The woman said, "Learned Brahmana, I am tormented by desire. You have seen my devotion to you. You incur sin by refusing to meet me lovingly."

Ashtavakra said, "Diverse faults drag away the man that does as he likes. As for myself, I am able to control my desire. O good devi, return to your own bed."

The woman said, "Look, I bow to you, bending my head. It becomes you to show me your grace. O sinless one, I prostrate myself before you; do you become my refuge. If indeed you see such sin in congress with one that is not your wife, I yield myself to you. Do you, O Dvija, take my hand in marriage. You will incur no sin. I tell you truly. Know that I am my own mistress, and if there be any sin in this let it be mine alone. My heart is devoted to you. I am my own mistress. Do you accept me."

Ashtavakra said, "How is it that you are your own mistress? Tell me the reason for this. There is not a single woman in the three worlds that deserves to be regarded as her own mistress. The father protects her while she is a girl. The husband protects her while she is in her youth. Sons protect her when she is old. Women can never be independent as long as they live."

The woman said, "Since my childhood I have adopted the vow of brahmacharya. Do not doubt it. I am still a virgin. Make me your wife, Brahmana, do not destroy my devotion for you."

Ashtavakra said, "As you are inclined to me, so am I inclined to you. There is this question, however, that should be settled. Can it be that by yielding to my desire I will not break my word given to the Rishi Vadanya? All that here is wonderful. Yet, will it lead to what is truly beneficial? Here is a maiden adorned with fine ornaments and garments. She is exceptionally beautiful. Why did decay cloak her beauty for so long? Now suddenly she looks like a young and most lovely maiden. But there is no knowing what form she may take later.

I shall never swerve from the control which I have over desire and the other passions, or from my contentment with what I already have. It cannot lead to any good if I do so. I will keep myself united with the truth!”

"Yudhishtira says, 'Tell me why, despite his great tejas, did that woman not fear Ashtavakra's curse? Also, how did Ashtavakra succeed in returning from that place?'

Bhishma says, 'Ashtavakra asked her "How do you change your form as you please? I want to know this and you must not lie to me. Speak truly before a Brahmana."

The woman said, "Best of Brahmanas, wherever you may be, in heaven or on earth, this desire for sexual union is to be found. Now listen with attention to what I have to say. I devised this trial to test you. You have conquered all the worlds for being true to your resolve.

Know that I am the embodiment of the north. You have seen the fickleness of woman. Even old women are tormented by the desire for sexual union. Brahma himself and all the Devas along with Indra have been pleased with you. I know the reason why you have come here.

You have been sent by the Rishi Vadanya, the father of your bride, in order that I may instruct you. In accordance with his wishes, I have already done so. You will return home safely. Your journey back will not be arduous.

You will have the girl you have chosen for your wife. She will bear you a son. I had sought you through desire and you answered me well. The desire for sexual union cannot be transcended in any of the three worlds. But you have achieved that punya; return now to your home.

What else do you wish to hear from me? Ashtavakra, I will tell you anything truthfully. The Rishi Vadanya worshipped me for your sake. I have said all this to you to honour him."

After receiving many further instructions from her, Ashtavakra joined his hands in reverence. He then asked the wonderful woman for her permission to return. Taking her leave, he came back to his own asrama. Resting there for a while, he sought the leave of his kinsmen and friends and went to the Brahmana Vadanya.

Welcomed by Vadanya, the Rishi Ashtavakra narrated all that he had seen during course of his sojourn in the north. He said, “Commanded by you I went to the mountains of Gandhamadana. North of these mountains, I found a devi, who welcomed me courteously. She mentioned you and also instructed me in various matters. Having listened to her I have now returned.

The learned Vadanya said to the Rishi, “Take my daughter’s hand with the proper rites and under the proper constellations. You are the best husband I can choose for her.”

Ashtavakra said, “So be it” and took the hand of Vadanya’s daughter in marriage. Indeed the Rishi was overjoyed. Having taken that beautiful woman for his wife he continued to live in his own asrama, freed from passion of every kind.’”

"Yudhishtira says, 'Whom do the eternal Brahmanas that keep strict vratas regard as worthy of receiving gifts? Is a Brahmana that bears the signs of a brahmachari regarded as such or even one who does keep brahmacharya?'

Bhishma says, 'Rajan, it has been said that gifts should be made to a Brahmana that observes his svadharma, the duties of his own varna, whether he bears the signs of a brahmachari or not, for both are without blemish.'

Yudhishtira says, 'What blame does an impure man incur, if he makes gifts of sacrificial butter or food with great devotion to Brahmanas?'

Bhishma says, 'Even one without self-restraint becomes, without doubt, cleansed by devotion. Such a man is purified in every act and not with regard to making gifts alone.'

Yudhishtira says, 'It has been said that a Brahmana who is engaged in worshipping the Devas must never be scrutinised. The learned, however, say that a Brahmana's behaviour and ability must be examined with respect to such actions as have reference to the Pitris.'

Bhishma says, 'The actions karmas that have reference to the Devas bear fruit not as a result of the Brahmana who performs the deeds but through the grace of the Devas themselves. Without doubt, those who perform yagnas obtain the punya of those actions through the blessing of the gods. Brahmanas are always devoted to Brahman. The Rishi Markandeya, one of the greatest Rishis endowed with intelligence in all the worlds, said this in ancient times.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, why are these five types of men regarded highly: he that is a stranger, he that has knowledge of the duties of his varna, he that is connected by marriage, he that is rich in tapasya, and he performs yagnas?'

Bhishma says, 'The first three—strangers, relatives and ascetics, when pure of birth, devoted to religious acts, learning, compassion, modesty, sincerity and honesty, are regarded as fitting. The other two, men of learning and those devoted to sacrifices, when endowed with five of these attributes—purity of birth, compassion, modesty, sincerity and truthfulness, are also held in high regard.

Listen now to me as I tell you the opinions of Bhumi Devi, the Rishi Kasyapa, Agni and the sannyasi Markandeya.

Bhumi said, "As a lump of mud quickly dissolves when cast into the sea, even so every kind of sin disappears in the three high attributes of presiding at yagnas, teaching and receiving dakshina."

Kasyapa said, "The Vedas with their six branches, the Samkhya philosophy, the Puranas and high birth, all fail to save a Brahmana person if he falls away from good conduct."

Agni said, "If a Brahmana who regards himself as learned and is engaged in study seeks to destroy the reputation of others using that knowledge, he falls from dharma, and is regarded as being untruthful. A man of such destructive ways can never attain the realms of grace."

Markandeya said, "If a thousand Aswamedha yagnas and satya were weighed in the balance, I do not know if the former would weigh even half as much as the latter."'

Bhishma continues, 'Having spoken these words, those four, Bhumi Devi, Kasyapa, Agni and Markandeya, each invested with great tejas, left.'

Yudhishtira says, 'If Brahmanas observant of the brahmacharya vrata seek the offerings one makes to one's deceased ancestors in Sraddhas, will the Sraddha be regarded as properly performed, if those offerings are made to such Brahmanas.'

Bhishma says, 'Even if this brahmacharya vrata is practised for the prescribed period of twelve years and a Brahmana has mastered the Vedas and their angas, if a Brahmana himself seeks such offering and eats the same, he is regarded to fall away from his vow. The Sraddha itself, however, is not regarded as tainted in any way.'

Yudhishtira says, ‘The wise have said that dharma has many ends and many doors. Pitamaha, tell me what are the definite conclusions in this matter.’

Bhishma says, ‘Abstention from injury to others, truthfulness, forgiveness, compassion, self-restraint, and sincerity are the indications of dharma. There are men who roam the earth praising righteousness, but without practising what they preach and engaged all the while in sin.

He who gives gold, jewels or horses to such men has to sink into naraka and to live there for ten years, eating the faeces of those who subsist upon the flesh of dead cows and buffaloes, of base men called Pukkasas, of others that live on the outskirts of cities and villages, of untouchables, and of men that proclaim, under the influence of wrath and folly, the actions and the omissions of others. Those foolish men who do give the offerings made in Sraddhas to a Brahmana observant of the vow of brahmacharya have to descend into realms of untold misery.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘Tell me what is superior to brahmacharya? What is the highest indication of virtue? What is the highest kind of purity?’

Bhishma says, ‘I say to you that abstention from honey and meat is superior even to brahmacharya. Dharma consists of self-restraint; the best indication of righteousness is renunciation, which is also the highest kind of purity.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘When should one practise dharma? When should artha be sought? When should kama be enjoyed? Pitamaha, tell me this.’

Bhishma says, ‘One should earn wealth in the first part of one’s life. Then should one earn righteousness, and then enjoy pleasure. One should not, however, attach oneself to any of these. One should honour the Brahmanas, worship one’s guru and one’s elders, show compassion for all creatures, and be of mild disposition and amiable speech. To utter a lie in a court of justice, to behave deceitfully towards the king, to act falsely towards teachers and elders, are considered to be as heinous as killing a Brahmana. One should never be violent towards a king. Nor should one ever strike a cow. Both these offences are equivalent to the sin of foeticide.

One should never abandon one’s homa fire. One should also never disregard one’s study of the Vedas. One should never attack a Brahmana in word or deed. All these offences are equivalent to Brahmahatya.’

Yudhishtira says, ‘What kind of Brahmanas should be regarded as good? What kind of Brahmanas should one make gifts to in order to acquire great punya? What kind of Brahmanas must one feed? Tell me all this, Pitamaha!'

Bhishma says, 'Those Brahmanas that are free from anger, devoted to acts of righteousness, firm in truth, and that practise self-restraint are regarded as good. By making gifts unto them one acquires punya. One wins great merit by making gifts unto Brahmanas who are free from pride, capable of bearing everything, firm in the pursuit of their aims, with a mastery over their senses, devoted to the good of all creatures, and friendly towards all.

One earns punya by making gifts to Brahmanas who are free from greed, are pure of heart and conduct, who possess learning and modesty, are truthful in speech and observant of their svadharma as laid down in the shastras. The Rishis have declared that Brahmana to be deserving of dakshina who studies the four Vedas with all their angas and is devoted to the six duties laid down in the shastras. One acquires great punya by making gifts to Brahmanas possessing these qualities.

The man who makes gifts to a deserving Brahmana multiplies his merit a thousand-fold. A single righteous Brahmana with wisdom and Vedic lore, observant of the dharma and kartavyas laid down in the shastras, distinguished by purity of behaviour, is competent to save a whole vamsa.

One should make gifts of cows, horses, wealth and food to such a Brahmana. By making such gifts one earns great felicity and happiness in the next world. As I have already told you, even one such Brahmana can save the entire vamsa of the giver. What then can I say about the punya of making gifts to many Brahmanas of such attributes?

In making gifts, therefore, one should always judiciously choose the one to whom the gifts are to be made. Hearing of a Brahmana with the proper attributes and respected by all good people, one should invite him to one's home even if he lives far away, welcome him when he arrives and worship him with all one's means.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, I want you to tell me about the laws that have been laid down with regard to the Devas and Pitris on occasions of Sraddhas.'

Bhishma says, 'Having purified oneself by bathing and performing the known auspicious rites, one should carry out all karmas relating to the Devas in the morning, and all those relating to the Pitris in the afternoon. What is given to men should be given at midday with love and reverence. An untimely gift will be appropriated by Rakshasas.

Gifts of articles that have been stepped over by anyone, or been licked or sucked, that which is not given gently or has been seen by menstruating women, do not produce any merit. Such gifts are regarded as the portion belonging to the Rakshasas. Gifts of things that have been announced before many people or from which a portion has been eaten by a Sudra, or that have been seen or licked by a dog, form portions for Rakshasas.

Food which is mixed with hair or in which there are worms, or which has been stained with saliva or which has been gazed at by a dog, or into which tear-drops have fallen or which has been trampled upon must be considered as forming the share of a Rakshasa. Food that has been eaten by one who cannot pronounce Pranava, the AUM, or that has been eaten by a person bearing arms, or that has been eaten by an evil man must be regarded as forming the portion of Rakshasas.

Food eaten by one from which a part has already been eaten by another, or which is eaten without a part being offered to Devas, guests and children, is appropriated by Rakshasas. Such tainted food, if offered to the Devas and Pitris is never accepted by them but is taken by Rakshasas. The food offered in Sraddhas by the three twice-born varnas, in which mantras are either not recited or recited incorrectly, and in which the niyamas laid down in the shastras about distributing to guests are not adhered to, is appropriated by Rakshasas.

Food distributed to guests without having been previously dedicated to the Devas or the Pitris with the aid of libations poured on the sacred fire, which has been stained in by a portion having been eaten by an evil or profane man, should be known to form the share of Rakshasas.

I have told you what the portions are of the Rakshasas. Listen now to me as I explain the rules for ascertaining the Brahmana deserving of dakshina. All Brahmanas that have become outcastes because of committing heinous sins, as also Brahmanas that are fools and madmen, do not deserve to be invited to Sraddhas in which offerings are made to either the Devas or the Pitris. That Brahmana who is afflicted with leukoderma, or he that is lacking in virility, or he that has leprosy, or he that has got phthisis or he that is epileptic with sensory delusions, or he that is blind, must not be welcomed.

Brahmanas that are physicians, those that receive regular pay for worshipping the images of deities established by the rich, or live upon the service of the Devas, those that observe vratas out of pride or other false motives, and those that sell Soma, do not deserve to be invited. Brahmanas that recite the shastras aloud without regard for time or place, or are singers, dancers or players of instruments, or warriors and athletes, do not deserve to be invited.

Brahmanas who pour libations on the sacred fire for Sudras, or who are teachers of Sudras, or are servants of Sudra masters, do not merit an invitation. That Brahmana who is paid for his services as teacher, or who, as a sishya, attends the talks of a guru because of some allowance that is made to him, does not deserve to be invited, for both of them are regarded as merchants of Vedic knowledge. The Brahmana who has been induced to accept the gift of food in a Sraddha at the very start, as also he who has married a Sudra woman, even if he possesses of every kind of knowledge, does not deserve to be invited.

Brahmanas without garhapatya, domestic fire, and they that attend upon corpses, they that are thieves, and they that have otherwise sinned should not be invited to Sraddhas. Brahmanas whose antecedents are not known or are base, and they that are Putrika-putras, do not deserve to be invited on occasions of Sraddhas.

Rajan, that Brahmana who loans money, or he who lives upon the interest of the loans given by him, or he who lives by selling living creatures, does not deserve invitation. Men who have been subordinated by their wives, or they who live by becoming the lovers of unchaste women, or they who abstain from their morning and evening prayers do not deserve to be invited to Sraddhas.

Listen now to me as I tell you about the Brahmana that has been ordained for revering the Devas and the Pitris. Indeed, I will tell you about those merits because of which one may become a giver or a receiver of gifts in Sraddhas, despite all these faults.

Brahmanas that observe of the rites and ceremonies laid down in the shastras, or they that possess punya, or they that chant the Gayatri mantra, or they that are observant of the nitya karmas of Brahmanas, even if they take to farming for a living, can be invited to Sraddhas. If a Brahmana happens to be high-born, he deserves to be invited to Sraddhas even if he is a soldier fighting another's battle.

That Brahmana who takes to trade for a living should be rejected even if he possesses punya. The Brahmana who pours libations every day on the sacred fire, or who dwells in a fixed place, who is not a thief and who is hospitable to guests who arrive at his house, deserves to be invited to Sraddhas. The Brahmana who recites the Savitri mantra morning, noon and night, or who lives on charity, who is observant of the rites and ceremonies laid down in the shastras for those of his varna, deserves to be invited to Sraddhas.

That Brahmana who having earned wealth in the morning becomes poor in the afternoon, or who poor in the morning becomes wealthy in the evening, or who is lacking in malice, or is stained only by a minor fault, deserves to be welcomed at Sraddhas. That Brahmana who is without pride or sin, who is not given to empty argument, or who subsists upon alms obtained as he roams from house to house, deserves to be invited to sacrifices.

One who does not observe vratas, or who is addicted to falsehood in both speech and conduct, who is a thief, or who lives by selling living creatures or by trade in general, only becomes worthy of invitation to Sraddhas if he happens to offer all to the Devas first and subsequently drink

Soma. That man who having acquired wealth by dishonest or cruel means but subsequently spends it in adoring the Devas and fulfilling the duties of hospitality, becomes worthy of being invited to Sraddhas.

The wealth that one has acquired by selling Vedic knowledge, or which has been earned by women, or which has been gained by deceit like giving false evidence in a court of law should never be given to Brahmanas or spent in making offerings to the Pitris. That Brahmana, who upon completing a Sraddha refuses to utter the words Astu Swadha, incurs the sin of taking a false oath in a suit for land.

Yudhishtira, the time for performing a Sraddha is when one finds a good Brahmana, and curds and ghrita, and the sacred day of the new moon, and the meat of wild animals such as deer.

Upon the completion of a Sraddha performed by a Brahmana the word Swadha should be uttered. If performed by a Kshatriya the words that should be uttered are: Let your Pitris be gratified. Upon the completion of a Sraddha performed by a Vaisya the words that should be spoken are: Let everything become inexhaustible. Similarly, upon the conclusion of a Sraddha performed by a Sudra, the word that should be uttered is Swasti.

In respect of a Brahmana, the declaration regarding Punyaham should be accompanied with the chanting of AUM. In the case of a Kshatriya, such declaration should be without the chanting of AUM. In the kriyas performed by a Vaisya, instead of AUM, the words that should be uttered are: Let the Devas be gratified.

Listen now to me as I tell you the rites that should be performed for all the varnas. All the karmas called Jatakarma are necessary for the three twice-born varnas. All these rites, Yudhishtira, in the case of Brahmanas, Kshatriyas and Vaisyas, are to be performed using mantras.

The girdle of a Brahmana must be made of munja grass. That of a Kshatriya should be a bowstring. The Vaisya's must be made of the valwaji grass. This is what has been laid down in the shastras.

Listen now as I explain to you what constitutes the merits and faults of both givers and recipients of gifts. A Brahmana becomes guilty of a dereliction of duty by telling lies. Such an act on his part is sinful. A Kshatriya incurs four times and a Vaisya eight times the sin that a Brahmana incurs by uttering a falsehood.

Having been earlier invited by another Brahmana, a Brahmana should not eat elsewhere. By eating at the house of one such, he becomes inferior and even incurs the sin that attaches to the slaughter of an animal on occasions other than those of yagnas.

Also if he eats elsewhere after having been invited by a Kshatriya or Vaisya, he falls from his position and incurs half the sin that attaches to the slaughter of an animal on occasions other than those of sacrifices. That Brahmana who eats on occasions of such rites as are performed in honour of the Devas or the Pitris by Brahmanas and Kshatriyas and Vaisyas, without having performed his ablutions, incurs the sin of uttering a lie about a cow.

That Brahmana who is tempted into eating on occasions of similar rites performed by persons belonging to the three higher varnas, at a time when he is impure as a result of either a birth or a death in his family, knowing well that he is impure, incurs the same sin. He who lives upon wealth obtained under false pretences, like that of pilgrimages to sacred places, or who solicits another for money pretending that he would spend it in religious acts, incurs the sin of lying.

A man who belongs to any of the three higher varnas incurs sin if he distributes food with the help of mantras at Sraddhas to such Brahmanas who do not study the Vedas, or who do not keep vratas, or are impure in their conduct.'

Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, I want to know to whom one should give the offerings dedicated to the Devas and the Pitris in order to earn abundant rewards.'

Bhishma says, 'Yudhishtira, feed those Brahmanas whose wives wait for the leftover food from their husbands' plates, like farmers waiting in reverence for timely showers of rain. One earns great punya by making gifts to those Brahmanas that are always pure in conduct, that are emaciated through abstaining from all luxuries and even full meals, that are devoted to the observances of such vratas that lead to the emaciation of their bodies, and that approach givers with the desire of receiving gifts.

By giving dakshina to such Brahmanas who regard conduct in this light of food, as regard conduct in the light of spouses and children, as regard conduct in the light of strength, as regard conduct in the light of their refuge for crossing this samsara and attaining to felicity in the next, and as seek wealth only when wealth is absolutely needed, one earns great merit. By making gifts to those men who approach you on account of having lost everything to thieves or oppressors, one acquires great punya.

One earns great merit by making gifts unto such Brahmanas who ask for food from the hands of an even poorer person of their varna who has just received something from others. One acquires great punya by making gifts to such Brahmanas who beg for alms after having lost everything in times of universal suffering.

By making gifts to Brahmanas who keep vows, and subject themselves freely to painful rules and practices, are respectful in their conduct to the laws laid down in the Vedas, and seek wealth for spending it upon the karmas necessary to complete their vratas and other observances, one earns great punya. By making gifts to Brahmanas who keep their distance from the ways of the sinful and the evil, are weak and without sufficient support, and are poor in material possessions, one earns great punya.

One earns great merit by making gifts to such Brahmanas who have been robbed of all their possessions by powerful men, and who desire to fill their stomachs with any food without heed for its quality. One earns great punya by making gifts to such Brahmanas who beg on behalf of others that perform tapasya and are satisfied with even small gifts.

You have now listened to the declarations in the shastras in respect of the acquisition of great merit by the giving of gifts. Listen now to those acts that lead to hell or heaven. Yudhishtira, they that lie on occasions other than those when such an untruth is needed to serve the guru or assure the safety of one who fears for his life, sink into naraka.

They who lust after other people's spouses, or have sexual union with them, or assist in such wrongdoing, sink into hell. They who rob others of their wealth, destroy the wealth and possessions of others, or proclaim the faults of others, sink into naraka. They who destroy the troughs of water used by cows to quench their thirst, damage buildings used for public meetings, who destroy bridges and roads, and raze the homes of people, must sink down to hell.

They who deceive helpless women, girls, or old women, or women who have been frightened, find hell for themselves. They who destroy the livelihood of men, they who raze men's homes, they who steal others' wives; they who sow dissension among friends, and they who devastate the hopes of others, fall into naraka. They who declare the faults of others, they who demolish bridges or roads, they who live by doing work not allowed to them, and they who are ungrateful to their friends for help given, have to descend into hell.

They who have no faith in the Vedas and show no reverence for them, they who violate their own vratas or force others into breaking theirs, and they who fall away from their positions through sin, fall into naraka. They who behave improperly, they who are usurious, and they who make unduly large profits on sales, will find hell.

They who gamble or unscrupulously indulge in other depravity, and they who are given to the slaughter of living creatures, have to sink into naraka. They who incite masters to dismiss loyal servants that hope for rewards, or are needy or are earning due wages or are waiting for rewards for valuable services rendered, have to plunge into hell.

They who themselves eat without offering portions to their spouse, their sacred fires, their servants or their guests, and they who abstain from performing the rites laid down in the shastras to honour the Pitris and Devas, have to sink into naraka. They who sell the Vedas, they who find fault with the Vedas, and they who commit the Vedas into writing, have all to descend into hell.

They who are outside the four varnas, they who take to practices forbidden by the Srutis and the Smritis, and they who live by immoral deeds or that do not belong to the varna of their birth, have to sink into naraka. They who live by selling hair, poisons, or milk must go down into hell. They who put obstacles in the path of Brahmanas, cows and women, Yudhishtira, have to descend into hell.

They who sell weapons, they who forge weapons, they who make arrows, and they who make bows, have all to find hell for themselves. They who obstruct paths and roads with stones and thorns and pits must sink into naraka. They who desert teachers and servants and loyal followers for no offence fall into naraka.

They who set young bulls to work, they who pierce the noses of bulls and other animals to control them while they work, and they who always keep animals tied, go to hell. Kings that do not protect their subjects while forcibly taking from them a sixth share of the produce of their fields, and they who, though able and rich, do not give gifts, find hell.

They who reject men who are imbued with forgiveness, self-restraint and wisdom, or those with whom they have associated for many years, when these are no longer of use to them, will surely sink into naraka. Men who eat without giving portions of the food to children, the aged and servants, inexorably descend into hell.

All such men have to go to hell. Listen now to me as I tell you who those men are that ascend into heaven. The man who transgresses against a Brahmana by impeding the rituals with which he worships the Devas is afflicted with the loss of all his children and animals. They who do not transgress against Brahmanas by obstructing their religious rites ascend into swarga.

Men who follow their svadharma laid down for them in the shastras and practise the virtues of charity, self-restraint and truthfulness, find heaven. Men who having acquired knowledge by rendering obedient service to their gurus, and observing austere tapasya are not greedy for gifts, rise into swarga. Men through whom others are saved from fear and sin, poverty and disease, and the difficulties that lie in their path go into heaven.

Men who have a forgiving nature, who are patient, who are prompt in performing all righteous deeds, and who are of auspicious conduct, succeed in gaining swarga. Men who abstain from honey and meat, who abstain from sexual union with the wives of other men, and who abstain from wines and spirits, ascend into heaven.

Men that help establish asramas for sannyasis, who become founders of families, who open up new lands for habitation, and lay out towns and cities, rise into swarga. Men who give away clothes and ornaments, food and drink, and who assist in marriage ceremonies, ascend to heaven.

Men that have abstained from any kind of harm to all creatures, who can endure everything, and who have made themselves the refuge of all creatures, ascend into swarga. Men who humbly serve their fathers and mothers, who have subdued their senses, and who love their brothers, succeed in gaining swarga. Men that control their senses despite being rich in worldly goods, enjoying their youth and power, ascend to heaven.

Men that are kind even towards those that offend against them that have a calm temperament, who have a liking for all who are peaceable, and that contribute to the happiness of others by serving them with humility, surely succeed in finding swarga. Those that protect thousands of people, that make gifts to thousands of people, and that rescue thousands of people from distress, find heaven.

Those who make gifts of gold and of cows, and of chariots and animals, gain swarga. Those who make gifts of articles needed in marriages, and serve men and women, and give clothes and robes, succeed in acquiring heaven.

Men who make public pleasure-houses and gardens and wells, resting houses and halls for public meetings, and tanks for cows and men to quench their thirst, and fields for cultivation, succeed in gaining swarga. Those who make gifts of houses and fields and populated villages to those who want them, do indeed find heaven.

Men who having made sweet and tasty drinks offer them to others, as also seeds and rice, find swarga for themselves. Men, whether born into high or low families, bear hundreds of children and live long lives practising compassion and keeping anger under complete control, succeed in ascending to heaven.

Bhaarata, I have expounded to you the rites in honour of the Devas and the Pitris which are performed for the sake of the other world. I have explained what the laws are for making gifts, and the views of the ancient Rishis with respect to both the items of gift and the manner of giving them.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Bharatarishabha, it is fitting that you answer my next question truly and in detail. What are those circumstances under which a man may become guilty of Brahmahatya without actually killing a Brahmana?'

Bhishma says, 'Rajan, I once asked Vyasa to explain this very subject to me. Listen closely to what Vyasa said to me.

Once, repairing to the presence of Vyasa, I said to him "Maharishi, you are the fourth in descent from Vasishta. Do you explain to me what those circumstances are under which one becomes guilty of Brahmahatya without actually killing a Brahmana."

Vyasa gave me an excellent and assured reply, "You should know a man to be guilty of Brahmahatya who, having invited a Brahmana of righteous conduct to his house to give him alms, subsequently refuses to give anything to him on the pretence of there being nothing in the house. You should know that man as guilty of Brahmahatya who destroys the livelihood of a Brahmana learned in the Vedas and their angas, and who is free of attachments to worldly creatures and goods.

You should know that man to be guilty of Brahmahatya, who prevents thirsty cows from drinking water to quench that thirst. You should regard that man as guilty of Brahmahatya who, without studying the Srutis that have been transmitted from guru to sishya from age to age, finds fault with the Srutis or with those shastras that have been composed by the Rishis. You should know that man as guilty of Brahmahatya who does not give his beautiful and accomplished daughter to a suitable bridegroom.

You should know that foolish and sinful man to be guilty of Brahmahatya who inflicts such grief upon Brahmanas as wound the very core of their hearts. You should know that man to be guilty of Brahmahatya who robs the blind, the lame and fools. You should know that man to be guilty of Brahmahatya who burns down the asramas of sannyasis, or forests, villages or towns.”

"Yudhishtira says, 'It has been said that pilgrimages to sacred rivers are filled with punya; that bathing in such waters is meritorious; and that listening to the cadence of these waters is also most worthy. Pitamaha, I want to hear you speak on this subject. It befits you to tell me about such rivers on this earth.'

Bhishma says, 'Maharishi Angiras has spoken about the sacred tirthas of the earth. If you listen to what he said you will earn great punya.

Once, Gautama approached the great and learned Rishi while he was living in a forest and said to him, "Illustrious one, I have some questions about the merits of sacred waters and shrines. I want to hear you discourse on that subject. Speak to me of this. By bathing in sacred waters on earth, what punya is earned with regard to the next world? Do you expound to me this truly and according to the ordinance."

Angiras said, "A man who bathes for seven days in succession in the Chandrabhaga or the Vitasta, whose waters dance in waves, observing a fast the while, is sure to be cleansed of all his sins and suffused with the punya of a sannyasi. The many rivers that flow through Kasmira plunge into the great river Sindhu. By bathing in these rivers one is sure to become endowed with good character and to rise into swarga after leaving this world.

By bathing in Pushkara, and Prabhasa, and Naimisa, and the ocean, and Devika, and Indramarga, and Swarnabindu, one is sure to fly into swarga in a celestial chariot, filled with joy at the adorations of Apsaras. By diving in the waters of Hiranyabindu with concentration, and revering that sacred stream, and bathing next at Kusesaya and Devendra, one becomes cleansed of all one's sins.

Repairing to Indratoya close to the Gandhamadana Mountains and near Karatoya in the kingdom of Kuranga, one should fast for three days and then bathe in those sacred waters with a contemplative heart and pure body. By doing this, one is sure to acquire the punya of an Aswamedha yagna. Bathing in Gangadwara and Kusavarta and Bilwaka in the Nita Mountains, as also in Kankahala, one is sure to become cleansed of all one's sins and then ascend into heaven.

If one becomes a brahmacharin and subdues one's anger, devotes oneself to truth and practises compassion towards all creatures, and then bathes in the Jala pada, one is sure to acquire the punya of an Aswamedha yagna. The Bhagirathi-Ganga flows in a northward direction from the sangama of swarga, Bhumi and patala.

Fasting for one month and bathing in that sacred tirtha which is known to be loved by Maheswara, allows one to behold the Devas. Even if one has to be reborn, he who gives offerings of water to his Pitris at Saptaganga and Triganga and Indramarga obtains amrita for food. The man who in a pure state of body and mind attends to his daily agnihotra, and observes a fast for one month and then bathes in Mahasrama, is sure to attain success within one month.

By bathing in the Bhrigu Kunda, after an upavasa of three days and purifying the mind of all evil passions, one becomes purified of even the sin of killing a Brahmana. By bathing in Kanyakupa and performing one's ablutions in Balaka, one acquires great fame among the very Devas and shines in glory. Bathing in Devika and the lake known as Sundarika, as also in the tirtha called Aswini, one acquires great beauty in one's next life.

By fasting for a fortnight, and bathing in the Mahaganga and Krittikangaraka, one is cleansed of all one's sins and ascends into swarga. Bathing in Vaimanika and Kinkinika, one acquires the power of going everywhere at will and is highly respected in the celestial realm of the Apsaras. If a man controls his anger, observes the vow of brahmacharya for three days, and bathes in the river Vipasa at the Kalika asrama, he succeeds in transcending rebirth.

Bathing in the grove that is sacred to the Krittikas and offering oblations of water to the Pitris, and then gratifying Mahadeva, one becomes pure in body and mind and rises into heaven. If, observing a fast for three days with a purified body and mind, one bathes in the Mahapura, one is freed from the fear of all mobile and immobile animals as also of all animals having two legs. By bathing in the Devadaru forest and offering oblations of water to the Pitris and dwelling there for seven nights with a pure body and mind, one attains swarga.

Bathing in the waterfalls at Sarastambha and Kusastambha and Dronasarmapada, one is sure to attain to the realm of the Apsaras where they will dutifully serve that man. If one observes a fast and bathes at Chitrakuta and Janasthana and the waters of the Mandakini one is sure to become rich.

By repairing to the Samyasrama, living there for a fortnight and bathing in the sacred river there, one acquires the power of disappearing at will, delighting in the joy that has been ordained for the Gandharvas. Going to the Kausiki tirtha, living there with a pure heart and abstaining from all food and water for three days, one acquires the power of dwelling in the realm of the Gandharvas in one's next life.

Bathing in the delightful tirtha that goes by the name of Gandhataraka and living there for one month, abstaining all the while from food and water, one acquires the power of vanishing at will and then of ascending into swarga after twenty-one days. He that bathes in the Matanga Lake is sure to attain to success in a single night. He that bathes in Analamba or in eternal Andhaka, or in Naimisa, or the tirtha called swarga, and offers oblations of water to the Pitris, while subduing his senses, acquires the punya of a human sacrifice.

Bathing in Gangahrada and the Utpalavana tirtha, and daily offering oblations of water there for a full month to the Pitris, one acquires the punya of an Aswamedha yagna. Bathing in the confluence of the Ganga and the Yamuna as also at the tirtha in the Kalanjara Mountains and offering every day oblations of water to the Pitris for a month, one acquires the punya of ten Aswamedha yagnas. Bathing in the Sashti Lake one acquires merit much greater than what is attached to the gift of food.

Ten thousand tirthas and thirty million other tirthas come to Prayaga at the confluence of the Ganga and the Yamuna in the month of Magha. He who bathes in Prayaga, with a restrained soul and observing rigid vows, in the month of Magha, is purified of all his sins and attains swarga.

Bathing in the tirtha that is sacred to the Maruts, as also in that which is located in the asrama of the Pitris, and also in that which is known by the name Vaivaswata, one becomes cleansed of all one's sins and becomes oneself as pure and sanctified as a tirtha. Going to Brahmasaras as also to the Bhagirathi and bathing there and offering oblations to the Pitris every day for a full month, while abstaining from all food, one is sure to attain to the realm of Soma Deva.

Bathing in Utpataka and then in Ashtavakra and offering oblations of water to the Pitris every day for twelve days in succession, abstaining the while from food, one acquires the punya of an Aswamedha yagna. Bathing in Gaya, in Asmaprishtha and the Niravinda Mountains and Kraunchapadi, one is purified of the sin of Brahmahatya. A bath in the first place cleanses one of a single Brahmahatya; a bath in the second cleanses one of two such evil doings; and a bath in the third cleanses one of three.

Bathing in Kaalapinga, one acquires a large volume of sacred water for use in the next world. By bathing in the city of Agni, a man acquires such merit as entitles him to live during his next birth in the city of Agni's daughter. Bathing in Visala in Karavirapura and offering oblations of water to one's Pitris, and performing one's ablutions in Devahrada too, one becomes identified with Brahma and shines in splendour.

Bathing in Punaravarta-nanda as also Mahananda, a man of restrained senses and universal compassion repairs to Indra's garden, the Nandana, and is waited upon by Apsaras of many kinds. Bathing with concentrated soul in the tirtha named after Urvasi, in the river Lohitya, on the day of full moon of the month of Kartika, one attains to the punya of the Pundarika yagna.

Bathing in Ramahrada and offering oblations of water to the Pitris in the river Vipasa, and observing a fast for twelve days, one becomes cleansed of all sins. Bathing in the Mahahrada tirtha with a pure heart and after observing a fast for one month, one is sure to attain to the end which was that of the Rishi Jamadagni. By exposing oneself to the sun in the tirtha called Vindhya, one devoted to truth and humility, and filled with love for all creatures, should perform austere tapasya.

By so doing, he is sure to attain to ascetic success in the course of a month. Bathing in the Narmada as also in the Surparaka tirtha, observing a fast for a full fortnight, one is sure to become a royal prince in one's next birth. If one goes to the tirtha known as Jambumarga one is sure to attain to success in a single day and night.

By repairing to Chandalikasrama and bathing in the tirtha called Kokamukha, having lived on herbs alone and worn rags for clothes, one is sure to acquire ten beautiful girls for wives. One who lives near the tirtha known as Kanya-hrada will never go to the realms of Yama. Such a man is sure to ascend to the regions of felicity that belong to the Devas.

Mahabaho, he who bathes on the day of the new moon in the Prabhasa tirtha is sure of attaining success and immortality. Bathing in the tirtha known as Ujjanaka in the asrama of Arshtisena's son, and next in the tirtha in the asrama of Pinga, one is cleansed of all one's paapa. Observing a fast for three days and bathing in the tirtha known as Kulya and reciting the sacred Aghamarsana mantras one attains the punya of an Aswamedha yagna.

Observing a fast for one night and bathing in Pindaraka, one becomes purified on the dawn of the next day and attains to the merit of an Agnishtoma yagna. He who goes to Brahmasaras, which is adorned by the forests of Dharmaranya, is purified and attains to the punya of the Pundarika yagna. Bathing in the waters of the Mainaka Mountain, and saying one's morning and evening prayers there, and living there for a month, subduing one's desires, one attains to the merit of all the great yagnas.

Setting out for Kalolaka and Nandikunda and Uttara-manasa, and reaching a place a hundred yojanas away from them, one becomes cleansed of the sin of killing an embryo in its mother's womb. One who succeeds in obtaining a glimpse of the image of Nandiswara, is cleansed of all paapa. Bathing in the tirtha called Swargamarga one is sure to reach Brahman.

The celebrated Himavat is sacred. That prince of mountains is the father-in-law of Sankara. He is a mine of all jewels and is the home of the Siddhas and Charanas. That twice-born one who is fully conversant with the Vedas and who, regarding this life to be transient, casts off his body on those mountains, while abstaining from all food and water in accordance with the rites laid down in the shastras, after having worshipped the Devas and the Rishis, is sure to attain the eternal Brahman.

Subduing his passions and anger, everything can be attained by him who dwells in a tirtha. In order to journey to all the tirthas in the world, one should think of those that are almost inaccessible or those that are filled with overwhelming difficulties.

Tirtha yatras produce the punya of yagnas. They can purify anyone of sin. Truly excellent, they lead straight to swarga. This subject is a great mystery. The very Devas should bathe in tirthas. They too will be purified."

This discourse on tirthas should be imparted to Brahmanas, and to righteous men who strive to achieve what is truly for their own good. It should also be recited in the hearing of one's well-wishers, friends and devoted disciples. Angiras possessed of great ascetic merit imparted this knowledge to Gautama.

Angiras himself had obtained it from Kasyapa. The great Rishis regard this discourse as worthy of constant repetition. It is the foremost of all purifying things. If one recites it regularly every day, one is sure to be cleansed of every sin and to ascend into heaven after this life. One who listens to it, this great mystery, is sure to be born into a good family in one's next life and, what is more, he will be endowed with a clear memory of his previous life.'" Vaisampayana said, "Equal to Brihaspati in intelligence and Brahma himself in forgiveness, resembling Sakra in prowess and Surya in energy, Bhishma, the son of Ganga, of vast power, had been overthrown in battle by Arjuna. Accompanied by his brothers and many other people, King Yudhishtira asks him these questions. The aged warrior lies on a bed of arrows, such as Kshatriyas covet, waiting for that auspicious time when he can leave his physical body.

Many great Rishis have come there to see that foremost one of Bharata's vamsa. Amongst them are Atri and Vasishta, Bhrigu and Pulastya, and Pulaha and Kratu. There are also Angiras and Gotama and Agastya and Sumati, and Viswamitra and Sthulasiras and Samvarta and Pramati and Dama. There, are also Brihaspati and Usanas, and Vyasa and Chyavana and Kasyapa and Dhruva, and Durvasas and Jamadagni and Markandeya and Galava, and Bharadwaja and Raibhya and Yavakrita and Trita.

Sthulaksha and Savalaksha and Kanwa and Medhatithi are present, and Krisa and Narada and Parvata and Sudhanwa and Ekata and Dwita. Nitambhu and Bhuvana and Dhaumya and Satananda and Akritavrana and Rama, son of Jamadagni, and Kacha have come. All these high-souled Maharishis Rishis have come there to Bhishma lying on his bed of arrows.

Yudhishtira, with his brothers, duly worships those Mahatman Rishis, one after another in proper order. Receiving that worship, those Rishis sit on the ground and begin to talk to one another. Their conversation relates to Bhishma, and is sweet and agreeable to all the senses and the mind.

Hearing them speak of him, Bhishma is filled with delight and regards himself to be already in swarga. Then, having taken Bhishma's leave and that of the Pandava princes, those Rishis vanish in a moment from the sight of all the beholders. Even after they have disappeared, the Pandavas repeatedly bow and offer their adorations to those most blessed sages.

They then wait on Bhishma, even as Brahmanas well-versed in mantras wait with reverence upon the rising sun. The Pandavas see the cardinal directions blaze with splendour because of the tejas of the Munis' tapasya and are filled with wonder at the sight. Thinking of the blessedness and puissance of those Rishis, the Pandavas begin to speak again to their Pitamaha. Yudhishtira touches Bhishma's feet with his head and then continues asking his questions about dharma.

Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, which kingdoms, which provinces, which asramas, which mountains, and which rivers are the most holy?'

Bhishma says, 'Listen to the old story of a conversation between a Brahmana who was observing the Sila and the Unccha vratas and a Rishi crowned with hermetic success. Once upon a time, a man who had roamed all the earth arrived at the house of a grihastha who was observing the Sila vrata. The grihastha welcomed his atithi with all the due rites. Received with such hospitality, the happy Rishi spent the night in his host's home.

The next morning the Brahmana completed all his morning ablutions and worship, and having purified himself, cheerfully approached the Rishi. Meeting with each other and seated at their ease, the two began to talk about pleasing subjects connected with the Vedas and the Upanishads.

Towards the end of the discourse, the Brahmana respectfully addressed the Rishi. He asked this very question which you, Yudhishtira, have put to me.

The poor Brahmana said, "What kingdoms, what provinces, what asramas, what mountains, and what rivers should be regarded as the most sacred? Discourse to me on this."

The Rishi said, "Those kingdoms, those provinces, those asramas and those mountains through or near which the Bhagirathi flows are the most sacred. Only by living beside the Bhagirathi and bathing in her blessed waters can a man achieve the goals that can be attained by brahmacharya, by tapasya, by yagnas or by practising vairagya, renunciation. Those creatures whose bodies have been sprinkled with the sacred waters of the Bhagirathi or whose bones have been laid in the bed of that holy river will never fall from swarga. Those men who use the waters of the Bhagirathi surely ascend into heaven after leaving this world. Even those men who have sinned during the first part of their lives can attain to a superior end if in their later years they take to living on the banks of the Ganga. Hundreds of yagnas cannot produce that punya that men obtain by bathing in the sacred waters of the Ganga.

A man is treated with respect and worshipped in heaven for as long as his bones lie in the Ganga. Even as the rising sun blazes forth in splendour, having dispelled the shadows of night, in the same way the man that has bathed in the waters of the Ganga, cleansed of all his sins, shines brilliantly. Those kingdoms and realms that are empty of the sacred waters of the Ganga are like nights without the moon or like trees without flowers.

A world without the Ganga is like the varnas and the asramas without dharma or like yagnas without Soma. Without doubt, kingdoms and places without the Ganga are like the sky without the sun, or the earth without mountains, or without air. If offered the sacred waters of the Ganga, all the creatures in the three worlds are filled with joy unlike any other.

He who drinks Ganga jala that has been heated by the sun derives punya greater than that which attaches to the vrata of subsisting upon the wheat or other grains retrieved from cowdung. It cannot be said which is superior: he who performs a thousand Chandrayana rites to purify his body or he who drinks the water of the Ganga. It cannot be said whether the two are equal or not: one who stands for a thousand years on one foot and one who lives for only a month beside the Ganga.

One who lives permanently by the side of the Ganga is superior in merit to one who stays for ten thousand yugas suspended head down. As thread burns and vanishes without trace when set on fire, so are the sins of a man that bathes in the Ganga consumed. There is no end higher than the Ganga for those who, afflicted by sorrow, seek to attain that which could dispel their sorrow.

As snakes lose their poison at the very sight of Garuda, even so is one cleansed of all one's sins at the very sight of the sacred Ganga. They that are without renown and sinful in deeds have the Ganga for their fame, their protection, their means of liberation or their refuge. Many wretches among men, who are afflicted with heinous sins, and about to sink into naraka, are, despite all their sins, rescued by the Ganga in the next world if they seek her help and sanctuary.

They who bathe every day in the sacred waters of the Ganga become equals of Mahamunis and the very Devas with Vasava at their head.

Brahmana, those wretches among men that are sinners without any trace of humility or shame become righteous and good by placing themselves before the Ganga. As amrita is to the Devas, as swadha is to the Pitris, as sudha is to the Nagas, even so is Ganga jala to the Manavas.

As children afflicted with hunger ask their mothers for food, in the same manner do those desiring their highest good seek out the Ganga. As the realm of Svayambhuva Brahma is said to be the foremost of all places, even so is the Ganga said to be best of all rivers. As the earth and the cow are said to be the main sustenance of the Devas, even so is the Ganga the main sustenance of all living creatures.

As the Devas nourish themselves upon the amrita that occurs in the sun and the moon and that is offered in yagnas, even so do humans sustain themselves with Ganga water. One smeared with the sand taken from the banks of the Ganga regards oneself as an inhabitant of swarga adorned with celestial liniments. He who bears on his head the mud taken from the banks of the Ganga presents an effulgence equal to that of Surya himself, who dispels the surrounding darkness.

When that wind that is moistened with drops of Ganga water touches one's body, it purifies him immediately of every sin. A man afflicted and weighed down by calamities, finds all his misfortunes dispelled by the very joy which wells up in his heart on seeing that sacred river. With the calls and songs of the swans and kokas and other water fowls that play on her breast, the Ganga challenges the very Gandharvas, and with her high banks the very mountains of the earth.

Heaven, too, is humbled beholding her surface teeming with swans and diverse other birds. The bliss which one enjoys by dwelling on the banks of the Ganga is greater than that of living in Swargaloka.

I have no doubt that he who is afflicted with impurity of speech, thought and deed is cleansed at the very sight of the Ganga. By holding that sacred river, touching it, and bathing in its waters, one purifies one's ancestors to the seventh generation, one's descendants to the seventh generation, and other ancestors and descendants as well. By hearing of the Ganga, by wishing to go to that river, by drinking its waters, by touching its waters, and by bathing in them a man saves both his paternal and maternal families.

By seeing, touching and drinking the waters of the Ganga, or even by praising her, hundreds and thousands of sinful men are washed of all their sins. They who wish to make their birth, life and learning fruitful, should repair to the Ganga and gratify the Pitris and the Devas by offering them tarpana of water. The punya that one earns by bathing in the Ganga cannot be earned through the acquisition of sons or wealth, or the performance of good deeds.

Those who are physically able but do not seek out the auspicious Ganga can be compared to those who are blind or those that are dead or those that are lame. What man is there that would not revere this sacred river that is adored by Maharishis that know the present, the past and the future, as also by the very Devas with Indra at their head? What man is there that would not seek the protection of the Ganga whose protection is sought by sannyasis and grihastas, and by Yatis and brahmacharins?

The man of righteous conduct who, with rapt soul, thinks of the Ganga at the time of his dying, succeeds in attaining the highest end. That man who dwells by the side of the Ganga and worships her up to the time of his death, is freed from fear of every kind of calamity, of sin and of kings. When that blessed river plunged down from the sky, Maheswara bore her fall on his head. It is that very stream which is adored in swarga. Bhumi, swarga and patala are all adorned by the three streams of this sacred river. The man who uses her waters is crowned with success, material and of the spirit. As the sun's rays are to the Devas in heaven, as Chandramas is to the Pitris, as the king is to his subjects, even such is the Ganga to all rivers.

One who loses his mother or father, his sons or wives, or his wealth is not as grief-stricken as he that loses the Ganga. The joy that one gets from catching a glimpse of the Ganga one does not obtain through pious deeds that lead to Brahmaloka, or through such yagnas and kriyas that lead to swarga, or through sons or wealth.

The pleasure that men derive from seeing the Ganga is equal to what they derive from seeing the full moon. That man is cherished by the Ganga who adores her with deep devotion, with his mind wholly fixed upon her, with a reverence that is shared by no other object, with a feeling that there is nothing in the universe worthy of similar adoration, and with an absolute steadfastness.

Creatures that live on earth, in the sky, or in heaven, even the most superior beings, should always bathe in the Ganga. This is the first of all duties of the righteous. The fame of the Ganga's sanctity has spread across the entire universe since she revived all the sons of Sagara, whom Kapila reduced to ashes.

Men who are washed by the bright, beautiful, high, and swift waves of the Ganga, whipped up by the wind, are washed of all their sins and resemble the sun in its splendour. Men of tranquil souls that have cast off their bodies in the waters of the Ganga, whose sanctity is as great as that of the ghee and other oblations poured onto the fire in yagnas and which confer merits equal to those of the greatest of sacrifices, have certainly attained to a position equal to that of the Devas.

Ganga, with her fame and expanse, identical with the entire universe, and revered by the Devas, the Munis and men, can grant the wishes of even those that are blind, foolish and destitute. They that sought the refuge of the Ganga, that guardian of all the universe, she that flows in three streams, filled with sacred water, sweet as honey and powerful, succeed in attaining the blessings of swarga.

The man who dwells beside Ganga and beholds her every day, is purified by her sight and touch. The Devas grant him every kind of happiness in this world and the next. The Ganga can save every creature from sin and lead him to the felicity of swarga.

She is one with Prishni, the mother of Vishnu. She is the Vakdevi, Saraswati. She is aloof, and not easy to attain. She is the embodiment of auspiciousness and prosperity. She can bestow the six well-known attributes beginning with power. She is always generous with her grace.

She reveals all things in the universe, and she is the refuge of all creatures. Those who sought her protection in this life have surely attained heaven. The fame of the Ganga has spread all over the earth, the sky and swarga, and all the cardinal and subsidiary points of the horizon. Mortals use the waters of her streams to be crowned with success. He who, on beholding the Ganga, points her out to others, finds that she frees him from rebirth and confers mukti upon him.

The Ganga held the senapati of the Devas, Guha, in her womb. She also bears gold, the most precious of all metals, in her womb. They who bathe daily in her waters in the morning succeed in obtaining dharma, artha and kama. Her waters are as sacred as the ghrita that is poured into the sacrificial fire, while chanting mantras. Able to cleanse one from every sin, she has descended from swarga and is cherished by all.

The Ganga is the daughter of Himavat and Hara, and the jewel of both heaven and earth. She bestows everything auspicious, and grants the six renowned gunas beginning with puissance. Rajan, truly the Ganga is the one holy being in the three worlds and confers punya upon all.

The Ganga is righteousness in liquid form. She also is tejas that runs in liquid form over the earth. She is suffused with the beauty and power of the ghee that is poured along with mantras on the sacrificial fire. She is always adorned with high waves as also with Brahmanas who can be seen performing their ablutions in her waters at all times. Descending from swarga, she was contained by Siva on his head. The very mother of the heavens, she has sprung from the highest mountain and courses over the plains conferring the most precious benefits on all creatures of the earth. She is the highest cause of all things; she is perfectly pure. She is as subtle as Brahman.

She offers the best bed for the dying. She leads creatures to heaven. She carries an incalculable volume of water. She bestows great fame on all. She is the protector of the universe. She is identical with every form. She is greatly desired by those crowned with success. Indeed, for those who have bathed in her waters, the Ganga is the path to swarga.

The Brahmanas hold the Ganga as equal to the earth in forgiveness, and in the protection and upholding of those that live on her banks; further, as equal to Agni and Surya in energy and splendour; and also equal to Guha himself in bestowing favours upon the twice-born varna.

Men who seek, even in their minds, with all their souls, that ancient and sacred river praised by the Rishis, she that emerges from the feet of Vishnu, achieve the realms of Brahma. Men of subdued souls who want to attain Brahman, knowing that children and other possessions, and realms of felicity, are transient, always pay their adorations to the Ganga with that reverence and love that a son shows his mother.

Men of cleansed souls who wish for success should seek the protection of the Ganga who is like a cow that yields amrita instead of milk, who is prosperity itself, who is omniscient, who exists for all creatures, who is the source of all kinds of food, who is the mother of all mountains, who is the refuge of all righteous men, who is immeasurable in power and energy, and who enchants the heart of Brahma himself.

Having gratified all the Devas along with Vishnu with austere tapasya, Bhagiratha brought the Ganga down to the earth. Men go to her to free themselves from every kind of fear both here and in the next world. I have told you only some of the merits of the Ganga. My powers are not enough to speak of all the merits of the sacred river, or to measure her strength and blessedness.

With one's greatest powers, one may count the rocks in the mountains of Meru or measure the waters of the ocean, but one cannot determine the punya of the waters of the Ganga. Having listened to these merits of the Ganga, which I have described with great devotion, you should, in thought, word and deed, revere them with faith. Having listened to the merits that I have recited, you are sure to fill all the three realms with fame and attain great success and that is so difficult to have.

After that, you will sport in bliss created by the Ganga herself for those that worship her. The Ganga always extends her grace to those that are devoted to her with humility. She unites her devotees with every kind of happiness. I pray that the most blessed Ganga will always fill our hearts with righteous qualities."'

Bhishma says, 'Having spoken to that poor Brahmana observing the Sila vrata on the infinite merits of the Ganga, the learned and enlightened Rishi rose into the sky. The Brahmana, awakened by his words, duly worshipped the Ganga and attained high success. Son of Kunti, seek the Ganga with great devotion, for then you, too, will be rewarded with excellent success.'"

Vaisampayana continued, "Hearing this discourse on the punya of the Ganga from Bhishma, Yudhishtira with his brothers are filled with rare and great delight. He who recites or hears this sacred discourse is purified of every sin."

"Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, you are old and wise, learned in the shastras, and marked by excellent gunas and unblemished conduct. You are celebrated above others by your gyana and tapasya. Foremost of all righteous men, I now ask you about dharma.

There is not another man in all the worlds, who is worthier of being questioned on such subjects. How can a Kshatriya, a Vaisya or a Sudra succeed in acquiring the status of a Brahmana? It is fitting that you tell me the means. Is it with austere tapasya or by religious kriyas, or through knowledge of the shastras that one belonging to any of the three lower varnas succeeds in acquiring the status of a Brahmana? Do tell me this.'

Bhishma says, 'Yudhishtira, the status of a Brahmana cannot be acquired by one belonging to any of the three other varnas. That is the highest condition for all creatures. After living through countless rebirths one is born finally as a Brahmana.

Listen to an ancient itihasa of a conversation between Matanga and a female donkey. Once, a Brahmana had a son who, though born of a woman of another varna, followed the laws laid down for Brahmanas in his childhood and youth. The child was named Matanga and possessed every accomplishment.

Wishing to perform a yagna, his father ordered him to collect the required articles. Having received his father's commands, Matanga set out on a swift chariot drawn by a donkey. It so happened that the donkey yoked to that chariot was young. Instead of obeying the reins, the animal ran with the chariot to his mother.

Matanga was angry and began to beat the animal on its nose with his goad. Seeing those marks of violence on her child's nose, full of compassion for him, the mother donkey said, "Do not grieve for his treatment, my child. This is a Chandala that is driving you. A Brahmana can never be so severe. The Brahmana is said to be the friend of all creatures. He is also the teacher and the master of all creatures. Can he punish any creature so cruelly?

This however is a sinful man. He has no compassion to show even to a being of such tender years as you. He is only reveals the varna of his birth by behaving in this way. The nature which he has inherited from his father prevents him from feeling the pity and kindness that are natural to the Brahmana."

Hearing these harsh words from the mother donkey, Matanga dismounted from his chariot and said to her, "Tell me by what fault is my mother stained? How do you know that I am a Chandala? Answer me at once. How do you know that I am a Chandala? How has my status as a Brahmana been lost? You of great wisdom, tell me all this in detail, from beginning to end."

The donkey said, "You were born to a Brahmana woman by a Sudra barber excited by desire. You are, therefore, a Chandala by birth. You do not enjoy the status of a Brahmana."

Thus addressed by the female donkey, Matanga returned home. Seeing him return, his father said, "I sent you on the difficult mission of gathering the requirements for my yagna. Why have you come back without having accomplished your task? Is all not right with you?"

Matanga said, "How can he who belongs to no definite varna, or an inferior varna, ever be regarded as well or happy? How can he whose mother is tainted be happy? Father, this female donkey, who seems to be more than a human being, tells me that I have been begotten upon a Brahmana woman by a Sudra. And for this reason, I will undergo the severest of penances."

Having said these words to his father, and firmly resolved upon what he had said, Matanga went to the great forest and sat in the most austere tapasya. He began to scorch the very Devas with the heat of his asceticism, undertaken to become a Brahmana.

While he sat unmoving in tapasya, Indra appeared and said, "Matanga, why do you pass your time in such grief, abstaining from all kinds of human enjoyment? I shall grant you boons. Name the boons you desire. Do not hesitate, but tell me what is in your heart. Even if it is unattainable, I will bestow it on you."

Matanga said, "I want to attain the status of a Brahmana with my tapasya. Only after becoming a true Brahmana will I go home. This is the boon I seek."

Indra said to him. "You cannot attain this status of a Brahmana which you desire. It is true you seek it, but it cannot be acquired by men who are born of those of uncleansed souls. Imprudent one, you are sure to meet with destruction if you persist in this pursuit.

Stop this vain endeavour at once. This object of your desire, of becoming a Brahmana, who is the foremost of all beings, cannot be achieved by tapasya. By craving this status, you will be only destroyed. One born as a Chandala can never attain to that status which is regarded as the most sacred among the Devas and Asuras and Manavas!"

"Bhishma says, 'Matanga paid no heed to the counsels of Indra and stood on one foot for a hundred years, searing Devaloka even more.

Sakra appeared before him again and said, "The status of a Brahmana is unattainable. Although you covet it, it is impossible for you to acquire it. Matanga, by longing for that lofty condition you are sure to be destroyed. Do not be reckless. This cannot be a righteous path for you to follow.

You are foolish: it is impossible for you to become a Brahmana in this world. By craving that which is unattainable, you are sure to meet destruction. I repeatedly forbid you but you are intent on destroying yourself.

From the order of animal life one attains to the status of humanity. If born as a human being, he is first sure to be born as a Pukkasa or a Chandala. Having been born in this sinful order of existence one has to wander in it for a long time. After one thousand years in that varna, one next attains the status of a Sudra.

One has to live and die and be reborn in the Sudra varna for a long time. After thirty thousand years, one is born as a Vaisya. In that varna, a jiva again has to live for a long time. He is born a Kshatriya after sixty times the duration of his existence as a Sudra.

One has to pass a very long time in the Kshatriya varna. After a duration sixty times the previous length of time, one is born as a fallen Brahmana. One has to wander for a long time in this condition.

After two hundred times the previous length of time, one is born in the vamsa of a Brahmana who lives by fighting. In that one has to spend a great deal of time. After three hundred times the duration of his previous condition, one takes birth in the vamsa of a Brahmana that recites the Gayatri and other sacred mantras.

In that state also one has to remain for a long period. After a time measured by multiplying the last named period by four hundred, one takes birth into the family of a Brahmana conversant with all the Vedic shastras.

In that order again, one spends many a year. In that state of existence, joy and sorrow, desire and loathing, vanity and malicious speech try to enter into him and reduce him to wretchedness. If he succeeds in subduing those adversaries, he then attains a high end. If, on the other hand, those enemies triumph over him, he falls from that high state like one falling to the ground from a tall palm tree.

Knowing this for certain, I say to you, Matanga, ask for some other boon, for you who have been born a Chandala cannot dream of becoming a Brahmana!"

"Bhishma said, 'Matanga still refused to accept Indra's advice. On the other hand, with regulated vows and a cleansed soul, he practised austere tapasya for a thousand years, standing on one foot and deep in dhyana. After a thousand years, Indra came again to him. The slayer of Bala and Vritra repeated the same advice.

Matanga said, "I have passed these thousand years standing on one foot in deep dhyana, observing of the brahmacharya vrata. Why is it that I have not yet succeeded in acquiring the status of a Brahmana?"

Indra said, "One born to a Chandala cannot become a Brahmana by any means. Therefore, name some boon so that all your efforts are not wasted."

Matanga was filled with grief. He journeyed to Prayaga, and lived there for a hundred years, standing all the while on just his toes. He became emaciated and his arteries and veins were swollen and visible. He was reduced to mere skin and bones. Indeed, while performing tapasya at Gaya, the Dharmatman Matanga collapsed from sheer exhaustion.

When Indra, who looks after the welfare of all creatures, saw him fall, the Lord and giver of boons came to that place and held him.

Indra said, "It seems, Matanga, that the status of a Brahmana which you seek is ill-suited to you. You cannot attain it. In fact, for you it is fraught with many dangers. One who worships a Brahmana finds happiness; abstaining from such worship, he finds sorrow.

For all creatures, the Brahmana is the giver of what they prize or covet and the protector of what they already have. It is through the Brahmanas that the Pitris and the Devas are gratified. The Brahmana is said to be foremost of all created beings. The Brahmana grants all objects of desire and in the way that they are desired.

Wandering through innumerable orders of being and undergoing repeated rebirths, one succeeds in some distant birth in being born as a Brahmana. Men of impure souls cannot obtain that condition. Give up this sinful and impossible ambition. Name some other boon. This boon cannot be granted to you."

Matanga said, "Already I am filled with anguish; Indra, why do you further torment me by what you say? You strike one that is already dead. I do not envy you for having acquired the status of a Brahmana; you fail to retain it for you show no compassion for one like me.

You of a hundred yagnas, you say that the status of a Brahmana cannot be attained by any of the three other varnas; yet, men that have succeeded in acquiring that high status through natural means do not adhere to it, for what sins do even Brahmanas not commit? Like wealth, the status of a Brahmana is difficult to acquire, and those who having acquired it do not seek to persevere with it by practising the necessary duties, must be regarded to be the lowest wretches in this world. Indeed, they are the most sinful of all creatures.

Without doubt, the status of a Brahmana is most difficult to attain, and once attained is difficult to maintain. It can dispel every kind of sorrow. Having attained to it, men do not always seek to maintain it by practising dharma and the duties attached to it. When even such men are regarded as Brahmanas, why is it that I, who am content with my own self, who am above all duality, who am detached from all worldly things, who am compassionate towards all creatures, and self-restrained in conduct, cannot be regarded as deserving of that status?

How unfortunate I am that through the fault of my mother I have been reduced to this condition, although I am not sinful in my behaviour. Without doubt, destiny cannot be avoided or conquered by individual exertion, since with all my efforts I am unable to acquire what I have set my heart upon. When such is the case, Indra, it is fitting for you to grant me some other boon if I have become worthy of your grace or if I have earned even a little punya."'

Indra said to him, "Name the boon."

Matanga said, "Let me be possess the power of assuming any form at will, and moving through the skies, and let me enjoy whatever pleasures I may set my heart upon. And let me also have the willing adorations of both Brahmanas and Kshatriyas. I bow to you, great Sakra. Also ensure that my fame lives forever in the world."

Indra said, "You will be celebrated as the deity of a particular measure of verse and you will be worshipped by all women. Your fame will be unrivalled in the three worlds." Having granted him these boons, Indra vanished from sight. Matanga also cast off his life-breath and attained a high place.

Yudhishtira, you see that the status of a Brahmana is very high indeed. As the great Indra himself said, that condition of being cannot be acquired except by birth.'

"Yudhishtira says, 'I have now heard this great narrative. You have said that the status of a Brahmana is difficult to acquire. Yet, it has been said that in former times Viswamitra attained the status of a Brahmarishi. You, however, say that it cannot be obtained.

I have also heard that King Vitahavya in ancient times succeeded in obtaining Brahmatva. Pitamaha, I desire to hear the story of Vitahavya's advancement. With what deeds did that best of kings succeed in acquiring Brahmatva? Was it through some boon obtained from some powerful one or was it through the virtue of tapasya? Tell me everything.'

Bhishma says, 'Rajan, listen to how the famed Rajarishi Vitahavya succeeded in becoming a Brahmana, a condition that is so difficult to attain and that is held in such high reverence by all. While the high-souled Manu ruled his subjects wisely, he had a son of righteous soul who became renowned under the name of Saryati.

Two kings, Haihaya and Talajangha, were born into Saryati's vamsa. Both of them were sons of Vatsa. Haihaya had ten wives. Through them, a hundred sons, all great Kshatriyas, were born to him. All of them resembled one another in features and prowess. All of them were strong and all of them possessed great skill in battle. They all studied the Vedas and the science of weapons thoroughly.

In Kasi also there was a king who was the grandfather of Divodasa. He was known by the name Haryaswa. The sons of King Haihaya, also known as Vitahavya, invaded the kingdom of Kasi and, advancing to the doab between the Ganga and Yamuna, fought a battle with King Haryaswa and killed him.

Having slain King Haryaswa, the sons of Haihaya, those daring Maharathikas, returned to their own delightful city in the kingdom of the Vatsas. Meanwhile Haryaswa's son Sudeva, who was like a god in splendour and who was a second Dharma Deva, was installed on the throne of Kasi as its ruler. The righteous prince had ruled his kingdom for a while when the hundred sons of Vitahavya once more invaded his dominions and defeated him in battle.

Having vanquished King Sudeva, the victors returned to their own city. After that Divodasa, the son of Sudeva, was crowned king of Kasi. Recognising the strength of the sons of Vitahavya, King Divodasa rebuilt and fortified the city of Varanasi at the command of Indra.

The kingdom of Divodasa was full of Brahmanas and Kshatriyas, and abounded with Vaisyas and Sudras. And they teemed with fine articles and provisions of every kind, and were adorned with shops and markets swelling with prosperity. Those territories stretched northwards from the banks of the Ganga to the southern banks of the Gomati, and resembled Amravati, the immortal city of Indra.

Bharta, the Haihayas once again attacked that tiger among kings. The splendid Divodasa sallied forth from his capital city and fought them. The battle between them was as fierce as that between the Devas and the Asuras in ancient times. King Divodasa fought the enemy for a thousand days becoming distraught at the vast number of his subjects and animals that were killed.

Having lost his army and exhausted his treasury, Divodasa fled his capital. Repairing to the delightful asrama of the wise Bharadwaja, the king humbly sought the Rishi's protection. Seeing the king before him, Bharadwaja, who was the king's purohita, said to him, "What is the reason for your coming here? Tell me everything, Rajan. I shall do what is agreeable to you without any hesitation."

The king said, "Holy one, the sons of Vitahavya have slain all the children and men of my house. I alone have escaped with my life, totally routed by the enemy. I seek your protection. Protect me with the love you bear for a sishya. Those sinful princes have slaughtered my entire vamsa, leaving only me alive."

To him who pleaded so piteously, Bharadwaja said, "Do not fear! Do not fear! Son of Sudeva, dismiss all your fears. I will perform a yagna which will give you a son through whom you will be able to annihilate thousands upon thousands of Vitahavya's forces."

After this, the Rishi performed a yagna in order to bestow a son on Divodasa. A son named Pratardana was born to Divodasa. On being born, he instantly grew into a boy of full thirteen years and quickly mastered all the Vedas and their angas.

Helped by his powers of yoga, Bharadwaja himself had entered into the prince. Gathering all the energies in the universe, Bharadwaja put them together in the body of Prince Pratardana. With shining armour and bow, Pratardana, his praises sung by Pauranikas and Devarishis, shone resplendent like the risen sun. Mounted on his chariot with his sword tied to his waist, he shone like a blazing fire. With his sword and shield whirling, he went to his father.

Seeing him, King Divodasa was filled with joy. Indeed, the old king considered the sons of his enemy Vitahavya as already slain. Divodasa installed his son Pratardana as the Yuvaraja, and regarding himself to be successful became exultant. He next commanded that parantapa, Prince Pratardana, to march against the sons of Vitahavya and destroy them in battle.

Pratardana, subduer of enemy cities, quickly crossed the Ganga on his chariot and rode against the city of the Vitahavyas. Hearing the clatter of his chariot's wheels, the sons of Vitahavya, riding on their own powerful chariots that looked like forts, came out of their city. Emerging from their capital, the sons of Vitahavya, all skilful warriors cased in mail, charged with weapons raised at Pratardana and enveloped him with fusillades of arrows.

Surrounding him with countless chariots, the Vitahavyas poured showers of astras upon Pratardana like clouds pouring torrents of rain on the breast of Himavat. Confounding their weapons with his own, mighty Pratardana killed them all with his shafts that resembled Indra's vajra. Beheaded by thousands of broad arrows, the bloodied bodies of the warriors of Vitahavya lay scattered like kimsuka trees felled by woodcutters with their axes.

After all his warriors and sons had fallen in battle, King Vitahavya fled from his capital to the asrama of Rishi Bhrigu. There the royal fugitive sought the protection of the sage. Bhrigu assured the defeated king of his protection. Pratardana followed Vitahavya.

Reaching the Rishi's asrama, the son of Divodasa said in a loud voice, "Listen, all you disciples of the Mahatman Bhrigu, I wish to see the sage. Go and inform him of this."

Recognising that it was Pratardana who had come, Bhrigu himself came out of his asrama and worshipped that best of kings with the due rites. The Rishi said, "Tell me, Rajan, what is it that you want." The king told the Rishi the reason for his presence.

The king said, "Brahmana, Vitahavya has come here. Surrender him to me. His sons destroyed my very vamsa. They laid waste the territories and the wealth of the kingdom of Kasi. I have slain a hundred sons of this proud king. By killing that king himself I will today pay the debt I owe my father."

The compassionate Maharishi Bhrigu replied, "There is no Kshatriya in this asrama. Here they are all Brahmanas."

Accepting Bhrigu's words to be true, Pratardana touched the Rishi's feet and, filled with delight, said, "Without doubt, on account of my prowess, I am now crowned with success, since this king has been abandoned by the very varna of his birth. Brahmana, allow me to leave you, and let me ask you to pray for my welfare. Because of my might, Vitahavya has been compelled to leave the very varna of his birth."

Dismissed by Bhrigu, Pratardana returned from the Rishi's asrama to his kingdom, even as a snake vomits out its real poison. Thus did King Vitahavya attain the status of a Brahmana sage—purely by virtue of Bhrigu's words. He also acquired a complete mastery over all the Vedas in the same manner.

Vitahavya had a son named Gritsamada who was as handsome as Indra. Once, the Daityas harassed him greatly, believing him to be none other than Indra. With regard to that Rishi, one of the greatest srutis in the Riks says, "He with whom Gritsamada stays, Brahmana, is held in high regard by all Brahmanas."

Observing brahmacharya, the wise Gritsamada become a true Dvijottama, a twice-born sage. Gritsamada had a son named Sutejas. Sutejas had a son called Varchas, and the son of Varchas was known by the name Vihavya. Vihavya had a son named Vitatya and Vitatya had a son named Satya. Satya had a son named Santa. Santa's son was the Rishi Sravas.

Sravas begot a son named Tama. Tama had a son named Prakasa, who was a most superior Brahmana. Prakasa had a son named Vagindra who was the foremost of all silent reciters of sacred mantras.

To Vagindra was born a son named Pramati who was a complete master of all the Vedas and their angas. The Apsara Ghritachi bore Pramati a son who was named Ruru. Ruru had a son through his wife Pramadvara. That son was the great Rishi Sunaka. Sunaka gave birth to Saunaka.

It was thus that King Vitahavya, though a Kshatriya by birth, acquired the status of a Brahmana through the grace of Bhrigu. I have also told you the genealogy of the vamsa that sprung from Gritsamada. What else would you like to ask?'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Bharatarishabha, which men are worthy of reverence in the three worlds? Tell me this in detail. I am never satiated with hearing you discourse on these subjects.'

Bhishma says, 'Hear the ancient story of the discourse between Narada and Krishna. Seeing Narada once worshipping many excellent Brahmanas, Krishna said to him, "Whom do you worship? Whom among these Brahmanas do you worship with such great reverence? If it is something that I can be told, I wish to hear it. Foremost of righteous men, tell me."

Narada said, "Listen to the names of those whom I worship. Krishna, who else in this world deserves to hear this? I worship the Brahmanas who always worship Varuna and Vayu and Aditya and Parjanya and Agni, and Sthanu and Skanda and Lakshmi and Vishnu and the Brahmanas, and the Lord of speech, and Chandramas, and the waters and the earth and Devi Saraswati.

I always revere those Brahmanas that are imbued with tapasya, that are conversant with the Vedas, that are always devoted to Vedic study, and that possess high worth. I bow my head before those who are free of pride, who perform the rites in honour of the Devas while fasting, who are always content with what they have and who are forgiving. I adore them that perform yagnas, who are of a forgiving nature, and self-restrained, that are masters of their own senses, that worship truth and righteousness, and that give away land and cows to virtuous Brahmanas.

I bow unto them that are devoted to the observance of tapasya, that dwell in forests, that live upon fruits and roots, that never store anything for the next day, and that are observant of all the kriyas and karmas laid down in the shastras. I bow to them that feed and cherish their servants, that are always hospitable to guests, and that eat only the leftovers of what is offered to the gods.

I worship them that have become formidable by studying the Vedas, that are eloquent in discoursing on the shastras, that are observant of the brahmacharya vrata, and that are always devoted to the duties of presiding at others' yagnas and of teaching sishyas.

I worship them that are compassionate towards all creatures, and that study the Vedas all day. I bow to them that strive to obtain the grace of their gurus, that labour in their learning of the Vedas, that are firm in the observance of vows, that obediently wait upon their teachers and elders, and that are free from hatred and envy. I bow to them that observe excellent vratas, that practise mowna, that have knowledge of Brahman, that are resolute in truth, that offer libations of ghee and offerings of meat.

I bow to them that live upon alms, that are emaciated for want of adequate food and drink, that have lived in their gurus' homes, that are detached from all enjoyments, and that are poor in material goods. I bow to them that have no love for material wealth, that have no quarrel with others, that do not clothe themselves, that have no wants, that have become powerful through the acquisition of the Vedas, that are eloquent in the teaching of dharma, and that speak of Brahman.

I bow before those that are compassionate towards all creatures, firm in the observance of truth, self-restrained, and calm in their behaviour. Yadava, I bow to them devoted to the worship of Devas and Atithis, that belong to grihasta asrama, and that follow the way of pigeons in their manner of living. I always bow to those whose actions are marked by the triguna, without being weakened, and who are observant of truth and righteous conduct.

I bow unto them who are conversant with Brahman, who are endowed with knowledge of the Vedas, who are attentive in the pursuit of dharma, artha and kama, that are free of greed, and that are righteous. I bow unto them that survive only upon water, or upon air alone, or upon the leftovers of the food that is offered to gods and guests, and that observe diverse kinds of excellent vratas. I always worship those who have taken the vow of celibacy, who have wives and the domestic fire, that are the refuge of the Vedas, and that are the loving sanctuary of all creatures in the universe.

Krishna, I always bow to those Rishis that are the Creators of the universe, that are the elders of the universe, that are the eldest of the vamsa or the family, that dispel tamas, and that are the most righteous and most learned in the universe. For these reasons, you too, must worship those twice-born ones of whom I speak every day.

Deserving of reverence, they will, when worshipped, bestow happiness on you. Those of whom I speak always grant happiness in this world as well as in the next. Revered by all, they roam about in this world, and, if worshipped by you, are sure to grant you bliss.

They who are hospitable to all that come to them as guests, and who are always devoted to Brahmanas and cows, as also to truth in words and deeds, succeed in overcoming all calamities and obstacles. They who are always devoted to peace, as also they who are free from malice and envy, and they who are always attentive to the study of the Vedas, succeed in conquering all misfortunes and difficulties. They who bow before all the Devas without showing a preference for any, they who take refuge in any one Veda, they who are steadfast and self-restrained, prevail over all hardships and impediments.

They who worship the foremost of Brahmanas with reverence, are firm in the observance of vratas and practise the virtue of charity, overcome all calamities and obstacles. They who are engaged in the practice of tapasya, who are always observant of the vow of celibacy, and whose souls have been cleansed by tapasya, overcome all calamities and obstacles. They who are devoted to the worship of the Devas and atithis and Parvivara, dependents, as also of the Pitris, and they who eat the remnants of the food that is offered to Devas, Pitris, guests and dependents, conquer all problems and obstructions.

They who, having lit the domestic fire, duly keep it burning and worship it with reverence and they who duly pour libations in Soma yagnas, succeed in overcoming all difficulties. Krishna, they who behave as you do towards their mothers and fathers and gurus and elders triumph over all obstacles." Having said these words, the Devarishi fell silent.'

Bhishma continues, 'For these reasons, you must also always worship with great reverence the Devas, the Pitris, the Brahmanas and atithis who arrive at your palace, and as a result of such conduct you, too, will attain a lofty and desirable end.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Wise Pitamaha conversant with all branches of knowledge, I want to hear you discourse on subjects related to kartavya and dharma, duty and righteousness. Tell me what are the merits are of those that grant protection to living creatures of all the four varnas when they entreat it?'

Bhishma says, 'Dharmaputra, listen to this ancient history on the great merit of granting protection to others when it is humbly sought. Long ago, a beautiful pigeon, pursued by a hawk, flew down from the skies and sought the protection of the king, Usinara Vrishadarbha.

The king comforted the terrified pigeon, saying, "Be reassured; do not fear. What has frightened you so much? What have you done and where, that you have lost your senses in fear and are more dead than alive? Your colour, beautiful bird, resembles that of a newly bloomed blue lotus. Your eyes are the colour of the pomegranate or the Asoka flower.

Do not be frightened. Set your mind at rest. When you have sought refuge with me, know that no one will have the courage to even think of harming you. For your sake, I will give up the very kingdom of Kasi and, if needed, my life too. Be comforted and feel no fear."

The hawk said to the king, "This bird has been ordained to be my food. It does not befit you to shelter him from me. I have hunted and overpowered this bird with great effort. His flesh and blood and marrow and fat will make good food for me. This bird will gratify me. Rajan, do not place yourself between him and me.

The thirst that tortures me is fierce, and hunger gnaws at my stomach. Release the bird and let me have him. I cannot bear the pains of hunger any longer. I pursued him as my prey. Look at his body, bruised and torn by my wings and talons. Look, how his breath has turned weak. It is not just for you to protect him from me.

In the exercise of that power which rightly belongs to you, you may intervene to protect men when other men try to kill them. You cannot, however, claim any power over a flying bird afflicted with thirst. Your power may extend over your enemies, your servants, your relatives, and the disputes that take place between your subjects. Indeed, it may extend over every part of your dominions and also over your own senses. Your power, however, does not extend to the sky.

Displaying your prowess over your enemies, you can establish your dominion over them. Your rule, however, does not extend over the birds that range the sky. Indeed, if you wish to earn punya by protecting this pigeon, it is your duty to also consider me and help me appease my hunger and save my life."'

Bhishma continues, 'Hearing the hawk's words, the royal sage was filled with some wonder. Wanting to heed these words and comfort the hawk, the king spoke to him.

The king said, "Let a bull, a boar, a deer or a buffalo be cooked for you today. Today appease your hunger on that food. I have taken a vow never to abandon anyone that seeks my protection. This bird will not leave my lap."

The hawk said, "I do not eat the flesh of the boar or the bull, the deer or the buffalo. What need have I of such food? My concern is only with that food which has been ordained for beings of my order? Hawks feed on pigeons, this is the eternal law. Sinless Usinara, if you feel such love for this pigeon, then give me flesh from your own body, equal in weight to that of this pigeon."

The king said, "You have shown me great respect by saying this to me. Yes, I shall do what you command."

Saying this, the king began to cut off his own flesh and weigh it in a balance against the pigeon.

Meanwhile, in the inner rooms of the palace, the wives of the king, adorned with jewels, heard what was happening, and came out grief-stricken and lamenting. Their cries, and those of the ministers and servants, rose in the palace like thunder. The clear sky was suddenly enveloped with dense clouds on every side. The earth began to quake because of the king's virtuous act.

Usinara continued to cut the flesh from his sides, from his arms, and from his thighs, and to fill one side of the scales to weigh it against the pigeon. Even after he had cut away a great deal of his flesh, the pigeon continued to weigh heavier. When at last the king was reduced to a fleshless skeleton of bones, covered with blood, he desired to give up his whole body, and climbed on to the scale in which he had placed his flesh.

At that moment, the three worlds, led by Indra, arrived there to see him. Celestial drums began to roll, played upon by spirits of the sky. King Vrishadarbha was bathed in a shower of amrita that was poured upon him. Garlands of heavenly flowers, of wonderful fragrance and texture, also rained down on him.

The Devas, Gandharvas and Apsaras began to sing and dance around him even as they do around Brahma. King Usinara ascended a celestial chariot that was more grand and beautiful than a palace made of gold; its arches were encrusted with gemstones and adorned with columns made of lapis lazuli. In this manner, the royal sage Usinara, also known as the great Sibi, went to swarga through his righteous act.

Yudhishtira, you too, must treat those that seek your protection in the same way. He who protects those that are devoted to him, those that are devoted to him, and those that depend upon him, and who has compassion for all creatures, attains great felicity in the next world. A virtuous king who is honest and honourable acquires every worthy reward by his actions.

The Rajarishi Sibi, of pure soul and great wisdom and indomitable prowess, the ruler of the kingdom of Kasi, became celebrated throughout the three worlds for his righteous deeds. He who protects one who seeks refuge in the same way will certainly attain the same happy end as Sibi did. He who narrates this history of Vrishadarbha is sure to be purified of every sin, and he who hears it recited is sure to attain to the same end.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Pitamaha, what is the best conduct out of all those that have been established for a king? By doing what is a king able to enjoy both this world and the next?'

Bhishma says, 'The foremost dharma that has been laid down for a duly consecrated king, if he desires to obtain great happiness, is the worship of Brahmanas. This is what the best of all kings should do. Bharatarishabha, know this well. The king should always revere all righteous Brahmanas who possess Vedic knowledge.

The king must worship all learned Brahmanas living in his city or kingdom, with bowed head, elevating words, and gifts of all things of enjoyment. This is the foremost of all kartavyas laid down for the king. Indeed, the king must always be focused on this. He should protect and cherish the Brahmanas, even as he does himself or his own children. With even greater reverence the king must worship those Brahmanas who are learned and righteous.

When such men are free of all worries, the whole kingdom is ablaze with grace and beauty. Such men are worthy of adoration. The king must bow his head before them. They must be honoured, even as one honours one's fathers and grandfathers. Even as the existence of all creatures depends upon Vasava, so does the conduct of men depend on such Brahmanas. So compelling are their powers and tejas that if angered such men can raze the entire kingdom to ashes merely by their will, or with mantras, or by other means acquired through tapasya. Nothing can destroy them. Their power appears to be boundless, stretching to the ends of the universe. When angry, their glances fall upon men like a blazing fire upon a forest. The bravest of men are terrified by them. Their virtues and powers are vast and extraordinary.

Some among them are like wells and holes with their mouths covered by grass and creepers, while others resemble the bright and cloudless sky. Some among them, like Durvasas, are of fierce dispositions. Some, like Gautama, are as soft in nature as cotton. Some among them are cunning like Rishi Agastya who devoured the Asura Vatapi.

Some among them are devoted to the practice of tapasya; some are employed in farming like Uddalaka's guru; some are engaged in caring for cows as did Upamanyu, while attending on his guru. Some among them live on alms; some are even robbers like Valmiki in his early years and Viswamitra during a famine. Some, like Narada, enjoy inciting quarrels and disputes. Some, like Bharata, are actors and dancers.

Some can achieve all ordinary and extraordinary feats, like Agastya who swallowed the entire ocean as if it were a palmful of water. The Brahmanas are of diverse natures and behaviour. One must always sing the praises of the Brahmanas who are conversant with all duties, who are of righteous behaviour, who are devoted to virtuous deeds of many kinds, and who are seen to derive their sustenance from diverse kinds of occupations.

The Brahmanas who are older in origin than the Pitris, the Devas, men of the other three varnas, the Nagas and the Rakshasas are the most highly blessed. These regenerate men cannot be defeated by the Devas or the Pitris, the Gandharvas or the Rakshasas, the Asuras or the Pisachas. The Brahmanas can make one who is not a deity into one. They can also divest a Deva of his position.

He whom they wish to make a king becomes one. He whom they do not love or favour, on the other hand, is degraded. Rajan, I tell you truly that those foolish men who dishonour the Brahmanas meet with destruction. Skilled in praise and censure, and themselves the cause of other men's fame and disgrace, Brahmanas are always angered by those that seek to harm others.

That man whom the Brahmanas praise grows in prosperity. The man who is censured and cast off by the Brahmanas is disgraced. As a result of the absence of Brahmanas from among them, the Sakas, the Yavanas, the Kambojas and other Kshatriya tribes have fallen and devolved into Sudras. Similarly, the Dravidas, the Kalingas, the Pulindas, the Usinaras, the Kolisarpas, the Mahishakas and other Kshatriyas have become Sudras because of the absence of Brahmanas from among them.

Defeat at their hands is better than victory over them. The killing of a single Brahmana is a more heinous sin than the slaying all other living creatures in the world. The great Rishis have said that Brahmahatya is the worst sin. One must never humiliate or defame the Brahmanas. Where such condemnation of Brahmanas is pronounced, one should hang one's head in shame or leave that place in order to avoid both the speaker and his words.

That man has not as yet been, nor will be, born in this world who has been or will be able to pass his life in happiness after falling out with the Brahmanas. One cannot seize the wind in one's hands. One cannot touch the moon with one's hand. One cannot support the earth on one's arms. Similarly, one cannot vanquish the Brahmanas in this world.'"

"Bhishma says, 'One must always offer the most respectful worship to the Brahmanas. Soma is their king, and they confer happiness and sorrow upon others. They must always be loved and protected as one loves and protects one's own fathers and grandsires, and they should be adored with reverence, gifts of food and ornaments, and other articles of enjoyment and desire.

The peace and happiness of the kingdom flow from such respect shown to Brahmanas, even as the peace and happiness of all living creatures flow from Indra. Let pure and radiant Brahmanas be born in a kingdom. Let Kshatriyas that are splendid maharathikas able to scorch all enemies, settle in a kingdom. Narada said this to me.

Rajan, there is nothing better than having a Brahmana of good birth, with a knowledge of neeti and dharma, morality and righteousness, and resolute in the observance of excellent vratas reside in one's palace. This will confer every kind of blessing. The sacrificial offerings given to Brahmanas reach the very Devas who accept them. Brahmanas are the fathers of all creatures. There is nothing higher than a Brahmana.

Aditya, Chandramas, Vayu, Jala, Bhumi, Akasa and the Diks, the cardinal directions, all enter the body of the Brahmana and partake of what the Brahmana eats. In that house where Brahmanas do not eat, the Pitris refuse to eat. The Devas also never eat in the house of the wretch who hates the Brahmanas. When Brahmanas are gratified, the Pitris also are gratified. There is no doubt about this.

They that give away the sacrificial ghrita to Brahmanas are themselves gratified in this and the other world. Such men can never be destroyed.

They succeed in attaining to lofty ends. Those particular offerings in yagnas with which one gratifies the Brahmanas go to gratify both the Pitris and the Devas.

The Brahmana is the cause of that sacrifice from which all creation has sprung. The Brahmana knows that from which this universe has materialised and that to which, when apparently destroyed, it returns. The Brahmana knows the path that leads to swarga and the one that leads to naraka. The Brahmana is conversant with what has happened and what will happen.

The Brahmana is the foremost of all men. The Brahmana is fully acquainted with the dharma that has been laid down for his varna. Those that follow the Brahmanas are never destroyed. Even when they leave from this world, they never meet with death. They always triumph. Those Mahatmans, those that have subdued their souls, who accept the words spoken by the Brahmanas, are never defeated. They always prevail.

The tejas and shakti of Kshatriyas who scorch everything are impotent when they encounter the energy and power of Brahmanas. The Bhrigus conquered the Talajanghas. The son of Angiras conquered the Nipas. Bharadwaja conquered the Vitahavyas and the Ailas. Though all these Kshatriyas were masters of diverse kinds of astras, those Brahmanas, with only black deer skins for their emblems, overcame them decisively.

Bestowing the earth upon the Brahmanas and illuminating both the worlds with the splendour of such a deed, one must do that by which one may attain the end of all things. Like fire hidden within wood, everything that is said, heard or read in this world lies latent in the Brahmana. Listen to the itihasa of the conversation between Krishna and Bhumi Devi.

Krishna asked, "Mother of all creatures, auspicious Devi, I want to ask you to dispel a doubt. By what karma does a grihasta succeed in purifying himself of all his sins?"

Bhumi Devi replied, "One must serve the Brahmanas. This conduct is cleansing and excellent. If a man serves Brahmanas with reverence all his impurities are washed away. Prosperity arises from such behaviour; fame stems from this. And from this springs forth Atmagyana, the knowledge of the Soul. Through such conduct a Kshatriya becomes a maharathika and a parantapa, and acquires great renown.

This is what Narada said to me: if one desires many kinds of prosperity, one must always revere a Brahmana that is well-born, of firm vows and conversant with the shastras. He who is praised by Brahmanas, who are higher than all other men, grows in riches. He who speaks ill of the Brahmanas is soon disgraced, even as a lump of unbaked earth is destroyed when cast into the sea.

In the same manner, any cruelty to the Brahmanas is sure to bring shame and ruin. Behold the dark spots on the moon and the salty waters of the sea. The great Indra, too, had once been marked all over with a thousand phalluses. It was through the power of the Brahmanas that those penises were transformed into a thousand eyes.

Krishna, look at how all those events transpired. Desiring fame and prosperity and diverse realms of felicity in the next world, a man of pure conduct and soul must live in accordance with the dictates of the Brahmanas."

Bhishma continues, 'Hearing these words of the Devi, Krishna exclaimed, "Uttamam! Uttamam!" and duly worshipped her. Son of Pritha, having heard this discourse between Bhumi Devi and Madhava, you too, must always worship all superior Brahmanas with a rapt soul. Doing this, you will surely obtain what is highly beneficial for you!'"

"Bhishma says, 'Brahmanas, by birth alone, become beings adored by all creatures, and as guests are entitled to eat the first portion of all cooked food. From them flow the great Purusharthas, the goals of life: dharma, artha, kama and moksha. They are the friends of all creatures in the universe. They are also the mouths of the Devas for food placed into Brahmanas' mouths is eaten by the gods.

Worshipped with reverence, they bless us with prosperity by uttering auspicious words. Scorned by our enemies, may the enraged Brahmanas curse them. Those who know ancient history recite the following Riks of how Brahma, after having created the Brahmanas, ordained their duties:

A Brahmana must never do anything other than what has been established for him. Protected, they should protect others. By conducting themselves in this way, they are sure to attain what is beneficial for them. By doing what has been ordained for them, they are sure to acquire spiritual wealth. They will be both the high standards for all creatures to aspire to, and the reins for restraining them. A learned Brahmana must never do that which is laid down for Sudras. By such a deed, a Brahmana loses merit.

With Vedic study he is sure to obtain prosperity and intelligence, and energy and puissance to overcome all enemies, as also glory of the most exalted kind. By offering oblations of ghrita to the Devas, the Brahmanas are blessed and become so worthy that they take precedence over even children in the matter of all kinds of cooked food.

Suffused with faith, marked by compassion towards all creatures, and devoted to self-restraint and the study of the Vedas, all your wishes will be fulfilled. Whatever exists in the world of Manavas, whatever occurs in the realm of the Devas, can all be acquired with through tapasya and gyana, and the observance of vratas and subduing the senses.

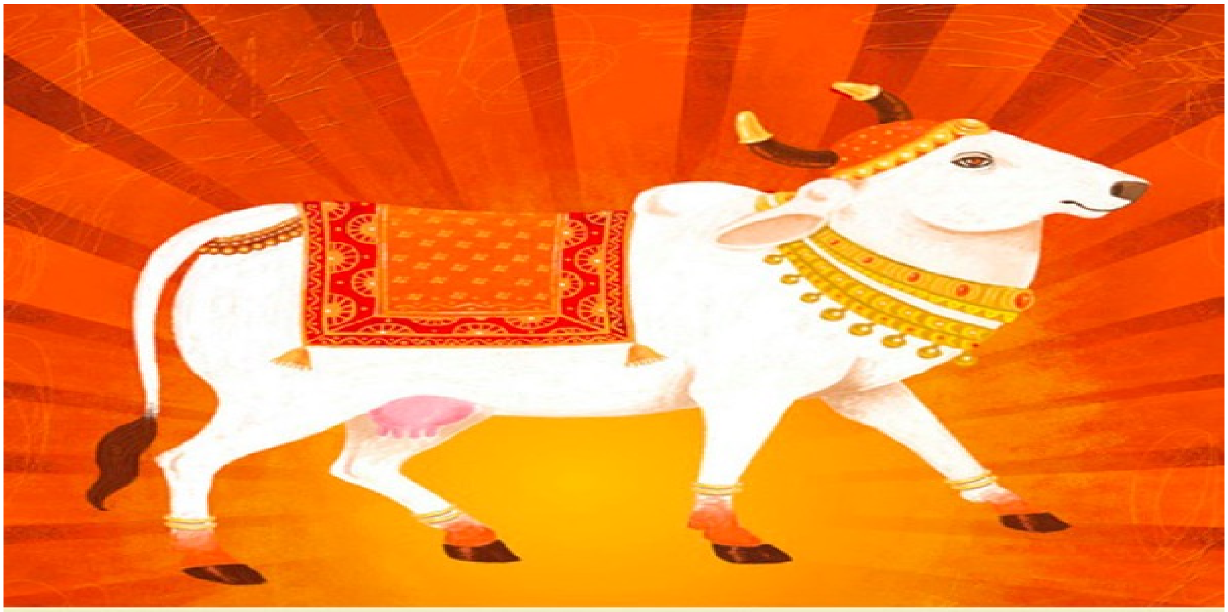
I have thus recited to you the verses that were sung by Brahma himself, moved by his deep love for the Brahmanas and his great wisdom. The power of those devoted to tapasya is equal to the power of kings.

They are compelling, fierce, and as swift as lightning in what they do. Among them are those with the strength of lions and then those that possess the might of tigers. Some of them have the power of boars, some with that of the great stag, and others with that of crocodiles. Some among them have the lash and venom of poisonous snakes, and the bite of some resembles that of sharks.

Some of them can decimate their enemies with words, while others can destroy with a mere glance of their eyes. While some are like snakes of virulent poison, some of them have gentle natures. The dispositions of the Brahmanas are of diverse kinds.

The Mekalas, the Dravidas, the Lathas, the Paundras, the Konwasiras, the Saundikas, the Daradas, the Darvas, the Chauras, the Savaras, the Varvaras, the Kiratas, the Yavanas, and numerous other tribes of Kshatriyas have become Sudras by the wrath of Brahmanas. By disdain of the Brahmanas, the Asuras were forced to take refuge in the depths of the ocean. Through the grace of the Brahmanas, the Devas have become Swargavasis.

Akasa cannot be touched. The Himavat Mountains cannot be moved from their place. The flow of Ganga cannot be checked by a dam. The Brahmanas cannot be subjugated. Kshatriyas cannot rule the earth without seeking the favour of the Brahmanas.



The Brahmanas are high-souled beings. They are the gods of the very Devas. If you wish to enjoy the sovereignty over the earth and her seas, worship them with gifts and dutiful service. When they accept a gift, their fierce energy and power abates. Rajan, you must protect your vamsa from those Brahmanas that do not want to accept gifts.'"

Anusasana Parva

Vaisampayana said, “Bhishma says, ‘Listen, O Yudhishtira, to the old itihasa of the discourse between Sakra and Sambara. Once upon a time, assuming the guise of an ascetic, with matted locks on his head and his body smeared all over with ashes, Indra rode on an ugly chariot and went into the presence of the Asura Sambara.

Indra said, “Through what conduct, Sambara, have you been able to become sovereign of all your kind? For what reason do all people regard you as being superior? Tell me this truly and in detail.”

Sambara said, “I never harbour any ill-will towards the Brahmanas. Whatever instructions they impart I accept with unquestioning reverence. When Brahmanas are engaged in interpreting the scriptures, I listen to them with great happiness. Having heard their interpretations I never disregard them, nor do I ever offend them in any way. I always worship Brahmanas who are endowed with intelligence, seek knowledge from them and worship their feet.

Approaching me with confidence, they always address me with affection and enquire after my welfare. If they ever happen to be heedless, I am always heedful. If they happen to sleep, I remain wakeful. Like bees drenching the cells of the comb with honey, they who are my instructors and rulers, always drench me with the nectar of knowledge. I am thus always devoted to the path pointed out by the shastras, and am perfectly free from malice or evil passion.

Whatever they say with cheerful hearts, I always accept, using my memory and understanding. I am careful of my own faith in them and I think of my own inferiority to them. I lick the nectar that dwells at the tips of their tongues, and this is why I occupy a position far above that of all others of my kind, like the moon transcending all the stars. The scriptural wisdom, which falls from the lips of the Brahmanas and listening to which every wise man acts in the world, constitutes amrita on earth and may be likened to eyes of remarkable vision.

Witnessing the war between the Devas and the Asuras in days of old, and understanding the power of the instructions of the Brahmanas, my father became filled with delight and wonder.

Beholding the puissance of the high-souled Brahmanas, my sire asked Chandramas, 'How do the Brahmanas attain success?'

Soma said, 'Brahmanas become crowned with success through their tapasya. Their strength consists in speech, while the prowess of Kshatriyas resides in their arms. Brahmanas, however, have speech for their weapons.

A Brahmana should study the Vedas or at least Pranava, AUM, while undergoing privations and hardships in his guru's asrama. Divesting himself of anger and renouncing earthly attachments, he should become a Yati, looking upon all things with an equal eye. If he masters all the Vedas and acquires great knowledge in his master's home, he attains a position that will command respect and no one will denounce him as being untutored or as one who has not travelled or seen the world. Like a snake swallowing mice, the earth swallows up these two: a king who is unwilling to fight and a Brahmana who is unwilling to leave home to acquire knowledge. Pride destroys the prosperity of persons of little intelligence. An unwed maiden, if she conceives, becomes stained. A Brahmana incurs reproach by staying home.'

This is what my father heard from Soma of wonderful aspect. My father began to reverence the Brahmanas. Like him, I also worship and adore them."

Hearing these words from a prince among Danavas, Indra began to worship the Brahmanas, and as a result he acquired lordship over the Devas.'"

"Yudhishtira says, 'Which amongst these three persons should be regarded as the best to make gifts to: one who is a stranger, one who lives with and who is known to the giver, or one who presents himself before the giver, coming from a long distance?'

Bhishma says, 'All these are equal. The eligibility of some consists in their soliciting alms to perform sacrifices, or to pay their guru dakshina or maintain their wives and children, or to follow the vow of wandering over the earth, never soliciting anything but taking when given. We should, however, make gifts without afflicting those that depend upon us. By afflicting one's dependants, one afflicts one's own self. The stranger, who has come for the first time, should be regarded as a proper deserver of gifts, in the same light as the one who has been living with the giver, and the one who comes from a distant place.'

Yudhishtira says, 'It is true that we should make gifts to others without depriving anyone or violating the injunctions of the scriptures. One should, however, ascertain that the person is deserving of receiving gifts. He should be such that the gift itself, by being made over to him, may not grieve.'

Bhishma says, 'If the ritwik, the purohita, the guru, the acharya, the sishya, the sambandhi, and one's own kinsmen are learned and free from malice, they should be deemed worthy of respect and worship. Those in whom these qualities are not found cannot be so regarded.

Hence, one should, with deliberation, examine those with whom one comes into contact. Absence of wrath, truthfulness of speech, abstention from causing injury, sincerity and peaceful conduct, the absence of pride, modesty, renunciation, self-restraint and contentment of soul: he in whom these are inherent, and in whom there is no evil, should be regarded as being deserving. A sage is such a one who deserves every honour and hospitality, whether he is well-known and familiar, or a stranger recently come, or seen for the very first time.

He who disregards the Vedas, and the shastras, or approves of all breaches of restraint in society, only brings about his own ruin, and should never be regarded as worthy of receiving honour or gifts. A Brahmana who is vain of his learning, who speaks ill of the Vedas or who is devoted to pointless argumentation, or who just wants to be victorious in disputations amongst good men by disproving the existence of neeti and dharma, who ascribes everything to chance, and censures and reproaches others, who reproves Brahmanas, who is suspicious of all, who is foolish and bereft of judgment, or who is rude, should be known to be as hateful as a dog, for he spends his breath in vain, barking all the while, always wanting to bite, and seeks to destroy the authority of all the scriptures.

Those practices that support society, the duties of dharma, and all deeds that benefit oneself, must be attended to. A man who lives attending to these grows in prosperity for everlasting time. By paying off the debt one owes to the Devas by performing sacrifices, that to the Rishis by studying the Vedas, that to the Pitris by procreating children, that to the Brahmanas by giving gifts to them and that to Sadasyas by feeding them, in due order, and with purity of intention, and properly keeping to the laws of the shastras, a grihasta, a householder, does not fall away from righteousness.'"

Yudhishtira says, ‘O best of the Bhaaratas, I wish to hear you discourse on the disposition of women. Women are said to be the root of all evil, and fickle and frail.’

Bhishma cites a discourse between the celestial Rishi Narada and the Apsara Panchachuda. ‘In ancient times, the Rishi Narada, having roamed over all the world, met the Apsara Panchachuda of faultless beauty, who dwelt in Brahmaloka, and her every limb was endowed with great beauty. Narada addressed her, saying, “O you of the slender waist, I have a doubt in my mind. Can you resolve it?”

The Apsara said to him, “If the subject is known to me and if you think me competent to speak upon it, I shall certainly tell you what I think.”

Narada said, “O amiable one, I shall not appoint you to any task that is beyond your competence. Beautiful one, I wish to hear from you of the nature and disposition of women.”

Hearing this from the Devarishi, Panchachuda replied, “Being myself a woman, I cannot speak ill of women. You know what women are and with what natures they are endowed. It does not become you, O Devarishi, to set me to such a task.”

Narada said, “While that is true indeed, slender-waisted one, one incurs fault by saying what is untrue. However, in speaking the truth there can be no sin.”

Now the Apsara Panchachuda, of sweet smiles, consented to answer Narada’s question. She then addressed herself to mention what the eternal faults of women are!

Panchachuda said, “Even if a high-born woman is blessed with beauty and has protectors, these women want to transgress the restraints assigned to them. This fault truly stains them, O Narada. There is nothing that is more sinful than women. Verily, women are the root of all sins. That, certainly, is known to you. Having husbands of fame, wealth, handsome features, and completely obedient to them, they are still prepared to be unfaithful to them if they get an opportunity. This, mighty one, is a great weakness with women that, casting off their modesty, they cultivate companionship with men of sinful habits and intentions. Women betray a liking for men who court them, who approach their presence, and who respectfully serve them to even a slight extent.

Only through want of solicitation, or fear of relatives, women, who are naturally impatient of all restraints, do not transgress those that have been ordained for them, and remain by the side of their husbands. They never take into consideration the age of the person they are prepared to favour. Ugly or handsome, if he merely happens to belong to the opposite sex, women are ready to enjoy his company. That women remain faithful to their husbands is due not to their fear of sin, to compassion, wealth, or affection that springs up in their hearts for kinsmen and children.

Women living in the bosom of respectable families envy the condition of other women who are young and well-adorned with jewels and ornaments, and who lead a carefree life. Even those that are loved by their husbands, and treated with great respect, are seen to bestow their favours upon men that are hump-backed, blind, idiots, or dwarfish. Women may be seen to like the companionship of even men that cannot walk or who are ugly.

O great Rishi, there is no man in this world whom women regard as unfit for companionship. Unable to find men, out of fear of relatives, of death and imprisonment, women remain within the constraints prescribed for them. They are exceedingly restless, wanton and ever hanker after new companions and lovers. In consequence of their very natures being fickle, they are incapable of being faithful in love. Their disposition is such that, when bent upon transgression, they can never be restrained. Verily, women are truly as the wise say they are.

Fire is never sated with fuel. Oceans can never be filled with the waters that rivers bring into them. Death is never satisfied with killing all living creatures. Similarly, women are never satiated with men. This, O Devarishi, is another mystery connected with women. As soon as they see a handsome and charming man, unfailing signs of desire appear. They never show sufficient regard for husbands, who satisfy their wishes, do what is agreeable and protect them from want and danger. Women never regard so highly even articles of enjoyment in abundance, ornaments or other possessions as they do the intimate company of men.
